Having observed in the eyes of the little one a peculiarity of formation, I had an opportunity, while he, of the anvil, was engaged, of indulging an awakened curiosity. Drawing the child near me, I found his eyes unusally large, but not remarkably prominent. The iris, which was of a light hazel color, encroached more than ordinarily on the sclerotic coat, and the widely dilated pupil, on examination, proved to have no contractile energy. In a conversation with the mother, she observed that her son could discover objects at inconceivable distances, but when they were within the range of ordinary vision, he appeared as blind as an owl at noontide. This communication gave a solution to the "stubborn awkwardness" of this interesting child. As I had a desire to test the acuteness of his sight by an observation on the satellites of Jupiter, you may judge of my pleasure when I received an invitation to remain for the night. Soon after supper, I hastened to make the experiment. The firmament was studded with its starry gems—a westerly wind having rendered the atmosphere as pellucid as possible—and Jupiter and Saturn were to be seen floating in majestic splendor, without a rival among the thousand of their glittering cotemporaries. Having with me a small telescope, of power sufficient to observe the satellites of Jupiter, I directed the boy's attention to this planet, at the same time requesting him to inform me if he saw any small luminaries in its vicinity, and to state how they were situated with regard to the primary body.— In a moment he asserted that he saw "three bodies like golden marbles, one above the planet—one on the right, and the other on the left hand." I then asked him their apparent relative distances from the main body, and he answered that the upper one was the most remote, and that on the left hand the least. I immediately pointed the telescope to the spot, and found to my indescribable astonishment, that the boy was minutely correct in every particular. His attention was next drawn to the planet Saturn, when he announced that he could plainly discern four small bodies, similar to those adjacent to Jupiter, but of an inferior size: in this instance I was not prepared for an investigation—the power of my instrument being too limited. The next morning I pursued my journey, with the intention of returning in a few days to renew my enquiries. On my return I instituted other experiments that proved, to a demonstration, the telescopic vision of the child, but as I have already written more than I had intended, I shall not attempt a recapitulation of them: I may mention, however, that during my absence the relative positions of the moons of Jupiter had materially changed, yet this wonderful boy again fully convinced me that his unassisted sight reached as far, at least, as my telescope.

CANAL THROUGH THE ISTHMUS OF SUEZ.—We translate the following from the columns of our industrious neighbor of the Deutsche Schnellpost; from what source he derived the intelligence we are not informed.—N. Y. Tribune.

The cutting through the Isthmus of Suez is at last determined upon. The conditions of this enterprise, in which Europe is combined, are:

1. Egypt is made a nuetral State; her neutrality and independence are guarantied by the Porte, France, England, and Austria.

2. Prussia, Russia, North America, and Powers of the second rank, are invited to recognize this neutrality.

3. France, England, and Austria, make the cutting at their own cost, and levy a tonnage till the outlay is made up.

4. The execution of the work cannot be interrupted even by the breaking out of a war between the contracting parties.

Austria undertakes to make the Nile navigable as far as Damietta, where there is to be an immense harbor, (the oversight at this part of the work will be given to Captain Moring, of the Austrian Engineers, known to many of our readers by his residence in the U. States.) England is to buy the necessary land at Zuez, and the canal itself is to be cut by France and England together.

Loss of the British Schooner Columbian Packet, with Four of her Crew.

The Columbian Packet, Captain Marshall, sailed from Baltimore, on Saturday last, 9 A. M., bound to Glasgow, Scotland; at 9, A. M. on Monday, discharged her pilot, and about two hours and twenty minutes thereafter, Cape Henry bearing W. ¾ S; Smith's Island light N. by W., about 14 miles distant, was struck by lightning and capsized in a thunder squall. All the canvass she had set at the time, was her mainsail and jib. She now lies sunk in seven fathoms water. Capt. Marshall, mate and six of his crew arrived here in the Norfolk steamboat yesterday morning, from whom is derived the particulars of this sad affair. The pilot boat Pocahontas, Capt. Clark, seeing their situation, hastened to their rescue and arrived alongside at 2, P. M.; Captain M. was taken from the mast head in a state of nudity by Captain Clark, and four of the seamen saved, were clinging to the wreck; several hours after, the mate and two more were picked up drifting on spars. Daniel Mackenzie, carpenter; Gasper Case, Cook; William Henderson, seaman, of Scotland, and Thomas Torrey, youth, of Liverpool—all being below at the time, were lost.— The cook had only left the deck a minute or two before the capsize. Captain Marshall and those saved, desire thus to return their heartfelt thanks to Captain Clark and others, of the pilot boat Pocahontas, for their prompt assistance in rescuing them, and further for the hospitable treatment and attention since extended to them. Captain M. especially acknowledges his grateful feelings to Captain Clark, who saved him from the mast head and clothed him from his own trunk.

The Columbian packet cleared at this port on the 6th May, and having got ashore in the bay, returned to port again on the 12th, since then, has been thoroughly repaired, and sailed again on Saturday as above, with the following cargo, same as when first she cleared, viz: 1253 bbls. meal, 46 do flour, 85 bags Navy bread, 498 bags corn, (1181½ bus.) 1 bbl. beans, shipped by the Scotch Relief committee for the poor of that country, and 1886 bags wheat, containing 3959 bus., with some staves, &c., on account of the owners. The vessel was insured at Lloyd's. $5,600 loaned on bottom is insured in one of the Baltimore offices. We have not heard whether the cargo is insured or not, but presume it is.—Baltimore Sun.

NEW YORK AND BALTIMORE.—Calculations relative to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.—The New York Courier is noticing the plans of internal improvement, projected for the benefit of Baltimore, and it remarks that no plan can be originated from which New York cannot derive some benefit. The route which the "Courier" now particularly refers, is the extension of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, from which New York must derive much benefit. A writer in a Baltimore paper estimating the cost of transporting a barrel of flour via this route and via New Orleans, says:—

"A barrel of flour costs in freight and other charges from Cincinnati, as follows: To New Orleans, 50 cents for freight, and about 5 cents insurance; at New Orleans it sustains a depreciation from market value, by defacement, about 25 cents, insurance and freight; to eastern ports about 60 cents, or $1,40 total cost; to Baltimore 90 cents, including river freight, and from Baltimore to Boston or New York 25 cents including insurance, or total $1,15. Difference in money, 25 cents, and in time an average of one month in favor of the Baltimore route."

After showing the advantages New York will have in this new road, over the N. Orleans route, the writer then goes on to show that New Yorkers can get flour cheaper via Baltimore from the north of Ohio, than by their own canals.

"From Zanesville (we quote) to New York, through the lakes and New York canals, cost for a barrel of flour, $1,55 to $1,60; and by the way of Baltimore to New York, from $1,15 to $1,20 with the difference of time in favor of Baltimore of fifteen days."

These statements, says the New York Express, may surprise many who think our canals beyond competition, but as the transportation of flour can be reduced to dollars and cents, there is no reason to doubt the soundness of the calculations of the Baltimore people in relation to their Ohio road.—Balt. Sun.

INGENIOUS COUNTERFEITS.—The Editor of the Springfield Republic was lately shown an altered note, which several judges of money had failed to detect. It looked like a five on the State Bank of Ohio—but was, in fact, half of a one, and half a five, pasted together. The easiest way of detecting this kind of currency is by glancing at the red backs. In all unaltered notes of the State Bank, both ends are alike. The fives have the world "five" at each end in large letters.—Cin. Com.

CAUTION.—There was another explosion of the kind of fluid-lamp by which Miss Watson was killed on Saturday night at Philadelphia, considerably injuring a lady and damaging furniture.

LOVE TOKENS NOT RECOVERABLE AT LAW.—A discarded swain, having been unsuccessful in his suit in the court of Hymen, lately brought one in a court of law in Massachusetts, for the recovery of a ring, valued at two dollars and fifty cents, constitutional currency, which he had given to the loved one, in "happier days;" but in this suit he was destined to be equally unfortunate, for the jury rendered a verdict for the fair defendant. The beaux will govern themselves accordingly.

LIGHT IN DARKNESS.—The following summary of Missions in Africa, from the Missionary Herald, will surprise and gratify many who think little or nothing has been done to enlighten and elevate that dark region:

There were in all Africa, in 1846, 170 Mission stations, under the direction of the different evangelical denominations of Europe and America; and connected with these were 434 laborers, 17,068 communicants, and 20,090 scholars. The editor says, though the faith of Missionaries and Missionary Societies has indeed been sorely and frequently tried, and many have fallen, particularly on the Western coast, still no one can look at these results and not feel that the Divine favor has been specially enjoyed. And yet only a small portion of Africa has been visited by the heralds of the Gospel. If Southern Africa were cut off and a narrow strip of the Western coast, only two missionary stations would be left on all the vast continent. The same means that have been so successful where used, it may be hoped will give to all Africa her proper place among the nations.

THE STORM!—DREADFUL ACCIDENT!—During the storm of yesterday afternoon, which in force was but little better than a tornado, the upper works of the new government steamer lying at the foot of Butler street, were blown over upon a coal boat near the shore. Mr. D. Stoddart and two other men, who were at work in the coal boat at the time, were crushed beneath the falling mass, injuring them, and, it is feared fatally. It was said that Mr. S. could not survive his injuries.—Cin. Com. of the 10th inst.

Geological Wonders.

The Richmond Watchman of a late date, says:

"Some twenty or thirty feet below the level of the plain around Richmond, occurs one of the most remarkable deposits in this country, or in any country. The place in which we have found it most fully developed, is where the small brook at the east end and on the north side of Clay st., empties into Shockoe Creek. On the bank of that Brook, will be seen a stratum from 10 to 15 feet thick, which most persons would call white clay. But Professor W. B. Rogers of the University,—the State Geologist,—has ascertained that it is made up almost entirely of the skeletons of Animaiculæ or Infusoria—that is, microscopic animals. These skeletons, consisting of silex, are incredibly small; so that each cubic inch of this infusorial Earth, contains many thousand millions of them! How inconceivably numerous, therefore, must they be, to form a deposite at least ten feet thick, and extending many miles over the adjoining country!

It has excited great interest among the learned naturalists of Europe, as well as of our own country; and henceforth none of them will visit Richmond, without searching at once for this deposit. Professor Ehrenberg, of Prussia, the most eminent of living microscopists, has examined specimens from this place, and discovered at least 130 species (I speak from recollection only) of these minutest of animals in them. To discover them in this almost impalpable dust, requires a powerful microscope; and doubtless, therefore, many who look at specimens with the naked eye, will be very incredulous as to these statements. But they are considered as established facts by the scientific world."

The collectors of the United States in favor of Ireland, amount thus far, it is estimated, to more than $400,000.

A Large Fire occurred at Columbus, Ga., on the 6th inst. Loss, about $16,000. Mr. Goetches was the heaviest sufferer.

DR. LOCKE.—The Gazette states that Dr. Jackson, the United States Geological Surveyor of Mineral Land Districts in Michigan, has assigned to Dr. John Locke of this city, a district lying between Lake Michigan and Superior, including Michilimachinac and the Sault Ste. Marie. A better selection than DR. L. could not have been made. The Doctor left here last week for his field operations, and expected to meet Dr. Jackson and his party at Sandusky or Detroit. It is understood that Dr. Jackson will make his headquarters at Copper Harbor, and himself explore Isle Royale.—Cin. Com.

AN OCCURRENCE ON THE RAILROAD.—The down passenger train on Wednesday morning, three miles below Pottsville, ran over a cow that suddenly started across the track. The engine, after running two hundred yards off the track, was thrown on one side and upset, and the tender was precipitated over a steep embankment on the other side. Fortunately the connecting bolt broke, that tied the latter to the baggage car, else it would have dragged all the cars after it. No one was hurt. Some thirty yards of track was disturbed. In half an hour new rails and a host of men came, the cars were put on the track and taken back to the depot, and we left the men busy dismantling the engine. Soon the train passed down again with its passengers, and not a fragment remained to mark the place of the disaster.—Philadelphia Ledger.

WHITEWATER CANAL.—The Cambridge city (Ind.) Reveille, of the ninth inst., states that the repairs on the Whitewater canal are progressing rapidly: the whole work is under contract, and a heavy force is employed along the line. We are informed that all repairs will be completed by the 10th of July, at which time the water will be let into the canal. The water will be let in at Cambridge City about the 16th inst., when the person having the contract will commence repairing the feeder dam, and complete it in a few days. The people along this line of canal will be much gratified to hear that they will have an opportunity of sending their summer and fall crops to market through this channel. The resumption of business affairs will be good for the business portion of our citizens, especially those living in the lower part of the city.—Cin. Com.

DEATH OF A VENERABLE LADY.—Ruth Griswold, who settled at Worthington, Ohio, in 1803, from Hartford County, Conn., died at that place, in her 80th year. When she came to Worthington, her father occupied the only cabin in the place, the whole surrounding country being a dense forest. Mrs. G. was an exemplary person and for sixty years a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church.—Cin. Com.

TRICKS OF THE TRADE.—Are our citizens aware of the fact that, in purchasing strawberries they do not, in many cases get the amount for which they pay? A measure that will hold a quart of water will not hold a quart of strawberries, is a well known fact; and in proportion as the diameter is reduced, (although made up by depth,) the buyer loses. We have been assured by an old and respectable tinner of this city, that the quart measures used by a large number of the strawberry dealers of this city, were made for the purpose, and fall short one sixth in measuring a quart of berries—although they are capable of containing a full quart of liquid. This kind of petty swindling ought to be exposed and punished. The sixth of a quart of strawberries, it is true, don't amount to much; but, in a moral sense, the rascality is as great, and as richly meriting punishment, as though the swindling extended to the sixth of a wagon-load. It is about as mean to steal a chicken as it is to steal a horse.—Cin. Com.

RELIEF FOR IRELAND.—The following is the cargo on board the ship Macedonian, which sailed from New York on Saturday, for Ireland and Scotland, contributed for the relief of the suffering poor in those countries:—30 pkgs. clothing, 200 tcs. rice, 6 do. peas, 1,132 bags oats, 1,115 do. corn, 85½ bbls. corn, 2,103 bags beans, 122 bbls. beans, 1,047 bags meal, 5,179 bbls. meal, 8 do. rye, 7 do. potatoes, 4 do. beef, 6 do. pork, 13 do. flour, 10 chests tea.—*Balt. Western Intelligence.

FROM COUNCIL BLUFF.—Passengers who arrived at St. Louis on the 4th inst. from the Bluffs a few days previous, report the Indians in that neighborhood to be very warlike and insubordinate. The Sioux, Pawnees, Otoes, and Omahs, are constantly raising war parties to molest each other. On the 26th ult., a party of seven Sioux came down in the neighborhood of the Otoes, and laid in ambush near a field of corn. They fired upon three squaws who were going near the field, and killed two of them—the other squaw escaped and gave the alarm.

The warriors pursued the Sioux, and chased them into an extensive weed brake. The Otoes surrounded the brake and set it on fire, and, as the Sioux were driven out by the flames, they were all killed by the infuriated Otoes.

The Mormons are represented to have gone into farming on a large scale at the Bluffs. Sickness was prevailing among them to a great extent.

GREAT FIRE AT TRENTON, N. J.—The Philadelphia North American, of yesterday, says—"Our correspondent, at Trenton, informs us that, at 7½ o'clock last evening, there was a tremendous fire raging at the rolling mill, in South Trenton, and it is probable that, before now, the whole of that extensive establishment, and many of the surrounding buildings have been consumed."

Professor Gouraud, the artificial memory man, died in New York on Wednesday last. He made $20,000 in a single winter by delivering his lectures; yet bad speculations and a long sickness left him in a condition bordering on indigence.—His wife died about a month ago.

The Post-Office Law has been construed by some individuals, so as to warrant the sending of transient newspapers free of postage. This arose, we understand from the Union, from an error in punctuation in the pamphlet edition of the laws. Transient newspapers are subject to a postage of three cents pre-paid. The Postmaster General has instructed the Postmasters to forward, without the pre-payment, all papers sent from the office of publication.—Baltimore Sun.

FATAL RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—Mr. William B. Harris, of Ohio, was killed on the Norwich Railroad, at Oxford depot, Tuesday afternoon. He suddenly threw himself before the engine of the steamboat train from Boston as it was approaching the depot.—Providence (R. I.) Transcript.

FANNY WRIGHT was, at late dates, lecturing in London; her subject, "The Mission of England considered with reference to the civilizational History of Modern Europe, and denouement of the Difficulties of the hour."

"But out of the 4,000 or 5,000 that left since Sunday, at least two thousand will fall sick somewhere before three weeks are over. They ought to have accommodation for 2,000 sick, at least, in Montreal and Quebec, as all the Cork and Liverpool passengers, are half dead from starvation before embarking; and the least bowel complaint, which is sure to come with change of food, finishing them without a struggle. I never saw people so indifferent to life. They would continue in the same berth with a dead person until the seamen or captain dragged out the corpse with boat hooks.

"Good God! what evil will befall the city wherever they alight? Hot weather will increase the evil."

The Montreal Herald of Saturday remarks:

"Dr. Douglas's apprehensions are already fulfilled here. Our marine hospital is filling up fast —236 patients in it this morning, and there is only room for 300. Sheds are being erected on the vacant ground adjoining that building. Several deaths have occurred in the hospital."

The N. York Commercial of Tuesday afternoon, says:

"We learn from a gentleman who arrived from Quebec this morning, that at Grosse Isle on Saturday, the 5th inst., there were sixty funerals, and on Monday, the 7th, one hundred and sixty.— There were about fifteen thousand immigrants on board vessels at anchor, fifteen hundred of whom were sick on the island. In Montreal and Quebec, advertisements were posted upon the walls for seventy nurses."

POST-OFFICE CASE.—The Syracuse (N. York) Democrat, some time since noticed a suit brought by Mr. T. C. Hicks, of that place, against the Postmaster there, for the recovery of a paper charged with letter postage, by reason of being endorsed with a single initial. The case was tried before Justice Woolworth, and a judgement rendered for the plaintiff. It was carried by the P. Master to the Common pleas on certiorari, where it was tried last week, and the judgment affirmed. The case, we believe, goes to the Supreme Court. Gardner and Burdick, attorneys for plaintiff; S. D. Dillaye for postmaster.

UNFORTUNATE ACCIDENT.—A young man, the brother of Mr. Algeo, of the firm of Algeo & Maguire, the fashionable tailors on Liberty street, was drowned in the Allegheny last Saturday afternoon. He fell out of a sail boat, below St. Clair street bridge, and was drowned in full view of several men at work on rafts and boats near by, none of whom endeavored to save him. He was a young man of great excellence of character, and was only seventeen years of age. His mother is a widow lady, and he leaves a brother and sister in extreme distress at his early and melancholy fate. The body was recovered, and an inquest held—verdict in accordance with these facts.—Pittsburgh Commercial Journal.

THE CHURCH AND THE WAR.—The following resolutions were adopted by the Old School Presbyterian Assembly at its recent session in Richmond:

Resolved, That in view of the present posture of our National affairs, the continuance of the war, and its dreadful results, it be earnestly recommended to all our Churches to humble themselves before Almighty God, with confession of their own sins of the people, and to engage in fervent and continued prayer—that as individuals and as a nation we may be forgiven; that there may be a speedy, righteous and amicable adjustment of all existing difficulties with other nations; and that we may be permitted to enjoy, without interruption, the blessings, of peace.

Resolved, That all pastors and all others preaching steadily, be requested to bring this subject before the several Churches in which they minister, on the second Sabbath of June, or as soon after as it may be convenient, and to urge upon our people the duty pointed out in the foregoing resolution.

POSTAGE ON TRANSIENT NEWSPAPERS.—By a recent decision of the Post Master General all newspapers, placed in the mails from the publication office—whether to transient or regular subscribers—will be sent to their destination without pre-payment of postage. Sent otherwise, however, than from publication offices, the postage must be pre-paid, and the rate of course, being fixed by law, is still three cents.

The Washington Union has the following on the subject:

"Though it was evidently the intent of Congress to continue the policy of favoring publishers as well as subscribers, yet, as it would be impossible for the postmasters to decide who were or were not subscribers, the Postmaster General has felt it his duty to instruct postmasters to forward in the mails, without pre-payment, all newspapers coming from the office of publication.

A GRATEFUL WOMAN.—A person applied to a pious woman, requesting her husband to become bound for an amount which, if ever demanded, would sweep away all his property. On her replying, "my husband will attend sir, whenever you may appoint," a bystander asked her: "Do you know what you are engaging to do; and that perhaps this may be the means of leaving you destitute? She replied—"Yes, I do; but that gentleman found us in the greatest distress, and by his kindness we are surrounded by comforts, now should such an event take place he will only leave us where he found us."

POETRY.

Written for the Western Recorder.

The Mexican Maid.

"Sir: I have read in some account of your battle of Monterey, of a lovely Mexican girl, who, with the benevolence of an angel in her bosom, and the robust courage of a hero in her heart, was busily engaged during the conflict, amid the clash of falling houses, the groans of the dying, and the wild shriek of battle, in carrying water to slake the burning thirst of the dying and wounded. While bending over a wounded American soldier, a cannon ball struck her and blew her to atoms."—Corwin's Speech.

O, mighty war, a thousand times,
Thou hast been sung in thousand rhymes;
A thousand famous lofty lays,
Have sung thy heroes' glorious praise!
* * * * * *
Thou demon,
Ignoble save for sacred freedom;
For that, 'tis noble, good to war:
O, Washington, immortal star!

Alas, 'twas on one bloody day,
That nations met in sad array;
And there were wounds and ghastly sighing,
And many—many, there were dying,
And many in the horrid slaughter,
Sighed for a cooling draught of water.

There was a lovely Celtic maid,
In plain habiliments arrayed,
Who, while the battle still resounded,
Did carry water to the wounded.

Alas! her sweet benevolence,
Met with a gory recompense.
Good wight, thou lov'dst thine enemies,
And there's beyond the stormy skies,
A register of all, amidst
That battle scene, thou kindly did'st:—
Who help'd to make thy country bleed,
For him was thy last noble deed!
Good maid, forever sweetly rest,
In heavenly world forever blest!

O, woman hath a feeling sense;
She hath such sweet benevolence,—
* * * * * *
Dispensing grateful joy and life,
Like yonder sun, with blessings rife.

The Lord our God rides on the storm,
Shines in the sun so bright and warm,
And blazes in the thunder's arrow,—
He sees man fall, and sees the sparrow;
He looks o'er all, he cares for all,
He is their rise, he marks their fall:
And as he finds good in his sight,
He gives a meed to wrong or right,
And when, dear sir, that meed is given,
'Tis just, and weal or woe from heaven.

Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church.

NO. I.

Mr. Editor.—There can arise no disadvantages, I conclude, to the members, preachers, or ministers of any denomination of christians, to attempt to set forth with candor, the peculiarities of the Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church. It must not be concealed, however, that few things give greater offence to some persons, than to presume to expose any portions of their regulations pertaining to church government, which are believed to come in conflict with justice. These persons suppose every one who possesses so great an amount of effrontery, to be a personal enemy; and conclude, he wishes only to aggrandize his own branch of the church, at the expense of theirs. I have been of the opinion, and have discovered no grounds for a change, that he is my best friend who will, in a proper spirit, discover unto me, any errors into which I have fallen; and, if I show an aversion to the investigation of any position I have taken, I, at once, in effect, declare I have discovered it not to be tenible; and that I do not wish others to make the discovery which I, myself, have already made. Truth can never suffer by fair investigation.

The declarations of the Methodist Protestant Church fully authorise the conclusion, that she invites the investigation of her pretensions to correct principles; and that she will, at earliest period practicable, make any alterations either in her constitution or discipline, which may be found to be erroneous. If I correctly understand her declaration, if any, within her pale, are found to oppose this, they cannot be said to have imbibed the true principles of Methodist Protestantism. Without intending any offence to others, I here take the liberty to state, there is no church government which has fallen under my notice, which, I believe, surpasses in correctness of principles, that of the Methodist Protestant Church. Many however, have been, and still are at a loss to account for the propriety of the organization of this church; especially, when they reflect that at the time it was effected, and long before, the Methodist Episcopal Church was in existence; and that both of these branches of the church believe and preach the same doctrines; hold class meetings, and love feasts; have annual, and general conferences; have class leaders, exhorters, preachers, deacons, elders and stewards; with circuits and stations, and local and circuit preachers. Where, then, they enquire, the necessity of a separate organization? To answer this interrogative, I shall be under the necessity of presenting some of the reasons assigned by the Convention of the Methodist Protestant Church; which will, no doubt, be much more satisfactory, than any I can advance. On the 5th page of the "Historical Preface," Third Edition of the Constitution and Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church, the convention says, "At the close of the year 1784, the Methodist societies, in these United States, were organized by a conference of preachers exclusively, into what is called the Methodist Episcopal Church, and made independent of Mr. Wesley. The government was so framed by the conference, as to secure to the itinerant ministers the unlimited exercise of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the church, to the entire exclusion of all other classes of ministers, and all the people." On the 5th, and 6th, pages it is stated, in 1824, "Numerous petitions were presented to that body," (the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church,) "praying for a representation of ministers and laymen in the rule making department; but no change, either in the principle or in the practical operations of the government could be obtained." Sometime during the spring of the year 1826, the Baltimore Union Society, recommended state conventions to be held in the several states, for the exclusive purpose of making inquiry into the propriety of preparing one united petition to the approaching general conference of 1828, praying for REPRESENTATION; and to elect delegates to meet in general convention for the purpose." These measures, instead of producing the desired effect, brought down the displeasure of the men in power; and, in 1827, "Even ministers were suspended, and finally expelled from the Methodist Episcopal Church in this" (Baltimore) "city, and twenty two laymen, for being members of the union society, and supporters of the mutual rights." "This convention prepared a memorial to the General Conference of May 1828, praying that the government of the church might be made representative, and more in accordance with the mutual rights of the ministers and people. To this memorial, the General Conference replied, in a circular, by claiming for the itinerant ministers of their church, an exclusive divine right to the same unlimited and unamenable power which they had exercised over the whole church, from the establishment of their government in 1784." Then follows a brief history of the afflictions and expulsions of those who favored a change in the government of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Those, who are desirous to obtain correct information, may, from the foregoing quotations, perceive why it became necessary that there should be a separate organization. The Methodist Protestants discovered that in the Methodist Episcopal Church, none but the itinerant ministers were allowed to participate in the enactment of laws for the government of this church; that this power was taken without the consent, either of the people, or of the local ministers. The ministers of this church say, in the seventh edition of their discipline, published in Philadelphia by Joseph Crookshank, in 1791. Sec. 2d. "We therefore have constituted ourselves into an Episcopal Church, under the direction of Bishops, Elders, Deacons, and Preachers, according to the forms of ordination annexed to our prayer book, and the regulations laid down in the form of discipline." The whole power being in the hands of the itinerant ministers, and they, after repeated respectful petitions having been presented to their General Conferences, refusing to afford any relief, and the Reformers not discovering the most distant prospect of any change in their sentiments, there was no other prudent course for them, whose petitions had been rejected, but either to submit to those in power, and place themselves in a position where they must, from the views it was known they conscientiously entertained, incessantly remain under their suspicions and displeasure, or to proceed to organize another Methodist Church, upon the principles which they contended were correct. Here, then, are a portion of the reasons why a distinct organization became necessary. And I remark. If our Methodist Episcopal brethren were justifiable, in 1784, for the reasons they assign in the same section in said edition of their discipline, published by Mr. Crookshank, in seceding from the Church of England, and organizing themselves into an independent church, as they say, "We are thoroughly convinced, that the Church of England, TO WHICH WE HAVE BEEN UNITED, is deficient in several of the most important parts of christian discipline; and that (a few ministers and members excepted) it has lost the life and power of religion. We are not ignorant of the spirit and designs it has ever discovered in Europe, of raising to pre-eminence and worldly dignities by virtue of a national establishment, and by the most servile devotion to the will of temporal powers: and we fear, the same spirit will lead the same church in these United States (though altered in its name) to similar designs and attempts; and particularly, to obtain a national establishment, which we cordially abhor as the great bane of truth and holiness, and consequently a great impediment to the progress of vital christianity. For these reasons, we have thought it our duty to form ourselves into an independent Church." And in addition to this, if, after the solemn engagements these ministers had laid themselves under to obey the commands of Mr. Wesley during his life, they were, in 1787, justifiable in seceding from him, and casting off his authority, because they deemed it inexpedient to obey his injunctions; which were, that they should ordain Mr. Freeborn Garretson a superintendent for Nova Scotia, and Mr. Richard Whatcoat a joint Superintendent with Mr. Asbury, in these United States. "When this business was brought before the conference, most of the preachers objected, and would not consent to it; the reasons against it were, 1. That he (Mr. Whatcoat) was not qualified to take charge of the connection. 2. They were apprehensive that if Mr. Whatcoat was ordained, Mr. Wesley would likely recall Mr. Asbury, and he would return to England. "Dr. Coke contended we were obliged to receive Mr. Whatcoat, because we had said in the minutes at the Christmas Conference when we were first formed into a church in 1784, during the life of the Rev. Mr. Wesley we acknowledge ourselves his sons in the gospel, ready in matters belonging to church government to obey his commands." "The preachers at last agreed to depart from this engagement which some of the elder brethren had entered into." The conference refused to ordain Mr. Garretson, unless he would agree not to return to the United States. J. Lee's Short History of the Methodists, pages 126 & 127. For the engagement to which Dr. Coke alludes, see page 95, of the same. I say, if our Methodist Episcopal ministerial brethren were justifiable in seceding from the Church of England, and then from Mr. Wesley, the father and founder of methodism, for the reason, here shown, and which they assign, and in organizing themselves into an independent Church; how much more were our Methodist Protestant brethren justifiable, for the causes which they present, in seceding from them, who had, themselves, been seceders twice, for far more inconsiderable reasons?

It has too often been inculcated, but generally by those interested in heaping odium upon them, that the principal reason why the Methodist Protestants seceded from their Episcopal brethren was, they could not, while associated with their former friends, acquire power, and rise to eminence. But when the names of "Shinn, Snethen," and others, are known to have been associated with the first Methodist Protestant seceders, this calumny shrinks back into its native darkness. That there may have been, and still may be men associated with the Methodist Protestant Church, whose only object is the applause of men, and the acquisition of power, candor requires us to admit; but truly, those ministers who understand the Methodist Protestant Constitution and discipline, and intend, honestly, to carry out their provisions, who have united themselves to this church, expecting to obtain power, have taken a most singular step to be put in the possession of this appendant. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

BY ERASTUS BROOKS.

It would be more difficult to tell when John Q. Adams was not in public life, and more difficult to state the honors he has not enjoyed from his countrymen, than those which he has. No child was ever blessed with a nobler father, or a purer mother, than John Quincy Adams. The father was one of the foremost and bravest spirits of the revolution, and the mother had all the heroism and intelligence of the worthiest women of her age and time. She was the daughter of the Rev. William Smith, of Weymouth, and one of two sisters, both of whom were remarkable and exemplary women, the one marrying Hon. Richard Cranch, of Quincy, father of the present Chief Justice Cranch, of Washington, and the other the Rev. Mr. Shaw, one of the old and honorable Congregational Ministers of New England. Of the father I need not speak, and of the mother I will only add, that those who will read her published letters to her husband, son and niece, will pronounce the author of the truths and wisdom therein embodied, worthy of the highest eulogium language can bestow. Nor shall I attempt—for time and space would fail me—to enumerate more than the most public events in the career of Ex-President Adams.

Mr. A. is fast verging on four score years, having been born on the 11th of July, 1767. Nearly sixty years of this time, in one way or another, he has been in public life, and has filled the highest offices,—and almost all grades of office,—known either to our National or State Governments. He was cradled almost in the Revolution, and lived through it, of necessity, not only an active spectator, but sometimes a participator,—and that not in an humble way,—in some of its most important events. Ten years after he was born, and in the midst of the Revolution, he accompanied his father to Europe. It was John Adams, Benj. Franklin, and Arthur Lee, as is known, who composed the Commission at Versailles. John Q. Adams was absent but eighteen months, and during this time improved himself in the study of French and Latin, and other branches of learning. Old John Adams landed in Boston, in August, '79, in the very density of the darkness of the Revolution. He was not permitted to remain longer than three months at home, the scene for the greatest service being then upon the European side of the Atlantic, as a negotiator with powers friendly to the United States, and with those like France, who were hostile to England. Again the son accompanied the father to Europe, and at a time, too, when the ocean was almost dotted with English ships in search of every thing American, or friendly to the independent colonies which could be found. It was during this voyage that old John Adams was placed in charge of Commodore Tucker, one of the thunder-bolts of old ocean, and every bit as brave as Paul Jones, or any of the fabled heroes of the sea. The little vessel of the gallant Commodore had many a hair-breadth escape from capture, but the master was determined never to yield without a struggle, no matter what force might attack him. At one time real danger was at hand, and the life of Adams was deemed as precious as the great mission he had in charge. Tucker insisted, therefore, that Adams should, as the Ambassador of the country, keep out of harm's way. The Minister tried, but in vain, to obey orders, for no sooner was there real danger at hand, than he was foremost in the fight, and so impatient of restraint, as to mingle with the humblest sailors, in defence of the ship. Adams, however, arrived safely out, and Holland for a time became the scene of his labors. He was a beggar at the footstool of thrones and principalities, for means to carry on the war of his country with England and among kings, noblemen and aristocratic bankers, for it was not easy then to obtain "the sinews of war" at home or abroad. Ours was a young nation in the New World, and the most powerful nation in the Old, denounced us as traitors and rebels. But against all odds our fathers faithfully struggled, patiently endured, and in the end gloriously triumphed. It was in such a school as this that John Quincy Adams was taught, and with a mother to guide him who loved to instil into his mind those principles of true religious and civil liberty, higher than which no nation or body of men ever aimed to obtain. He was surrounded, too, often by the great and good men of the Revolution. These, the companions of his father, were his great moral exemplars. He was favored beyond this with the companionship of some of the most distinguished men of the Old World. John Adams, even at this time, when his son was not eighteen years of age, in one of his letters, spoke of him with the affection and respect of a true father, in these words: "The strict and inviolate regard you have ever paid to truth, gives me pleasing hopes that you will not swerve from her motives, but add justice, fortitude, and every manly virtue, which can adorn a good citizen, do honor to your country, and render your parents supremely happy, and particularly your affectionate mother."

Young Adams soon visited many parts of Europe. He was put to school alternately at Paris, Amsterdam and Leyden, and afterwards accompanied Francis Dana, in 1781, to St. Petersburg, where he acted as the Private Secretary of our Minister. He returned home, after visiting Northern Europe, Germany, in part, Holland, France and England. It was his good fortune to be with his father at the signing of the Treaty of Peace, in Paris in 1783. At London he was favored as few can hardly ever again be favored as a listener to the eloquence of Burke, Sheridan, Fox, Pitt, a galaxy of names that no one English Parliament before, or since, has ever exhibited. All these men at this time were in the zenith of their power. Pitt stood at the head of the British Ministry, with his three great rivals arrayed against him.—This was before young Adams was 20 years of age. Indeed soon after he was 18, he entered Harvard College, far advanced in his studies, and in 1787, graduated and turned his attention, at once, and with great assiduity, to the law, a profession on which at one time he thought he should have to depend for the means of support. He studied vigorously under Theophilus Parsons, once a distinguished Chief Justice, in Massachusetts. He became at this time apparently ambitious of fame, and distinguished himself particularly with his pen, in his opposition to some popular essays from the famous Thomas Paine. Later in life, he was the public defender of Washington, for the course pursued by the "father of his country," towards the then singular Minister from France, the famous Genet. His first honors came from the hands of the first President, and under all Administrations, since then he has held conspicuous positions derived from the people, the State or from the Federal Government. Washington sent him to the Netherlands under the recommendation of Thomas Jefferson, who afterwards also gave him a distinguished post abroad.

The conflict with the father would not allow Mr. Jefferson to be alienated from the son. Mr. Adams, therefore, went hither and thither at the call of his Government, and was ever ready to go where he could do the most good. Now at the Court of Holland, and again at the Court of St. James, to-day hurrying off to Berlin, and to-morrow pursuing his course to Portugal, this year an important negotiator with Prussia, the next serving in the Legislature of his State, the third a Senator in Congress, the fourth a Professor of Oratory and Rhetoric in his old Alma Mata, and soon after again, flying upon the wings of the wind, again for distant Russia, as the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Government. It was Mr. Adams who incited the Emperor of Russia to mediate as a friendly power for the restoration of peace between the Governments of England and the United States. It was he, too, who was one of the Commissioners (with Clay and Gallatin) to negotiate the treaty of peace, which was signed at Ghent, in December, 1814. His father, in his presence, had signed the first treaty of peace at Paris, and it was his good fortune to sign the second treaty himself at Ghent. Honors still followed him. Mr. Madison appointed him Ambassador to England, which office he held, until Mr. Monroe at the commencement of his Administration, called him home, not to retirement, but to be his Secretary of State—an office which all will admit he filled with the most marked ability. Still his course was onward and upward, and when Mr. Monroe served out his two terms, he became his successor in the Presidential Office, receiving the votes of thirteen States, which was then the requisite number in the House of Representatives, as one of the three competitors who had failed to be elected by the people.

Since then the career of Mr. Adams has been too familiar to need comment at my hands. There are various opinions, too, as to the propriety of his course, and the justice of his sentiments.—Desiring not to discuss party or sectional questions in these sketches, I prefer to leave the subject of this sketch just where it is, only adding that Mr. Adams was elected to Congress in 1831, that he has been a member ever since, and that he will in all probability die at his post, and with the harness on his back. Most heartily do I believe him to be governed by the purest patriotism and the highest sense of honor. Those who differ from him,—and there are few men who have not widely differed from him at times,—are bound to concede this. To praise his vast amount of intelligence, whether the result of his observation or study, or whether appertaining to political, historical or biblical knowledge, would be 'the wasteful and ridiculous excess of gilding refined gold.' The life of such a man is one of the best incidents that illustrate our nation's history, and as such it ought to be cherished as a precious legacy, by the American people.

Madriver Railroad.

We passed from the lake to the present terminus of this Road, during our late absence, and found the improvement and the affairs of the company, in much better condition than we anticipated.

Beyond Tiffin, the company is relaying the road, and putting it in first rate travelling order. This side of Tiffin, the track is excellent, and the train made "express" time. Leaving Sandusky city about 6 o'clock, we were at Richland, the present terminus, in time for a late dinner, distance ninety-two miles. When the repairs on the upper part of the track are completed, and the work extended to Urbana, we are satisfied that the distance, 120 miles, will be made in seven hours. We shall even then, without waiting to close up the gap at this point, make the passage from the lake to the river by daylight.

While at Sandusky city, we visited the shops of the company, and found a large number of men engaged in car building and other work required by the business of the Road. The shops had just turned out a handsome car, so arranged as to carry the baggage, and, upon an exigency, accommodate a number of passengers.

A great part of the present line passes through a broad and extensive forest; and yet the company has more business than its facilities enable it to transact. As this unopened country becomes settled and cultivated, the business of the Road will be increased an hundred fold, and its stock will become among the most valuable in the Union. The company is looking forward to an extension of business, and making requisite preparations for it. They have now five Locomotives busily engaged, and are daily looking for two new and powerful engines from Paterson N. J. They have one hundred freight cars in use, which number will be increased to one hundred and seventy five by the first of September. The daily receipts of the company are about $350, which will be increased to $500 when the road is finished to Bellefontaine. The receipts of the months of February, March, April, and half of May, show an increase of more than $20,000 over the corresponding period in 1846.

The road is now used to Richland, ninety-two miles. It is almost completed to Bellefontaine, ten miles further; and it will, in a month be extended to West Liberty, twenty-four miles north of Springfield.

At Bellefontaine and West Liberty, private enterprise is anxiously awaiting the incoming of the road. Handsome and roomy warehouses are already erected, and doubtless will soon be crammed with the products of that fertile region of the state. —Springfield Republic, May 28.

Elijah Burbank, aged 85, died at the residence of his son, Col. Burbank, in William st., Brooklyn. At the early age of sixteen he served in the war of the Revolution, and fought bravely with many others in "the day which tried men's souls." He was highly respected by all who knew him, and leaves a large circle of relatives and friends to lament his death. They are fast passing away, those brave old patriots. In a few years more they will all be gathered to the "homes of their fathers."

Sufferings of the Mormons in California.—The St. Louis Republican, of May 19, says that in looking over a file of the Californian, brought to this city by the party of gentlemen who recently arrived from that quarter, we met with the following account of the condition of a party of Mormons, who were emigrating from this section of the country to California. We copy from a paper of the 13th of February:—

The brig Francisca, three days from Yerba Buena, brings news of the extreme suffering of a party of emigrants who left the other side of the California mountain, about sixty in all, nineteen of whom started to come into the valley. Seven only have arrived, the remainder died, and the survivors were kept alive by eating the dead bodies. Among the survivors are two young girls.—A public meeting was held at Yerba Buena, and about eight hundred dollars raised for the relief of the sufferers who still remain in the mountain. Messrs. Ward and Smith kindly offered the use of their launch, and a party, under the direction of Passed Midshipman Woodworth, have left, with the intention of disembarking at the foot of the mountain, and then going on foot, with packs of provisions. It is to be hoped they will succeed in reaching them with sufficient provisions to get them in. Such a state of things will probably never again occur, from the fact that the road is now better known, and the emigrants will hereafter start and travel so as to cross the mountain by the 1st of October.

Shocking Accident.—On the 13th inst. Mr. Charles Gackenback, a very respectable citizen of Upper Macungry township, Lehigh county, came to his death in a most shocking manner.—He left home in the morning, with a four horse team, and came to Allentown, for the purpose of procuring some building timber. Having loaded his wagon, he started for home. When about a half a mile from town, while descending Griesemer's Hill, the gearing of his long coupled wagon caused the lock to fly out of the notches. He immediately ran back, and a second time drew up the lock, with all his strength; by this time the heavy load of the wagon had pressed so hard against the horses that they took fright, the bar block flew out, and off they ran at full speed.—Before the horses broke into a full run, however, he succeeded in seizing the saddle horse by the bridle, in which act he is supposed to have become entangled in the check-line, thrown upon the ground, and after being dragged more than a perch, finally run over by two wheels of the wagon. The wheels passed from behind his ears to his forehead, completely severing his skull, and causing instant death. He was a sober and industrious citizen, respected by all who knew him.—He leaves a family of four small children, and a bereaved widow, to mourn an irreparable loss.—His age is said to be about thirty-six years.

Popery Renounced.—The Dublin Evening Journal gives an account of the public recantation of popery, on Sunday, March 7, by twelve persons, nine men and three women. Two of the men were priests—Rev. Nicholas Beatty, D. D., late superior of the convents in Drogheda, Athlone, Waterford, and Mullifarnham; and Rev. Patrick Brennan, late parish priest of Creeve, Diocese of Elphin. Dr. Beatty thinks there is no doubt that many of his former brethren will follow his example of shaking off the unscriptural yoke of Rome. The occasion seems to have been one of uncommon interest, and drew together a large number of spectators.—Sabbath Recorder.

The Washington (Pa.) Patriot says that a small colonoy of emancipated slaves passed through that place on their way to Ohio. There were forty-nine of them, and they stated that they had been emancipated on the Saturday previous, by their owner, Esq. Cochran, in Hampshire county, Va., who gave them $500 to pay their expenses, and started them off for Ohio, There appeared to be three or four families of them, and they were well equipped for travelling—a four-horse wagon carrying the furniture, and another wagon the women and children. They were bound for Fayette county, Ohio.

Madriver Road.—In our notice last week of this work, we mentioned that two new locomotives were daily looked for. By the following, from the Clarion of the 25th ult., it will be seen that the engines have been safely landed.

Two new Locomotives have just been landed from the brig Emerald, at the wharf of Barney, Gibbs & Co., for the Mad River and Lake Erie Rail Road. They are of the largest class, rating fourteen tons each. They are from the same manufactory as the eleven other locomotives received at this port for our two roads—Rogers Ketchum & Grosvenor, of Patterson, N. J. To carry out the design of naming the engines from the counties the road passes through, these are called Logan and Champaign.—Sandusky Clarion.

Important as cheap fuel may be, to be able to do without it altogether is more important still.—A Hungary chemist, and perhaps a cold one too, has taken some promising steps toward making this possible. He places in contact two iron and one copper cylindrical plates, highly polished, turning on an axis at the end of a lever, with a balance weight at the end of a lever, to keep the plates in contact, when, by means of very simple apparatus and trifling exertion, a glowing red heat may be produced in five minutes, and maintained with ease.

Anti-inflamable.—A physician in Georgia says, that in attempting to prepare gun cotton from a receipt sent him by a brother physician, he was unsuccessful, and found, to his astonishment, that his cotton would neither explode nor ignite, being anti-inflamable. On investigating, to find out the cause, he found out that he had not used the right acid. He repeated the process, and the result was the same; so that he claims to have discovered a method of rendering cotton incombustible. He says that this cotton can be prepared with little expense, as he has tested the matter sufficiently to know; that it can be manufactured into cloth, the lint and texture of the cotton not being in the least injured, but capable of being made into clothing with as much ease as from the common material.—Watchman.

An Angel's Visit.—A young angel of distinction being sent down to this earth on some business, for the first time, had an old courier spirit assigned him as a guide. They arrived over the sea of Martinico, in the middle of the long day of an obstinate fight between the fleets of Rodney and De Grasse. When, through the clouds of smoke, he saw the fire of the guns, the decks covered with mangled limbs, and bodies dead or dying, the ships sinking, burning, or blown into the air, and the amount of pain, misery, and destruction the crews yet alive were dealing around to each other, he turned angrily to his guide and said, "You blundering blockhead, you are ignorant of your business; you undertook to conduct me to the earth, and you have brought me into hell." "No sir," answered the guide, "I have made no mistake; this is really earth, and these are men. Devils never treat one another in this cruel manner; they have more sense and more of what men call humanity."—Franklin.

Where is the Far West?—In a home-missionary meeting recently held at Cincinnati, Ohio, Rev. Mr. Hatfield, of New York, said the people of Cincinnati were no longer in the West. They were in the East. They had solved the problem, Where was the Far West?—They had sent Missionaries—Home Missionaries—round Cape Horn, and half of the globe, to the mouth of the Columbia River in Oregon! They were in the East, and henceforward must expect to help those in the Far West, on the coast of the Pacific!—Sabbath Recorder.

The Sight of the Dying.

The late Abner L. Pentland, of Pittsburgh, remarked, when he was dying, "Mother, I can see a great distance!" Doubtless this is the experience, beautifully expressed, of every one who comes with a chastened faith to a calm death-bed. In his progress through ordinary life, the vapors that float in the mental atmosphere render the vision imperfect, and he cannot see afar off; but as he draws near eternity, the air grows pure, the light brighter, the vision clearer, and the serenity pervades the whole being; the vista of futurity opens upon the eyes of the soul; he beholds the gates of heaven, the river of life, its glad waters kissing the footsteps of the throne of God, the glories of the new world grow brighter and brighter upon him; with Stephen, he holds Jesus at the right hand of his Father; and he dwells with rapture on these enlivened sights, the earth and all its scenery grows dim about him, and like Elisha's servant at the gate of Damascus, he is instantly environed with troops of angels, come to take him up over the everlasting hills in the chariot of the Lord of Hosts.—Vermont Chronicle.

Age of Animals.—A bear rarely exceeds twenty years; a dog lives twenty years; a wolf twenty; a fox fifteen or sixteen; lions are long lived—Pompey lived to the age of seventy. The average of cats is fifteen years; a squirrel or hare seven or eight years—rabbits seven. Elephants have been known to live to the great age of four hundred years. When Alexander the great had conquered one Porus, King of India, he took a great elephant which had fought valiantly for the king, and naming him Ajax, dedicated him to the Sun, and let him go with this inscription: "Alexander, the son of Jupiter, hath dedicated Ajax to the Sun."—This elephant was found with this inscription three hundred and fifty years afterwards. Pigs have been known to live to the age of thirty years. The rhinoceros to 20. A horse has been known to live to the age of sixty-two, but averages twenty-five to thirty. Camels sometimes live to the age of one hundred. Stags are long lived. Sheep seldom exceed the age of ten. Cows live about fifteen years. Cuvier thinks it probable that whales sometimes live one thousand years. Mr. Mallerton has the skeleton of a swan that attained the age of two hundred years. Pelicans are long lived. A tortoise has been known to live to the age of one hundred and seven years.

A SERMON,

ON THE SCRIPTURAL MODE OF CHURCH GOVERNMENT, DELIVERED BEFORE THE INDIANA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, OF THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, OCTOBER 3RD, 1846,

BY REV. SAMUEL MORRISON:

[By request of the Conference.]

AWARDED FOR PUBLICATION BY REQUEST OF THE INDIANA CONFERENCE.

"Walk about Zion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces: that ye tell it to the generations following."—PSALM, 48: 12, 13TH VERSES.

ZION, or the City of David, in the land of Palestine, is used in the Scriptures as a figure to represent the church. There is no work extant in which symbols are so copious, and their selections so beautiful, as in the oracles of inspiration. The passage before us is proof of this last point: for while the language is highly figurative, those figures are calculated forcibly to impress the mind, with the views of the writer. If we consider the literal Zion ornamented with her numerous towers, rising amid the clouds, with spires above the lightning's pathway, and bulwarks bidding defiance to her enemies, causing kings to tremble, and the mighty ones of the earth to turn pale with fear as they passed, and beheld the fastnesses that girt the mountain's brow: Also her gorgeous palaces, of marble, with their gilded domes, their doors of pearl, their exterior, combining all the riches of the East, and yet, conveying but a faint idea of the internal glory, that burst upon the astonished eyes of the beholder; which caused even a Queen to quail, and as the inspired writer has recorded it,) there was no more spirit in her, and that the half had not been told her. Zion is still but a faint representation of the church of the living God. And, as the Psalmist in his view, even in connection with the literal Zion, no doubt, had in his mind, the principles of their policy, as well as that invisible power, which was their sure defence in hours of trial. And, also, in the resolution of Conference, (in obedience to which we offer the following thoughts,) contemplates a view of church government, as found in the Scriptures, arduous as is the task, and inexperienced and unqualified as we are, we hazard our thoughts with a candid public, leaving the event with HIM who was Israel's guard in the wilderness: rendering them as secure in the midst of the sea as when enclosed in Jerusalem's walls.

We will, in the out-set, lay down a few axioms, which we wish to be kept in view in the following investigation:

1st. We are by nature social beings; and it is evident that the Supreme Being in our formation designed, that we should be under some social regulation, by which the general good could be better secured.

2d. That such regulation suppose the existence of some form of government.

3d. Government is the exercise of authority: for the securing and promoting the happiness of those governed; hence any government that has not for its object, the promotion of all possible happiness, is so far wrong.

4th. Every rational being, is by nature, possessed of certain inalienable rights, which constitute his identity: nor can he renounce those rights innocently in the sight of his Creator.

5th. An all-wise Creator will not impose contradictory obligations on his creatures.

6th. In social compact for purposes of government, we are not called on to relinquish our natural rights: they are only directed in a different channel, in order to promote the general good; and to secure our own permanent well-being.

7th. All legitimate authority, or rightful government amongst men must rest upon the will and consent of the governed.

8th. From the relations in life, many of our acts not only affect our cotemporaries, but also have an influence on after generations.

We here subjoin a few terms with their proper significations. They are either directly, or indirectly, connected with the subject before us.

Sovereignty—is the highest power.

Government—is the whole body of constituted authority.

Law—is a rule of action.

Constitution—is the constituted form of government; it is the fundamental law, and must proceed from the people.

Despotism—is that kind of government, where the will of an individual is supreme law.

Monarchy—is where government is in the hands of a single individual; it may be absolute, that is without constitutional restraint, as in Turkey or Russia:—or it may be limited as in England or France. An Aristocracy—is a government in the hands of a few:—the word comes from Aristas, best or wisest, and Krates—power or strength; and supposes that a few of the wisest and best govern.

Democracy—is when the sovereign power is in the hands of the people. Primarily as when the people meet en masse to make their laws, as in Athens, formerly, or secondary when they meet by delegation for the same purpose, as in the United States; both these last are republics.

Legislature—the law-making power.

Executive—that which relates to the administration of law.

Judicial—that which relates to the administration of justice.

The first form of government that arrests our attention in the Scriptures, is the Patriarchal; under this form the father, or principal, exercised the office of prophet, priest, and Governor. As a prophet it was his duty to instruct the members of the family, in the principles of morality and religion, as they had learned it from their ancestors by tradition; as also what they had discovered by deduction or reason; as well as what they had obtained by revelation. Thus the Lord says of Abraham, Gen. 18th ch.: 19th v.: "For I know him, that he will command his children, and his household after him; and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgement; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him."—Also, Joshua pledges for himself and household, Josh. 24th ch.: 15th v.: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." As priests they led in their devotions. Thus we see Cain, Abel, Noah, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, building altars, and offering sacrifices; and, also, Job offering for his sons, Job 10th ch.: 5th v.: and it was so when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all. Those also governed, exercising those rules of moral discipline, which in the age they lived, promoted justice. To these may be added Melchizidec, who was priest of the most high God; Paul says he was by interpretation king of righteousness; and, after that also, king of Salem, which is king of peace. What was the extent, or nature of his kingdom, further, we are not informed, or who were the subjects of his kingdom, a probable conjecture is that he was Shem, the eldest son of Noah, administering a righteous and peaceable government among his numerous descendants, and officiating as their priest. Whether we understand this form of government or not, one thing is certain, that it has the sanction of the highest authority; for satisfaction on this point, see Ex., 20th ch.: 12th v.: Deut. 27th ch.: 16th v.: Prov. 1st ch.: 8th v.: Jer. 35th ch.: 18th, 19th vs.: Mat. 15th ch.: 4th, 6th vs.: Eph. 6th ch.: 2d v. We may innocently indulge a moment, and in our imaginations, view the ancient patriarchs in the evening, seated in their tent doors; or under the shade of the wide-spread Banian; before them, a smoking altar, around them, their sons and daughters, aye, their descendants to the fourth and fifth generation; with their servants, all in deep devotion: in one hand of the patriarch, a censer with its perfumes, the other pointing to the grandeur of the earth, or glories of the heavens, while deep piety warms his breast and fires his tongue, as he instructs those listening with deep interest to those holy lessons, like the dew of Carmel, that fell from his lips.

The second form of government found in Scripture, is a Theocracy; more immediately under Divine direction; either through the medium of prophets, the ministry of angels, or by direct revelation. Israel was under this form as says the prophet, "the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our king, he is our law-giver, and will save us." All the laws of Israel were divine, and given by the hand of Moses: it is true, that in a later period of time, they added the traditions of the elders; but this proved to be their curse. As their judges see at large the provisions of the law, and especially their oracles, the Urim and Thummim, he was their only king, it will be recollected that the oracles were consulted on all important occasions.

The third form we find is a monarchy. It is glanced at, Gen. 10th ch.: 10th v.: at this early period of the world, Nimrod erected a kingdom; he was a mighty hunter, and as one says his prey was man. It is more fully set out in Samuel and in the Book of Kings. There is here something extraordinary. The Israelites assign Samuel's sons as a pretext for their wish to be fashionable, or like the nations around them; but to satisfy ourselves of their wrong, and the displeasure of the Almighty, against one individual, possessing judicial, executive, and legislative powers, we need but turn to Samuel, 8th ch.: 7th v.: and 12th ch.: 16th v. to the close; here the displeasure of the Lord against the investment of irresponsible power, even by the people themselves, who are to be governed, is so strongly set forth, that all the people (not only a few) cry to Samuel and beg for his prayers. What a deep feeling! But now it is too late! The yoke is upon their necks. If such was the displeasure of the most High against Israel, for choosing a king, and placing those powers in his hands, what cause have those to fear consequences, who in "the land of the free and home of the brave!" with the light of the age around them, and the Bible in their hands, have even without the consent of those concerned, laid hold on all those powers, and still hold on to them with unyielding tenacity? Although Israel neglected the Lord as their ruler in determining to have a king; yet, their government remained partly Theocratic; they still consulted the Urim and Thummim, and the prophets failed not to warn and teach them from Samuel to Malachi; and when they and their kings were pious, they were still the favored of the Lord; and although their kings, were sometimes wicked, oppressive, and cruel, yet, this did not change the character of their laws, neither did it altogether destroy the bulwarks with which Zion, or the church was guarded, justice and judgment were still the balances of her sanctuary; and there were many, doubtless, who had not bowed the knee to Baal, who still loved the simplicity of their Theocracy, the beauty of their primitive Democracy. In the fall of Israel much might be learned, while they were content to be unlike the nations around them, living in a Democratic brotherhood, under the special guidance of the Holy Shekinah, they were happy, the envy of the proud and wicked, and a blessing to all the pious and good as far as known. But when they left the law of the Lord, and their ancient simplicity, and being intoxicated with the glare of political pomp, the honors of the world, and the desire of being like others, that is, of becoming popular, and substituting the traditions of the elders for the law of God; their history is replete with sufferings and woe. All the corruptions of depraved human nature seem to be developing themselves; were it possible, we would fain draw the curtain of oblivion over these things: but they are not alone, nor are the Jews in their fiery zeal, with their priests and rulers at their head, persecuting the Redeemer, and his disciples to be considered as an exception, nay, verily, but in all ages where the priests have succeeded in obtaining irresponsible power in their hands, the result has been the same; Bible order set aside; native simplicity subverted; the people enslaved, and persecution has followed, priests, (tell it not in Gath) of God's Holy Word, ministers of peace have, with sword and faggot, carried on an unholy war of extermination for mere opinions' sake. Could these things be ascribed to heathen, the Jews, the dark ages, or the Roman church only, it would not be so painful. But in modern times and among Protestants, the same unhallowed spirit prevails; the ministry, have not only possessed themselves of legislative, judicial, and executive authority, but have claimed it by Divine right, and further they say that their consciences are involved in this matter, perhaps the admission of local ministers or lay-members to their counsels, would have polluted their consciences; yes, from what has passed under our own observation, we fear if some possessed the civil power, the horrors of the holy inquisition (so called) would be enacted in our happy land. In examining this subject we do not find that the priests of the Jews, by virtue of their office, possessed either judicial, executive, or legislative power; mark for instance the young man in the gospel, born blind, the Jews had agreed that if any would confess that Jesus was the Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue. Here first the punishment was neither criminal nor civil, but ecclesiastical; secondly, it was the people who had passed the resolution, and that, too, while the priests wore the ephod, the breast-plate, &c., and surely had as strong claims to a Divine right to legislate, as modern priests can show; their vain, (and shall I not say impious) claim to the contrary notwithstanding. But we would direct our thoughts to the New Testament. First, however, we cannot refrain from noticing the concession of presiding elder A. W., the author of certain letters in the W. C. Advocate. He was preaching in justification of a general Providence, he said that "republican or popular government, was that form approved of by heaven, and that monarchies in any form were only suffered to exist because of the ignorance, and vice that prevailed: that so soon as the people became sufficiently virtuous, and intelligent to maintain and enjoy their freedom, that monarchies would cease to exist." He further stated, "that in the introduction of christianity, there was no specific form of government presented: the church being left free to adopt those rules which might be suited to their convenience or circumstances; that if purely republican (I suppose he meant Democratic) church government were introduced in a monarchy, it would be in bad keeping with the civil institutions, &c." He did not reverse the subject—we would have been glad had he done so. Many appear to think with A. W., that the Scriptures afford no light relative to a form of government for the Christian Church; others on the other extreme, claim Scripture or primitive usage as authority for an oligarchy or a supremacy; but to the law and the testimony. The first passage at Math., 20th ch.: 25th to 28th v.: "But Jesus called them unto him and said, ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great, exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you; but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant; even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." The second is Math. 23d ch.: 8th to 12th v.: "But be ye not called Rabbi; for one is your master, even Christ; and ye are brethren. And call no man your Father upon the earth: for one is your Father which is in heaven. Neither be ye called Masters: for one is your Master, even Christ. But he that is greatest among you, shall be your servant. And whosoever shall exalt himself, shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself, shall be exalted." If this is not clear evidence of a perfect state of equality prevailing in the church of Christ we are at a loss to know what would be proof positive, or sufficient authority. The great Teacher from heaven, says, "It shall not be among you as it is among the Gentiles, exercising authority over one another," but he that would be chief, let him gain this pre-eminence, by humbling himself, to become the servant of all.

And again, "ye shall call no man Master, for ye are brethren." But will it be said, that these expressions refer to the Apostles, and not to the Disciples en masse? And that ministers being set apart to the arduous duties of their calling, have a common sympathy, peculiar to themselves, and that they should be brethren, but still claim a pre-eminence either in one way or another, and although the first passage was called forth by the request of Matthew, James, and John, yet in the latter case he is addressing the multitude and his disciples, and must be understood to embrace all believers, Mark, the second great Commandment, (Matt, 22–39th) "Thou shall love thy neighbor as thyself." This is one of the hinges on which hang the law, and the Prophets,—a command which we cannot fulfil, and claim unwarranted supremacy. Turn your thoughts next to 1st Peter, 5: 1, to 3. Peter, only claims to be also an Elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ. He exhorts his brethren, the Elders, to feed the flock of God, which was among them, taking the oversight (not the rule) thereof, not by constraint, but willingly, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind, neither as being Lords over God's heritage, but examples to the flock. Again, 1st Tim. 1: 6, the Apostle Paul speaks of laying, or putting of his hands on Timothy. At 1 Tim. 4: 14, speaking no doubt of the same circumstance, he calls it the "laying on of the hands of the Presbytery," showing that he, though an Apostle, was a Presbyter, and consequently on an equality with his brethren. We next direct your attention to Acts 1: 23, to the close of the chapter. Here we learn that the whole number of names, was about one hundred and twenty. And they appointed two of their number, one of whom was to be chosen to fill the vacancy in the Apostleship, caused by the apostasy of Judas, and having prayed to God for direction, they "gave forth their lots." They did not cast, or draw lots, but gave forth their lots. The language, we think to be very explicit, and to my mind, it is very clear that they acted much on the principle of balloting. But, mark the high office they are about to fill. It was no less than an Apostle of the spotless Lamb, to be chosen. One of the first Ministers of the New Testament, just sealed with the blood of the Covenant, amidst the smoking-censors, bleeding victims, and trembling altars, and under the waiting promise of their now glorified Master, and while they are looking daily for the descent of the Holy Ghost. Does the Great Head of the Church approve of their conduct? The next thing we hear is, that "they were all with one accord in one place, and suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing night wind, and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost." In all these weighty considerations, the entire membership appear to participate, and have as much to do as any of the Apostles, except that Peter lays the matter before them. In the 6th chapter we have another case. The 2nd verse informs us that the Apostles called the multitude of the disciples to them, and the sequel shows that they exhorted them to "look out among themselves, seven—men of good report, full of the Holy Ghost, and wisdom, whom they might appoint over their business, and the saying pleased the whole multitude, and they chose Stephen, a man full of faith, and the Holy Ghost." Here, in this second election, the disciples met en masse. The language is clear and forcible, it "pleased the whole multitude," &c. He that can swallow this portion of Divine Truth with a Hierarchy in company, surely would not have to make a very great effort, to dispose of a whole caravan of the humpbacked animal. In the 15th chapter, we have another case. At Antioch, a dispute arises about circumcision. They determine to send Paul, Barnabas and certain others, to Jerusalem, "about this question." Then pleased it the Apostles, and Elders, and the "whole church," &c. And they send letters by them after this manner. "The Apostles, Elders, and brethren—send greeting," Keeping up the same view, at verse 28, "For it seemeth good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burthen—than these necessary things." Here as in the 6th chapter, there is made out, a strong case in favor of Primitive Democracy. In the first place the Church at Antioch, (for in no other sense can the pronoun they be understood, than to embrace the whole church,) send their delegates to Jerusalem. In the second place we find the whole church in council, Apostles and Elders, with the whole church; choosing men of their own company—they all act in concert—they choose probably by balloting. We know not, nor is it material as to the mode of their choosing, it is the fact that they did choose, and the persons concerned in that choice, which we are after. In the third place (verse 25,) they avow their unanimity in the whole matter. In the fourth place, the sacred historian informs us that the church thus acting, and writing to their brethren, say, that the Holy Ghost was with them, and consequently approved of, and directed in their course. This is an important case. The first and most important decision ever had in the Christian Church. And yet the whole church, the Apostles, and Elders and brethren, with one accord unite in these important transactions. And although the occasion is so important, and the lay members with their ministers, yet the Holy Spirit is in their midst. They then were acting in accordance with their master's will. How men can with the Bible in their hands and these facts all before them, exclude a large portion of their brethren in the ministry, and the entire membership, from all participation in the deliberations of the church, and yet call their Oligarchy a Divine Institution, is a paradox which we are at a loss to understand. The Saviour says, (John 13, 34,) 'A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love another, as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.' Again he prays (John 17, 20) for the oneness of his entire ch. "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they may also be one in us." In the first instance we cannot conceive how the "new commandment," can be obeyed when claims are preferred or are maintained, that do not exist in the nature and fitness of things. We believe it is impossible for an individual to love another individual, who by force or artifice, takes away any of his natural rights, unless he be either ignorant of the fact, or of his own privileges. And at this time it would be superfluous to argue, that intelligence is strongly enforced by the Bible. But to the prayer of the Redeemer. For what does he pray? That they may be one, as he, and his Father are one. Is there subordination in the Divine Nature? Does the Father exclude the Son, or the Son the Father, from equality in the Godhead? Are these interrogations almost blasphemous? We hope to be pardoned for the boldness of such language, when we think of the thrilling interest embodied in this prayer, in connection with our subject and the glorious unity of the entire church, on the high platform of Christian equality—of one heart and one soul. The Saviour says (Mark 1, 15.) "The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand." Turn to Deut. 2, 34, 35, and read, "Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, that smote the image upon his feet, that were of iron and clay, and broke them to pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold broken to pieces, together, and become like the chaff of the summer threshing floor; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them, and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth." This stone is cut out without hands, there is no human policy in connection with this kingdom. "Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world," John 18: 36. We wish these quotations to be kept in mind, while we turn to Luke 4, 18 as read from Isaiah. "The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath appointed me to preach the gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty, them that are bruised." In this passage, not only the condition of the world is called up, but the world as it is in every aspect. The poor, broken hearted, blind, and bruised captives, are all to be visited with the proclamation of the acceptable year of the Lord, in reference to the Jubilee, or letting the captives or servants go free. Taking all these together, with many other quotations which might be made, we are driven as by an overwhelming tide, to the conclusion, that although this kingdom was to be set up in the world, it was not of the world, but proposes to delivermen from every apprehension, and of course from the Tyrrany of priests.

We find that the precepts of the Saviour, and his Apostles—the practice of the primitive Church, as recorded by St. Luke,—all sustain the equality of the Disciples, not in theory merely, but in fact—in all their business transactions. Were it not beyond our limits, it would be an easy task to show from every accredited Church Historian, that this was the only view taken of this subject, in the early days of Christianity. And it was by adesigning, and corrupt Priesthood that this heaven-born principle of Christian equality, was subverted. Nor need we stop to detail the consequences that followed; yet it is proper to remark, that human nature is the same now that it was then, and while it is clear that a sister branch of the church has gone further in half a century, toward absolute despotism than the Primitive Church did in three centuries, the increased and increasing means of intelligence, is no guarantee against the same results. We may then with awe-stricken spirits listen to the language of the text. "Walk about Zion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces: that ye may tell to the generation following."

The towers, the bulwarks, the palaces, of Our Zion, are the immutable truths,—the holy principles—and hence the unwavering trust in the grace and goodness of God, through Christ, forming that glorious brotherhood, prayed for by the Redeemer. That kingdom—not of this world—that acceptable year of the Lord, where tyrrany and spiritual bondage shall be known no more. The injunction, that you tell it to the generations following,—not only to consider, and have our own hearts warmed with a holy ardor—but to tell it. To whom? To the generations following. How? By hiding these principles under a bushel? No! But by publishing them in all possible ways. Ah! but worldly policy says, by so doing you will incur censure, persecution, &c.; and perhaps, injure the cause you would promote. Be it borne in mind that duty is ours,—consequences belong to God. It was this conviction that sustained the Apostles and Martyrs.—Luther and his coadjutors, thence found the lights of the reformation upon the world. It was this conviction accompanied by a holy devotion to the cause of truth, that enrolled the names of a Snethen—a Shinn a B.—an S.—and others in the galaxy of our own little hemisphere. Yes! My brethren, though you may have much to suffer, &c., much to bear, and in telling to generations following, the glorious truths glanced at above, you may have to weep, to see the duplicity, with which many bow to the tyrrany of priests. Yet if truth, equality, virtue, and sincerity, are of God,—we would say: Fear not, truth must triumph—and though your names may go down ingloriously to the dust, generations now unborn will yet arise and call you Blessed.

Ministers' Department.

From the Episcopal Recorder.

Hint to a Christian Minister.

"Make full proof of thy Ministry." But this you can never do, while you are entangled with Miscellaneous reading and studies. A parish minister should eschew all studies that can in the least hinder him in his daily work.—It is a vain imagination, that while we are employed in the common duties of our office, we are to be preparing for professorships in colleges or other such places. No: When we land in the country where our warfare calls us from the world, we must burn our ships, and never think of returning. In this way, and in this only, can we attain to that concentration of our faculties, which is so necessary to our efficiency in our great work. Not only is there a loss of time in pursuing secular studies: but what is far worse, a wasting of our energies, when all are not too much for our duties. There is a freshness of the animal spirits, wanted in preaching, and in parochial duties, which close studies never long permit. The result may be, and often is, that although we may not quite neglect the particular duties of our spheres, we perform them so languidly, that we rather hinder than help the cause of our Master.

The writer of these lines, when young in the ministry of the gospel, once asked of a very distinguished divine, for some general rule that might assist him in his future work. The answer was: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." And if there is any office where this precept applies, in all its strength, it is our own.

VERBUM SAP.

A WONDERFUL CONVERSION.

There was, some years ago, not far from this place, a very gifted preacher, who for several years preached with great earnestness and success the doctrine of the Cross; but who on that very account was violently opposed. One of his opponents, a well informed person, who had for a long time absented himself from the church, thought, one Sunday morning, that he would go and hear the gloomy man once more, to see whether his preaching might be more tolerable to him than it had been heretofore. He went; and that morning the preacher was speaking of the narrow way, which he did not make either narrower or broader than the word of God describes. "A new creature in Christ, or eternal condemnation," was the theme of his discourse: and he spoke with power, and not as a mere learned reasoner. During the sermon, the question forced itself upon the hearer's conscience: "How is it with myself? Does this man declare the real truth?" This thought took such a hold upon him, that he could not get rid of it amidst any of his engagements or amusements. But it became from day to day more troublesome, more penetrating. He visited the preacher; they had a searching and solemn interview; both were deeply affected. Alluding to the sermon of Sunday morning, tears came into the eyes of the visitor; he smote his hands together like one in distress, and exclaimed in accents which might have moved a heart of stone. "Sir, if it be truth, we are lost and undone!" The preacher, terrified, staggered back, stood pale, trembling and speechless. "We," thinks he, "what means this we?" and endeavoring to stifle his inward uneasiness and embarrassment, he resumed his exhortations and advice. Then, with downcast eyes and convulsive sobbings, he exclaimed,—"Friend, get down on your knees, let us pray and cry for mercy!" They knelt down and prayed; and shortly after the visiter took his leave, the preacher shut himself up in his closet. Next Sunday, word was sent that the minister was unwell, and could not appear. The same thing happened the Sunday following. On the third Sunday the preacher made his appearance before his congregation, worn with his inward conflict and pale, but his eyes beaming with joy, and commenced his discourse with the surprising and affecting declaration that he had now for the first time, passed the straight gate.—You will ask what had occurred to him in his chamber during the interval that elapsed.—A storm passed over him,—but the Lord was not in the storm; an earthquake,—but the Lord was not in the earthquake; fire,—but the Lord was not in the fire. Then came the small still voice, on which the man enveloped his face in his mantle, and from that time he knew what was the gospel and what was grace.—Krummacher.

ANECDOTE.

Towards noon, one dreary Autumn day, when the roads in the Eastern part of Maine were in a "wretched condition," the travelers in the mail stage from Porland to Bangor, found themselves drawing near the village of———. Having been jolted, tossed and tumbled, (in a manner only to be conceived by those who have traveled over the miery roads of Maine, in the fall or spring) from daylight up to that hour, without food, the travelers—some six in number—naturally turned their attention upon the prospect of a dinner, which the village to which they were drawing near, afforded, and it was agreed by all that the landlady of the stage house was famed for her excellent cookery, but that she always delayed the meal unreasonably (or perhaps reason-ably, on her part,) and that by the time the travelers were in medias res (which being interpreted, signifies up to the ears in roast chicken, beefsteaks, eggs and bacon, &c..) the mail carrier was wont to break in upon them with "stage ready," and no delay. At this information one of the travelers—a taciturn chap in huge whiskers, who had been chewing the end of reflection all the forenoon, only occasionally making some sententious observations, uttered a "Well, yes!" accompanied with a peculiar dip of the head—as much as to say, I'm not to be cheated out of my dinner, gentlemen, whatever you may see fit to put up with.

Presently the coach drew up to the welcome establishment, but, as had been predicted, some time elapsed before the dinner appeared on the table, and by the time the travelers had got their appetites whetted more keenly by a few savory mouthfuls—the coachman entered with "stage ready—and two hours past my time—cannot wait a minute." Reluctantly the passengers obeyed the summons, all but the taciturn gentleman before alluded to who went on eating as leisurely as though he had not heard it, simply remarking to the land-lady as she came towards him with outstretched palm for the pay, "A few more eggs, if you please."

As soon as the land-lady had left the room, he bustled together all the silver spoons and putting them into the sugar bowl, replaced the cover.—The land-lady came in with the eggs more expeditiously than she was wont. The next remark of the taciturn gentleman, was, "I'll thank you for a spoon!"

The land-lady glanced her over the table, and with consternation in her looks exclaiming "they've stolen every one of my spoons," rushed out to the coachman, who with reins in his hands was impatiently waiting his dilatory passenger. Every one of my silver spoons has been taken—I must have the passengers searched." In vain the coachman remonstrated—she insisted, and the passengers being willing to show their innocence, a strict watch was made, of course to no effect. Sorrowfully the old lady turned to go in, when the taciturn passenger met her at the door—simply remarking as he buttened up his coat about his now plump person—"I have made an excellent and plentiful meal—shall remember your house. As to the spoons, you will find them in the sugar pot—I guess one of the passengers has been trying to put a joke upon you.

Narrative.

FORGIVENESS;

OR, VICTORY TO JESUS CHRIST.

Some years ago a missionary was preaching to the Hindoos. He was telling of the true and only God, who is love; whose mercies are over all his works; who shows his love in the care with which his Almighty providence hath provided for the insect that crawls on the earth; the bird that flies in the air; the fish that swims in the water; the beast that walks on the earth; and man, the lord of all, to whom he hath given dominion over the works of hands. He was telling of that God who willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness, and live: who is a holy, pure, and just God, and therefore is angry with the wicked every day, but yet is forbearing and patient, slow to anger, and of great kindness. He was telling of that God who so loved sinful, cruel, and unmerciful men, as to give his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life.

He was telling, moreover, of the Son of God; describing the character of the meek, holy compassionate Saviour; who even sent away the doves from the temple unharmed, though he was angry with those who polluted the temple by selling them in it:—he was telling of his love, of all his patience;—how he forgave his enemies, and taught his disciples to do good to those that hated them; to bless those that cursed them;—how, in his last miracle on earth, he returned good for evil, and healed the ear of the high priest's servant, who was come with others to take him prisoner.

Now, while he was speaking thus, many listed attentively; but others thought he was pointing to their religion, and contrasting it with the religion of Jesus Christ; and contrasting such a goddess as Kalee with the character of the true God. The priests, or Brahmins, are always much opposed to the Christian missionaries, because these priests live in ease and idleness by the superstition of the people; and they think, like the silversmiths we read of in the Acts of the Apostles, that if Christianity were to prevail, their craft would come to naught.—So sometimes when they do not interfere themselves, they would incite others to do so.

I do not know whether a Brahmin was the cause or not, but while this missionary was thus preaching, one of the Hindoos, who had come from some distance, grew very indignant at the preacher's discourse, and determined to put an end to it; and as human life is thought very little of by them, he did not hesitate about it. So he got a great stick, and went behind the missionary while he was preaching, and raised it up to knock the poor man on the head; but fortunately he missed his blow, and the stick came down on the preacher's shoulder, instead of his head.—Then the guilty and disappointed Hindoo wanted to escape, but a great many of those who had been listening to the discourse, and saw his base action, became very angry and ashamed at it; and they seized the man, and brought him to the missionary. So the preacher looked at him, as he stood quite ashamed and full of fear before him; and then looking at his other hearers, he said, "What shall I do with him?"

"Give him a good beating," they cried, holding the stick that might have killed him to the missionary.

"O," said the preacher, "I cannot do that!" I suppose the Hindoos thought he did not think himself strong enough to beat the wicked Hindoo as he deserved.

"Well," they said, "send him to the judge, and he will be sentenced to two years' hard labor on the road."

"I cannot do that," said the missionary. The Hindoos were astonished, and said, "What can you do?"

"I can forgive him," said the missionary; "this is all I can do; and I will tell you why,—Jesus Christ is my Lord and my God: he commands me to love my enemies, and to do good to them that despitefully use me and persecute me."

Then he turned to the trembling Hindoo, and said, "I forgive you from my heart; but never forget that it is Jesus Christ you are to thank for your escape from punishment; and it was against Jesus Christ and his religion you were angry when you aimed that blow at me."

The Hindoos were astonished at this forgiveness of an enemy;—they were silent a moment; then rose up altogether, and shouted out, "Victory to Jesus Christ! Victory to Jesus Christ!"—S. S. Adv.

Remarkable Deliverance.

We met the following singular narrative, the other day, in the volume of a Canadian missionary who has recently published certain reminiscences of his life and labors. The story is well told, and the incident which forms its subject, whether called "accidental" or "Providential" was certainly remarkable:—

About this period I went to attend the sale of the effects of Mr. M———, a respectable farmer, who had died at one of my out-settlements a few months before. He had left a widow, a very amiable and pious woman, and three children, to mourn his loss. The lone widow thought herself unequal to the management of the large farm which her husband had occupied. She therefore took a cottage in the village where I lived, and was now selling everything off except a little furniture.

After the sale was over I congratulated her upon the plan she had adopted, and remarked that she would be much more comfortable, not only in being relieved from the cares of a business she could not be supposed to understand, but in a feeling of security, which in her unprotected state in that lonely house she could hardly enjoy.

"O! no," she said "not unprotected; far from it! You forget," she continued, with a mournful smile, "that I am now under the special protection of Him 'who careth for the fatherless and the widow,' and I feel quite confident that He will protect us."

And He did protect them, and that very night too, in a most extraordinary and wonderful, and, I may add, miraculous manner. The farm-house was a solitary one; there was not another within half a mile of it. That night there was a good deal of money in the house, the proceeds of the sale. The mother and her three young children, and a maid-servant, were the sole inmates. They had retired to rest some time.—The wind was howling fearfully, and shook the wooden house at every blast.

This kept the poor mother awake, and she thought she heard, in the pause of the tempest some strange and unusual noise, seemingly at the back of the house. While eagerly listening to catch the sound again, she was startled by the violent barking of a dog, apparently in a room in the front of the house immediately beneath the bed-chamber. This alarmed her still more, as they had no dog of their own.

She immediately rose, and going to her maid's room awoke her, and they went down together. They first peeped into the room where they had heard the dog. It was moonlight, at least partially so, for the night was cloudy; still it was light enough to distinguish objects, although but faintly. They saw an immense black dog scratching and gnawing furiously at the door leading into the kitchen, whence she thought that the noise she first heard had proceeded.

She requested the servant to open the door which the dog was attacking so violently. The girl was a determined and resolute creature, devoid of fear, and she did so without hesitation; when the dog rushed out, and the widow saw through the open door too men at the kitchen window, which was open. The men instantly retreated, and the dog leaped through the window after them. A violent scuffle ensued, and it was evident from the occasional yelping of the noble animal, that he sometimes had the worst of it.

The noise of the contest, however, gradually receded, till Mrs. M.———could hear only now and then a faint and distant bark. The robbers, or perhaps murderers, had taken out a pane of glass, which had enabled them to undo the fastening of the window, when, but for the dog, they would doubtless have accomplished their purpose. The mistress and maid got a light, and secured the window as well as they could.

They then dressed themselves, for, to think of sleeping any more that night was out of the question. They had not, however, got down stairs the second time before they heard their protector scratching at the outer door for admittance. They immediately opened it, when he came in wagging his bushy tail, and fawning upon each of them in turn, to be patted and praised for his prowess.

He then stretched his huge bulk, at full length, beside the warm stove, closed his eyes and went to sleep. The next morning they gave him a breakfast any dog might have envied; after which nothing could induce him to prolong his visit. He stood whining impatiently at the door until it was opened, when he galloped off in a great hurry, and they never saw him afterward.

They had never seen the dog before, nor did they ever know to whom he belonged. It was a very singular circumstance, and they could only suppose that he came with some stranger to the sale. The family moved the following day to their new cottage in the village; and when my wife and I called upon them, Mrs. M. remarked to me that, when I last saw her, she told me they were not unprotected.

MUSKINGUM DISTRICT.

Steubenville, Ohio, June 25, 1847.

Br. Bassett: For the information of the friends of Zion, I desire to report, through the Western Recorder, the state of things in this station.

I arrived here immediately after the adjournment of our last Conference, and was most kindly received by the friends. I was highly gratified to find that my predecessor enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the people, generally. Nothing is more painful to a Minister's mind, than to hear loud complaints against the brother who preceded him on his field of labor; and it is equally cheering to hear them speak in his praise.

My intercourse with this people has thus far been very pleasant. I never was associated with a people apparently more disposed to live in friendship and peace with each other. In the month of February we were favored with a season of great refreshing from the presence of the Lord, on which occasion Br's. John Burns and J. Cowl, labored very efficiently, and acceptaby to the people.—About sixty souls were converted or reclaimed from a backslidden state. I think that I never witnessed a revival in which the work was more manifestly the work of God, and not of man. Such was the extreme anxiety of those who came forward for prayer, that those who did not obtain a manifestation of the Divine favor were unwilling to leave the place without the blessing; and from two to eight persons, each evening, during two weeks, obtained clear manifestations of God's pardoning love. I never witnessed scenes of more thrilling interest. We have received forty-nine members since Conference, viz: Twelve by certificate, and thirty-seven on probation. We have also lost a number of members. Eight have died; each of whom has given evidence of being prepared for a better world; and some of them were enabled to triumph in the faith of the gospel to the last. Our third quarterly meeting was held on the 16th of June; on which occasion we were favored with the assistance of Br's. Clancy and Reeves.

Br. Clancy preached us a very good discourse on Sabbath morning, and Br. Reeves favored us with two edifying sermons, one on Saturday, and the other on Sabbath evening.

Our present circumstances and future prospects as a church, are encouraging. We desire to feel thankful to the Savior for past benefits, and to pray earnestly for fresh displays of his reviving and saving power. ROBERT ANDREW.

Mt. Vernon, Ohio, June 22, 1847.

Br. Bassett: During the past eight or ten weeks my time has been almost incessantly occupied, day and night, with protracted meetings. Part of this time was spent on Delaware Circuit, in assisting my worthy fellow-laborer, Brother Hatfield, pursuant to a request of the President. Previous to this, the happiness of the days of other years was revived in my experience by the presence and services of Brother Hatfield, with whom I happily and prosperously travelled on Pennsville Circuit, for nearly two years. He came to my help at a protracted meeting held about six miles south of this place. We had a good time; the sinners in Zion were afraid; the scepticism of some gave way; ten persons came out on the Lord's side, and we organized a new class which bids fair soon to outnumber the old classes on the circuit. Thank God, that though we have not been so successful as I wished on this Circuit, our labor has not been altogether vain in the Lord; as we have now more than doubled the original number of members.

I will just hint to Br. Clancy, that I did not delay or neglect the business I took upon me in reference to himself, but did not succeed in the least; and as the time stipulated in now past, all I can say, is, I will try what can be done between this and Conference. Yours, &c.,

THOMAS POTTER.

Thomson Circuit, O., June 15th, 1847.

Dear Br. Bassett: I take this opportunity of reporting to Br. Clancy, and all concerned, that Thomson Circuit is still alive, notwithstanding this conference year it has had to meet some considerable discouragement, by deaths, and removals to the west. But the cloud seems to have to a considerable extent past over, and we are looking for better days. All of our protracted and quarterly meetings have passed off in a lively, interesting spirit, but no particular outpouring of the spirit of God, in the conviction, and conversion of sinners. At our second quarterly meeting, we had the very acceptable labors of Br. J. Souder from Sandusky circuit; at our third, the labor of Br. Robison of Bucyrus, Br. Bowman, of Belleview, Br. R. Rice, of Sandusky, all of whose labors were well received. May the Lord reward them, for their labor of love. We have organized one small class this year, and added a few other names this year. May the Lord prosper us. We would inform Br. Clancy, that the place appointed for receiving his visit is the Thomson or Docker Meeting house, in Thomson township, Seneca county. Brethren pray for us. JEREMIAH JACK.

OHIO DISTRICT.

Miami Circuit, June 15, 1847.

Br. Bassett: I embrace this favorable opportunity to give you and our brethren in general, some information with regard to the prosperity of religion on this Circuit. Since this Conference year began, we have enjoyed many pleasant seasons; and though we cannot boast of our numbers, we thank God, that he is still putting it into the hearts of some, to cast in their lots amongst us. We enjoy peace in all our borders. Our presidential meeting has just closed. We had a good old fashioned time of rejoicing in hope of meeting where parting will be no more. Br. Young labored with his usual ability and zeal, and we trust was successful in winning souls to the Lord. We were also favored with the valuable services of Brs. L. Ensminger, and O. P. Stephens. The Lord reward them. We expect to hold several protracted meetings between this time and the sitting of the next Annual Conference, and if father M'Guire can give us any assistance, we shall be very much gratified, for we have plenty of Missionary ground here. Brethren, pray for us. GEO. W. THORNBURG, Ass't.

NORTH ILLINOIS DISTRICT.

Hartford, Knox County, Illinois, June 18, 1847.

Br. Bassett: To the friends of Zion, let me say, that as a people, we have reason to be encouraged, of late. The 2d quarterly meeting for this circuit, was held at Br. Ralph Mount's where a class of nine or ten members was organized last year, some of whom had become very cold and indifferent to religion; but some continued to cry to the Lord for help. He answered, at this meeting. His children were wonderfully blessed and revived, backsliders were reclaimed, sinners were converted, and some were added to the church. Since that time five more have joined the class by letter from the Rossburg class in Ohio. And here let me say to you, Br. Bassett, and all our old friends, that there are in two classes here, some six miles apart, nineteen members from the same old Rossburg class.* The third quarterly meeting was held in our new meeting house in Abingdon, on the 12, 13, and 14th of June. The Lord met with his people, at every appointment. O, what a heart cheering, and soul refreshing season—what tears and acclamations of joy from God's people, as well as tears of penitence, from convicted sinners. Br. D. Bagley of Princeton circuit, came about 70 miles to render service at this meeting, which was very profitable. Our house was commenced with trembling, the society being weak. But trusting in God, and loving his cause, we went forward. And in consequence, by the blessing of God, means were furnished, and friends were not wanting to aid us; so that the house is now nearly finished, and no debt hanging over the society. Thus, when we are weak, the Lord is our strengh. May he still aid and prosper us, and to his name shall be given the praise.

JAMES R. JOHNSTON.

* We are gratified to hear such encouraging word from our old friends, since they have g one west. We think that this is colonizing to advantage, especially as they have been so industrious, and so successful in putting up a house of worship at their new destination. Hope we shall hear of their continued prosperity. Br. Johnston, enquiry has been made of us respecting Br. I. Edwards, why his name does not appear in the Minutes of your Conference, and we know not. [Ed.

The First Independent African Grand Lodge of North America, and ten subordinate lodges, made a parade in Philadelphia on Thursday, ac. companied by several splendid bands of music. The procession was about a half a mile in length. They laid the corner stone of a new hall, with appropriate ceremonies. The sermon was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Douglass, of Baltimore; Rev. Mr. Chase, of Baltimore, also spoke. Their banners were greatly admired along the route. Among the Lodges in attendance was Friendship Lodge No. 5, of Baltimore. The procession, though very orderly and peaceable, was several times disturbed by omnibus and dray drivers.

Resigned.—We learn from the Pittsburg Journal that Dr. Breckenridge has resigned the Presidency of Jefferson College, in Cannonsburg, Pa. His place is to be supplied by the Rev. Dr. Baird, a gentleman well and favorbaly known for his lectures on Europe.

An Execution in Kentucky.—Wm. H. Stepter, a young man 17 years of age, was executed according to sentence in Greenbush, Ky., on the 5th inst., for the murder of his mother. Nearly five thousand persons assembled to witness the closing scene, and strange as it may appear full one-half of them were ladies—ladies, too, apparently of respectability and high breeding.

The act for which he has suffered was committed, as every one thought, by the boy's father. He was arrested, and would unquestionably have been hanged, if his son, to whom no suspicion was ever attached, had not voluntarily come forward and released his father by declaring that he alone was the guilty person. The son was accordingly, convicted on his own confession. He had always previously borne the character of an inoffensive, good-hearted boy, and no motive can be assigned for the commission of the horrid act. He was a boy of a very weak mind—occasionally insane, it is said.

Secession.--Br. John H. Thomas.

This worthy brother was a pioneer of the Methodist Protestant Church, in Western Ohio, and continued to be one of its most zealous and liberal sup porters, until a few months ago. After the last session of the General Conference, and of the O. Annual Conference, he became discouraged in his hopes, to see the church of his choice dissolve its connection with slavery, and thought it his duty to withdraw from us. Now we trust we are as anxious as our brother, to see the church and the world redeemed from the reproach, the curse, the sin of slavery. And we intend not to slack our hand, in striving to promote a "consummation, so devoutly to be wished." But we believe it our duty to remain firm and persevering, and "not to faint," or become discouraged, or "weary in well doing," because we do not yet see the desire of our hearts. Even the blessed gospel, in nearly 2000 years, has not yet brought about the conversion of the world. Shall we therefore doubt that there is a period coming when the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God, and when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth, and the earth be filled with his glory? In periods of declension in older times, what pain and embarrassment did the few faithful prophets of the Lord, and others, suffer, to witness the abominations perpetrated by those connected with the visible church of the Most High. But did they therefore dissolve their connection with his church, and forsake the courts of his sanctuary? Our Lord found the holy temple converted into a depot of merchandise, a broker's office, and a den of thieves. Yet do we read of his withdrawal? Do we not rather read of his efforts, even with a scourge of cords in one instance, to expurgate the temple. But he is at length excommunicated. Mr. Wesley was the means of a great revival of religion in the church of England, and became the father of an extensive sect of Christians. But whilst he lived he disavowed an intention to forsake the church (the establishment) notwithstanding it had become as it were, a cage of unclean birds. The Methodist Reformers, advocates of Mutual Rights, disclaimed an intention of setting up for themselves, till they met with proscription, and till not a few were "cast out." We hesitate not to say, that the Methodist Protestants would never have set up for themselves, but for the excommunicating acts of the Methodist Episcopal Church. How is it in the case of Br. Thom as, and other abolition brethren? Are they proscribed for their anti slavery views? Are they hated, because they plead the cause of the oppressed? Are they cast out of the church for abolition's sake? What opposition do they meet with to the free advocacy of their views in the Methodist Protestant Church? Who denounces them, or forbids them to urge the entire separation of the Church from slavery? No—Br. Thomas, though as sincere and conscientious a man as ever lived, has not sufficient cause at this time to withdraw, and attempt a new organization. This is our judgment, though sympathising in his main views. And we would not be so meddlesome as to say this, but that the evident intention of our brother is to influence others to secede. And here we must interpose. So far from consenting that others shall withdraw from us now upon the ground of Br. Thomas, thus weakening the hands of those who remain, we would feel disposed to invite that brother to retrace his steps. Happy should we be again to number him in our list of ministers, for never shall we forget the precious seasons we have formerly had together. We feel that we ought not now to be separated, and we cannot go with Br. Thomas, in his present enterprise, for we feel that with our present convictions, we should do wrong, very wrong to dissolve our present ecclesiastical connections.

We publish, in another column, the letter of Br. Thomas, because it is not written in an improper spirit, and because he has been a supporter of our paper from its origin, and is now a paying subscriber, besides doing us a gratuitous agency. But our brother must know, if he wishes to pursue this subject to the ends which we fear he does, our paper is devoted chiefly to the interests of Methodist Protestant Church, and we may not feel at liberty to admit to our columns, what would be considered against the interests of the church. Come Br. Thomas, we again offer you our hand, and you may know that our heart as well as our hand is engaged in this proposal.

Whitehead's Life of Wesley.

The article we publish this week from our Philadelphia correspondent, in reference to this work, will be found an able paper. We trust that it will be carefully read, notwithstanding its length. No man in America is better acquainted with the facts involved in the case, than the senior Mr. Stockton, the writer, who is proprietor of the stereotype plates of Dr. Whitehead's work, and the only set upon this continent. As stated last week, we have on hand a supply of the above named work, for sale, at a reduced price.

Christian Society of Brotherly Love.

A society bearing this name was organized a few weeks ago in Philadelphia. It is the first organization on the plan of Christian Union, some time since projected by Rev. T. H. Stockton. It is due to Br. Stockton, that we say, his plan, in the order of time, has precedence of the Evangelical Alliance. He aims not only to unite those who differ but to "destroy their differences." The Constitution of the Society, and explanatory Address are published in the first number of the Weekly Christian World. The third article, gives the terms of membership, as follows:

"Any person of approved moral character, claiming to be a disciple of Christ, or professing a desire to become a disciple, and acknowledging these two great principles, 1. The Bible is the Book of God. 2. Private judgment is the duty and right of Man. May become a member of this society, by signing this Constitution, and engaging to fulfil the conditions which shall be required by the By-laws."

Forty one persons gave in their names at the organization, sixteen more were added at the 2nd meeting, and forty-four more at the third meeting. We see that Br. Stockton, takes some exceptions to the plan of the Evangelical Alliance, and that some exceptions are taken to his plan, by some of our cotemporaries. We are so desirous to witness the prevalence of Christian Union, we confess we were pleased with the plan of Brother Stockton, and we were pleased with the Evangelical Alliance. We are sorry that the two plans should be at all diverse from each other, and that they should not deserve, and receive a universal approval and support.

Immigration.

The influx of European immigrants at the eastern ports of the United States, is greater than at any former period. A great proportion of these are nearly or quite in a state of destitution, having consumed their utmost means in procuring passage across the Atlantic. These are truly deserving of sympathy, having left densely populated countries, where they have suffered, not only pinching scarcity, but the oppression of despotic laws. Their hope is, on our shores to find employment and a livelihood, and perhaps land.—All this is to be obtained, for there is yet room, and there are resources to support millions more. But the first difficulty is to get the hordes of new comers distributed out over the country to places where they will find means of livelihood. They throng Boston, New York, and some other seaports, like locusts in Egypt, filling the alms houses and hospitals to overflowing.

The Boston Olive Branch states that the Native Americans are holding meetings in that city, but "they can do little more than point out the evil; the remedy is still a desideratum." It says that vessels are sometimes prohibited to land their cargoes of wretched humanity. Little disconcerted at this, they only put along to Halifax, where they are landed, and soon find their way back to Boston by railroad. The presence of these immigrants in such numbers, who will accept of employment for almost no pay, whilst the price of breadstuffs is greatly advancing, is a serious detriment to the laboring classes, who have also to be taxed for the support of the thousands of foreign paupers. The Olive Branch says:

"It is very unreasonable to blame the immigrants; they are influenced by the instinctive love of life which we all possess. They are fleeing from starvation and suffering to a land of liberty and plenty, and we would do the same.

If, however, we must be put to expense on their account, perhaps the very best thing we can do, is to raise the means of transporting them into the Western States, where there is land enough for them to cultivate, and where for their labor they can procure food which they cannot get here.—And the farmers and land owners in those regions can raise an increased amount of grain. Thus, while they are made the means of supporting themselves they will also be the means of reducing the price of grain, by the greater amount raised. The Western papers say, 'Let them come.' And the farmers in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri and Iowa want their help, and say they 'would be glad to see a million immigrants this year, instead of a hundred thousand.' Then let us send them on as fast as they land; there they are wanted.

Immigration--Another Sort.

Friend Bates, assistant Editor of the Pittsburgh C. Advocate, in the last number of that paper, writing from Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, states that on the 11th instant (June) a company of forty people of color arrived at that place from Dinwiddie co., Va. They were emancipated in 1844, by James Eppes, who gave them also the greater part of his estate. He directed, however, that they should remain there till the estate was settled, and be hired out for their own benefit. The company came, it is said, well provided for, and brought excellent characters. Mt. Pleasant and the surrounding country is chiefly settled by members of the society of Friends, so noted for their sympathy in behalf of the degraded African race. The emigrants met with a welcome reception, numerous applications were at once made for their services at good wages, and within two days they were all comfortably provided for. Two slaves, a man and woman, belonging to J. H. Boiseau, of Dinwiddie county, Va., had intermarried with two of the company emancipated by Eppes. When these were about starting for Ohio, Boiseau gave deeds of emancipation to the other two, to prevent their being parted from their families. It does us good to record such acts of disinterestedness.—It has been but two years, since another company of twenty, came out from the same neighborhood in Virginia, emancipated by James Hargrave, and settled near Mt. Pleasant. Mr. Bates says they are doing well, and are making themselves useful in community.

Crops in Illinois.

Our friend Col. J. R. Johnston, residing in Knox County Illinois, a fertile portion of that state, writes us that the wheat crops there are very unpromising. He thinks that to take the country through, there will not be more than one fourth of a crop. The spring crops, however, look very well.

A Methodist Mission for China.

We see by the Western Christian Advocate, that a movement has been made in the west, for raising means to send out one minister from each Annual Conference, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, on a Mission to China. It originated with Rev. Peter Cartright, of the Illinois Conference, who has offered to be one of two hundred who will give $5 per year for ten years, towards the object. The Editor of the Advocate seems to think that the proposition will take, and its end be effected. He even contemplates the speedy formation of a China Conference, which could be effected so soon as one missionary shall be sent from each Conference. We are glad to see so much of a missionary spirit manifested by our brethren.

That "Oldest Inhabitant" gone.

The Cincinnati Commercial announces the death on the 17th June, of Col. John Riddle, at his residence near Cincinnati. Our readers will recollect, that we very lately published an interesting paper from Cist's Advertiser, giving reminiscences of this aged man, one of the earliest settlers of Cincinnati. He died of a short and severe illness, in his 86th year.

Tour of the President.

President Polk is on a visit north. He left Washington on Tuesday of last week, and was received with great ceremony and parade at the cities of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York &c. This week he is to visit New Haven, Boston, Lowell, Concord, Portland &c., but expects to be absent only two weeks. The lady of the President, has gone on a visit to Tennessee.

A Sermon, this Week.

The sermon of Rev. S. Morrison, formerly President of the Indiana Conference, which we publish this week, will be read with interest. It was ordered for publication by the Indiana Conference, before which it was delivered. We have had it set up in wide columns, in view of making up the matter into a pamphlet, after our present issue, having been requested to furnish some 12,00 or more copies in that form. Brother Morrison has authorised us to send a copy to each of our subscribers in Indiana who has paid. And as these last shall be no expense to Brother Morrison we take the liberty to add, that a copy shall be sent to each new subscriber in that State, and each former subscriber who will now pay up.

Godey's Lady's Book.

The July number is before us, with rich embellishments as usual. Of the steel engravings, two are illustrations of the Dignity of Manhood, the third is the Fashion plate, in which we are gratified to see that the figures are modestly attired. We think this worthy of remark, because it is too common for engravings of the kind to be exceedingly indelicate. We have the same commendation to speak in behalf of the "Columbian" this month. Mr. Godey has also Illustrations of Ladies' Head dresses, Music, Model Cottages, Ladies' Work department, &c. But the best is "Health and Beauty" with a picture, in which some of the evils of fashionable life are reproved, and some of the best advice given for promoting health and beauty. Mr. Godey has also sent us a copy of each his reprints, Blackwood's Ladies' Magazine, and the London World of fashion. Address, L. A. Godey, Philadelphia.

Columbian Magazine.

The number for July, has reached us in good time. It is embellished with several good engravings. The best is a fine view of Navy Island. Then "Sugaring off" a very apt representation of a western scene. The Fashions for July, and Original Music. Most of the writers for this number are ladies of popular talent, and we are gratified to find it contains some things good as well as interesting. The Columbian is a very handsome work. Address, Ormsby and Hackett, Fulton St. N. York.

ORIGINAL REVIEW.

The Life of the Rev. John Wesley, M. A., collected from his private papers and printed works; and written at the request of his Executors. To which is prefixed some account of his ancestors and relations; with the Life of the Rev. Charles Wesley, M. A., collected from his private Journal, and never before published. By John Whitehead, M. D., author of the discourse delivered at Rev. John Wesley's funeral.

Dr. Whitehead was the intimate friend of John Wesley for twenty-five years; one of his preachers for many years; and his physician in his last illness. Mr. Wesley refused to be attended by any other physician. Dr. Whitehead was also the physician of Charles Wesley during his last illness, to whose daughter Sarah, Dr. Whitehead was recommended by her uncle, as one of the best physicians in England. His words are:—"I am persuaded there is not such another physician in England."

Dr. Whitehead was selected in preference to any other preacher in connexion with the Methodists, to deliver the discourse on Mr. J. Wesley's decease. This was the greatest honor which the Executors and the preachers could confer on any one. At that time, Dr. Whitehead was a practising physician in London, and not a member of the Conference. He was a local preacher.—There were not wanting eminent preachers and old friends of Mr. Wesley, any one of whom would have regarded it as a high distinction to have been selected to preach Mr. Wesley's funeral sermen. So much in evidence of his position as a physician and a preacher.

Mr. Wesley by his will appointed Dr. Whitehead one of the Trustees of his manuscripts.—The Executors appointed him to be the Biographer of Mr. Wesley. The Conference approved of their choice. No higher testimonials could be given to the character and intellectual qualifications of any one than those by the Executors and the Conference. Dr. Whitehead had also placed at his disposal the manuscript Journal of Charles Wesley—and papers of the Wesley family.—Such were the resources for the commencement of the lives of J. and C. Wesley, in so far as the manuscripts were needed; and without them, the Biographies would have been worthless. Besides, Dr. Whitehead had all the aid of a long, personal, and confidential, intercourse with the deceased—and the use of all Methodist and other cotemporaneous works. He was an eye, and an ear witness of all. But, he was not permitted to proceed without interruption in his assigned work, as he stated his intention in his printed prospectus; to-wit: to give to the public an impartial history of the Wesleys and of Methodism. A party among the preachers required, as Dr. W. states, "that I should publish nothing in the life of Mr. J. Wesley, but what should be approved by a committee of the preachers." To this he could not agree. However, he continues,—"I offered to read the manuscript to them as friends, and to consult them on particular parts of Mr. Wesley's life; but insisted on the right of using my own judgment, if on any point we could not agree." Dr. Whitehead was sorely persecuted. He says in his Preface, "Mr. Wesley never met with a more malignant opposition in the whole course of his labors, than I have experienced for attempting to describe them. Nor was I alone the object of their abuse; my friends also showed it with me. It sometimes appeared to me, that they carried their opposition to such outrageous and indecent lengths, on purpose to excite an opposition to them in the life itself; that they might have a fairer pretext to advise the people not to read it. I determined to disappoint them; and to take no further notice of them, than the connection of the history required, and without any particular reference to the dispute."

Such was the treatment received from a party, by the ancient friend and physician—the author of the funeral discourse, and the appointed Biographer of the Rev. John Wesley, because he had announced his determination to write an impartial history.

The son of an aged preacher, by the name of Hampson, had announced his purpose of publishing a life of Rev. John Wesley. The Executors of Mr. Wesley cautioned the public by advertisements in the papers against the proposed work of Hampson, declaring their appointment of Doctor Whitehead, who alone had the Wesleyan papers. Dr. Whitehead soon learned that he had more formidable competitors than the said Mr. Hampson. Thomas Coke and Henry Moore, got up a book, which they called a life of Wesley—so eager were the Methodists and the public to see a biography of Mr. Wesley—that 10,000 copies were sold in less than a year after Mr. Wesley's decease. We have seen this book of Coke and Moore, and can refer to it at any time. They had none of the Wesley's papers. These had been sealed and delivered to Dr. Whitehead.—A more wretched biography than this, was never read. A great portion of the book is occupied with the Lutheran Reformation, next comes some meagre accounts of Mr. J. Wesley, and it concludes with some account of Methodism in America.

Dr. Whitehead was three years in writing his first volume, which consists of a life of Charles Wesley, and the commencement of the life of his brother. This life of Charles is a publication of his private Journal, never before published. Dr. Adam Clarke remarks of it: "Mr. Charles Wesley's Life, in connection with that of his brother John, has been written by Dr. Coke and Mr. Moore, by Dr. Whitehead, and lately by Dr. Robert Southey, Poet Laureat. Of all of these, Dr. Whitehead's claims the preference—as formed from Mr. C. Wesley's Diary." Some years ago, Dr. Jackson of the English Conference, came out with a life of Mr. C. Wesley, in two volumes, which have been printed at the M. Episcopal Church Book Room, New York, with many commendations. Dr. Jackson does not mention Mr. C. Wesley's Journal as among his resources.—He does, however, give some little credit to Dr. Whitehead. Now, Dr. Jackson's work is indebted to Dr. Whitehead for all of its important matter, which is riddled, and republished in synonymes.

On the appearance of Dr. Whitehead's vol. 1. it was welcomed and commended by the principal London Reviews—the London "Analytical Review,"—"The Critical Review,"—"The British Critic." In 1796, five years after the decease of Mr. J. Wesley, Dr. Whitehead's vol. 2. was published.

We have taken no little time and pains to compare all the lives of Rev. J. and C. Wesley. 1. Coke and Moore, 1 vol. 2. Hampson in three vols., very small duodecimo. 4. Henry Moore, 2 vols., first published in 1824. 5. Southey, 1824. 6. Watson, 1831. Jackson's Life of Charles Wesley. Dr. Clarke's Wesley Family. Dove's Wesley Family. These have all—each, and all of them—been dependant upon Dr. Whitehead for their facts, with few exceptions. [Coke and Moore, of course, are not included.]

Dr. Whitehead's work was not permitted to visit the United States, or at most, only a few copies. Few of the Methodist preachers or people ever saw it—the most of them never heard of it. There were good and sufficient reasons for its exclusion. Dr. Whitehead was opposed to an independent organization of Methodism, he chose rather that the societies should remain as left by Mr. Wesley, without any distinction as a church. Dr. Whitehead gave an impartial history of Methodism up to 1791. He vindicated the character and conduct of Charles Wesley, who had no great hold, for several years, on the kindest regards of some of the preachers, because of his estimate of some of their qualifications. Dr. Whitehead does not declare a belief in Mr. J. Wesley's infallibility, though no man loved and honored him more—no man had greater confidence in Mr. Wesley than had Dr. Whitehead. Yet he knew of some mistakes—and he honestly mentioned them.—How could he do otherwise? they were only errors of judgment,—one of which was that great and grievous mistake of the ordination of Doctor Coke. Dr. Whitehead tells the truth of Dr. Coke. No truth ever was more unwelcome. So that,

. Whitehead's decease in 1804, an ex- copy of his two volumes was printed n. This garbled book, purporting to be derived from Dr. Whitehead's London was published in 1805, with his title

824, Henry Moore published life of J. Wesley on his own account. In his pre- outrages all decency in his abuse of Dr. ead. Note. Henry Moore, himself says had not the use of the Wesleyan manu-

He was one of the Trustees of them, but er had them. Dr. Whitehead returned the proper persons, as Mr. Moore admits, Moore could not obtain them. Therefore, of the Trustees, he declares his right to all entary matter wherever he found it. There- he takes Dr. Whitehead's two volumes traducer he was—and blending the two es, adding, or subtracting; dividing para- s; italicizing; speaking in the person of Dr. head—that is appropriating Dr. White- personal knowledge as his own; using his dissertations, reflections, and translations own, he prints his own original work in 2 No one dare contradict these statements; his own name. We are prepared to verify e state. But these books of Mr. Moore made connectional—or authentic Methodist y, by the English Conference; and by the concern at New York. Now, if Mr. Moore's ls are true, so are Dr. Whitehead's, for are taken from them, and that without ac- ledgment. Dr. Whitehead's 2 vols. con- 00 pages, and there are only about 133, of Moore's which were not taken from Dr. W. e pages are copied verbatim. So far Mr. e's work is authentic—as authentic as are ages of Dr. Whitehead, made up from the leyan documents. The truth may be told in words: Dr. Whitehead's lives of Rev. C. . Wesley is the original work—the founda- work, on which all others who have compi- biographies of these great men rest [except- Coke and Moore's conjoint book written with- authority to forestall the authorized biogra-].

is easy now, from these brief sketches, to why Dr. Whitehead's work was so carefully uded from this country, and suppressed in land, and superseded by a spurious issue with name in England and Dublin.

The Harpers have just published a new edition n Watson's Observations and Notes, of South- s Lives of the Wesleys. Southey was severely dled for his irreligion—his want of spiritual- —his injustice to the character of Mr. Wesley y the Methodist Reviews of England, when vols. appeared in 1824. Now, he is rather re than welcome, with the appendages to the d edition.

We have seen expressions of divines for a new e of Mr. J. Wesley. The English Methodists, ecially, would gladly see a philosophical Life a philosophy of Methodism—something differ- from plain matters of fact—something worthy modern Methodism—a work worthy of being und in gold. They are weary of common- ace history. The times have new aspects—so s Methodism—a new work—a new Life worthy Wesley is greatly needed. But of what value ould any biography be, if it were not compiled m Dr. Whitehead's two volumes? Nothing: he only has the original documents. Others nnot be conveniently invented. For the pre- nt, Southey is preferred to the original, plain, ue, history of the Wesleys.

The English Wesleyan Magazine for April, a review of Southey's Life of Mr. Wesley, escribes "the short but comprehensive memoir Richard Watson," (as the best) "a man who ossessed every qualification for producing one eau ideal of a Life of Wesley." Now, of all e Biographers of Wesley, Mr. Watson does e most honor to Dr. Whitehead. Mr. Watson, a small book, refers to Dr. Whitehead about orty times, and he copies whole pages from him, emarking, that what Dr. Whitehead had so well xpressed, he could not improve.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Written for the Western Recorder.

LETTER FROM BR. J. H. THOMAS.

Brother Bassett.—After so long time having elapsed, since any special correspondence having taken place between us, or requested a place in the Recorder; I feel like renewing our old acquaintance a little. And although, at this time, we do not sail just in the same ship, yet I trust we are bound for the same port; but having the vessel laden with different materials. Therefore I request a little space in the paper, in order to communicate some things touching matters of a religious nature; as also, some things connected with the church. And as I am now known as an anti-slavery man, not only in theory, but also in practice, I shall not be considered as being out of place, if I should have something to say as touching such subject. And particularly when so much has been written negatively by sundry persons. Not that I would presume to meet all the demands, and confront all that has been said as opposing; but as one said of old, I will also show my opinion. And although I do not consider the connection of religious bodies, with American slavery, that kind of oppression which reduces a human being to the level of a brute, and deprives him of the right to himself, his family, and his property, as wrong; and appears as though we can not act together in this matter, yet I trust we are friends. And I say, who ever has got the light, let it shine. Now there is danger of the priest falling from Israel, or a standard bearer from among his people, and the law perishing from the priest, and counsel from the ancients. Again it is said, "Wo unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbor's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work." This will apply to every department in life, to every species of oppression. It is said again, "Wo be unto the pastors that destroy and scatter the sheep of my pasture." Are those wilful oppressors the sheep of his pasture?—We have much need to take good heed to these things, that we err not in the way.—The Lord has pronounced a wo to them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness. But there is such a thing as making a covenant with death, and an agreement, or striking hands with hell.—But I did not intend to extend, in this communication. Therefore, I would address myself a little, to brethren and friends, in and out of the M. P. Church, those who are at present connected with me in church fellowship, on the independent order, and to all others whom it may concern.—

Dear Brethren,—With me, many of you have been members of the M. P. Church for a series of years; and with me, you have labored side and shoulder, in our Annual, and some of you in the General Conferences, as also in our Western church periodical, to remove that iniquitous principle, Slavery! as well as the practice of it, from the church of our former choice. The church being a unit (though I confess in her connection, there is the most ingenious management displayed that is possible to conceive of a religious body, yet after all they say, that in some respects, she is deprived in her Federal head the power or right to legislate,) governed by the same Constitution and Discipline, this emanating from the nucleus, in which a compromise touching slavery was made, understood, agreed upon, & well known by the then compilers or framers of said instrument, which of late days has been brought to light, the elements of such understanding we will find couched in some of the seventeen articles drawn up by the first convention as the government, or rule of conduct for the societies for the then time being, and never revoked, and the matter has been kept as silent as the nature of the case would admit of. And in order to cast a veil over this division of things, a paragraph in the Constitution is provided, making it the privilege of each Annual Conference to make such rules for the government of colored members, as in their judgment they might think or judge proper. But mark, the laws and institutions of the States were to be strictly observed. Has that been done?—Now you see, slavery, pro or con, is not once mentioned in all this. Is this as has been supposed, authority for Annual Conferences to legislate any rule on slavery? not at all. Remember it is for colored members, and not for slave holders, nor the apologizers for slavery.—No, this is carefully kept out of sight.—But it may be said inasmuch as slavery is not mentioned in this place, I refer to article 7th of the Constitution, that it is an infringement upon the church, and all that is necessary for the church to say in her two thirds majority, slavery shall cease from amongst us as a M. P. Church. Aye, that is the rub. The General Conference has already put its veto on such procedure: but suffice it to say, slavery as it exists in the church is now well understood, and as an evidence of that fact, see it showing itself in the 12th art. 1st and 2d sec. of the Constitution. And I would just say, while on this topic, that in my opinion, (others have an equal right to think differently,) a class, a circuit, a station, or an An. Conference, cannot legally reject the reception into the church, or fellowship, of a slave holder. But it may be said that the 4th sec. and 3d item of the 7th art. of the Constitution, makes provision for the exercise of power by the An. Con's. in the prohibition of slavery or slave holders in the ch., where the States are opposed to it. What observers of the State rights. Well, we confess it is a little mysterious in its management, but the design may be understood. Just look at it?—Neither the General Conference, nor an Annual Conference, shall assume power to interfere with the Constitutional powers of the civil governments, or the operations of civil law. How ingenious,—yes, but mark that word immoral. Well, you must first make it out immoral. What! moral in South Carolina, and immoral in Ohio! And in the same church? Yes! for you see the sixty thousand embraces both North and South. O, what discrepancy!—Now what christian civilized nation, would wish to frame laws to infringe the moral precepts of the gospel? But here we find a provision to meet the contingency, without being asked for it. And what gospel organized church, would assume power to introduce a principle involving the church in future difficulty, but in order to effect a present good? This indeed looks a little like doing evil, that good may come. What a pity it could not have been otherwise. Don't you say so friends? Don't you say so, Mr. Editor? Did the States require this condescension of the church? I think not. If the States, unfortunately had adopted some erroneous errors, as some of them we think have, do they require the church to succumb thereto? Or can they Constitutionally do it? We think not.—But it was a voluntary (though with some rather involuntary) arrangement by the convention. We could refer to some of our ancient father's memory on the subject, as well as an independent church order, who have passed out of the present troubles by death, to others that might be thought to be insane on this subject, and to others of our brethren who would yet be considered sane, who were present at both Conventions in Baltimore: who if called upon, must vouch for the truth of this matter. You see, my brethren, these conventions were both in a Slave State, under slave influence, a preponderance in favor of the slave interest, a great reform for the white man, was now set on foot, i. e. an opposition to the powers that be, in the M. E. Church, this was to be regulated if possible, a laudable undertaking I say, and I trust it will progress, till the whole lump is leavened.—Amen. Here I would not wish to reproach our southern friends wrongfully, but it does seem that they have a peculiar faculty of uniting southern interests, with some special northern, so as to carry their point. The slave interest would not yield: and when some moved, or agitated an independent Annual Conference Union, as a community of rights, pretty much, or similar to the Congregational Church order, (what a pity this had not succeeded,) this was also opposed, and in order to bring all the weight of both North and South to bear upon that monster (Episcopacy,) and truly a monster it is, in the hands of erring men, there had to be a seeming surrendering on the part of the lovers of universal personal liberty. You know what a faculty some persons have of laying their arms around the necks of others, and cousining them into measures: so in this case. Hence the compromise, leaving the slaveholding portion of the church, in peaceable, and full possession of their slave property, and still remaining members of the church. They assuming the moral as well as political right to the exercise of power over their slaves, without restriction.—Thus the church stands inseparably connected with slavery, without any well grounded hope of reform.—Thus, dear brethren, and friends, I have for your consideration, presented the foregoing remarks, drawn from matters of fact, and such as have become a part of history. If I have stated anything out of place, or given a wrong coloring to the matter in hand, when convinced of my error, I stand ready to take it back, with suitable acknowledgments.—Truth I love, sin I hate, and man's natural and inalienable rights I expect to contend for, while I can have a hearing among my brethren, and lovers of God and humanity. J. H. THOMAS.

Jacksonburg, O., April 28, 1847.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Wilmington, Ohio, May 24th, 1847.

Mr. Editor,—The "Evangelical Association of Free Methodists!" met, pursuant to adjournment at Port William, Ohio, on Thursday, May 20th, 1847. There not being a desirable quorum present, the Convention adjourned from day to day, until Saturday, 22d inst., when the Convention was duly organized by electing Rev. Sanford H. Flood, Moderator, (a dispassionate, moderate man, you know, for Moderator,) and Rev. J. H. Thomas, Scribe. I casually dropped in, on my way to our quarterly meeting, Saturday, about 11 o'clock, the Convention being fully organized, and consisting of Brs. J. M. Flood, S. H. Flood, J. H. Thomas, John Stout, and a certain Mr. Bailey, (not Gamalael, by any means.) Several committees were appointed, and to show that different men were on the various committees, they were thus arranged: A. B. C., C. B. A., B. A. C., &c. Well, I was told this morning, that this great convention, (for it is so claimed by its members,—great on account of the principles involved, and on account of the fidelity with which its members resist all moral evil.) I was going to say, the Convention was convulsed by the introduction of a resolution, by one of its members, on the subject of secret societies. After, I did not say an elaborate discussion, or discussion at all, but after considering the matter, the vote stood, two, yes, two for the resolution, and two against it. So the resolution was lost. The Convention, I presume, adjourned in the utmost harmony, and with prospects favorable for the future, as a comparatively large accession was received at the meeting on Sabbath night, after the adjournment of the session, to wit, three members. My prayer to God is that He may prosper them and us, and all, in every good word and work.

Yours, truly, ALANSON JONES.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor:—I see in a late number of the Recorder, a resolution of one of our Annual Conferences, for the call of a Convention, to enquire what is the relation the Methodist Protestant Church North sustain to slavery. The resolution itself only goes to enquire the relationship, but leaves the object of the enquiry quite out of view. To suppose for a moment that mere curiosity to ascertain that relationship, would be to charge the Conference with folly, and for other Annual Conferences to attempt to decide on the expediency of such a Convention, without something more tangible to act upon, would be folly in the extreme. The authors of the resolution must surely have something of vast importance in view, to justify the expense and trouble attendant on the assembling of such a convention. But that object with the Church at large, is mere conjecture. Come brethren, give us a little of your light. We cannot deal in mysteries; do not put your candle under a bushel—let the light be made manifest.

AN ENQUIRER AFTER LIGHT.

Pittsburgh, June, 1847.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Dreadful Steamboat Explosion.

The steamer Admiral arrived at New Orleans on the morning of the 9th inst., and bringing intelligence that the steamer Edna, Captain Phillips, on her way down from Ouchita, met with a dreadful accident. The Picayune says:—On the 4th instant, when opposite the town of Columbia, just as she was starting from the wharf, all four of her boilers exploded, killing twenty or more persons and severely injuring several others. The boat sunk immediately and nearly every thing on board was lost. Seventeen bodies had been found on the 7th instant. The subjoined list of the killed is supposed not to be perfect:

Passengers lost.—Judge Mayo, Harrisonburg, La.; Mr. Hill, Champagnole, Ark.; Mr. Odell, Union District, S. C.; Mr. King, Union District, S. C.; Mr. Daly, Clairborne, La.; and Mr. Jones, Florida.

Boat's hands lost.—Mr. Donaldson, George ———, Jim Watson, Jim Thomson, Patrick Gorhon, Thos. Plunket, D. Anderson; barkeeper, name not known; John H. Voss; James Pool, pilot; Austin Steager; ———Oliver, engineer; and two deck passengers, names not known.

Dr. John B. Lewis, of South Carolina, (for himself and William Evans and J. J. Stringer,) does not hesitate to attribute this disaster mainly to the misconduct of those having charge of the boat. In a letter to the Picayune he says:

"It presents another lamentable exhibtion of that recklessness of conduct which too frequently characterizes those individuals having charge of the lives and property of the travelling community. This boat was under the charge, as I understand, of the clerk, Mr. Johnson, and the chief mate; and the conduct of the crew during her passage up and down the river was the subject of conversation by every one. They were evidently in a state of excitement, and were supposed to have been under the influence of ardent spirits. When she arrived at Columbia many persons on shore remarked that she would certainly blow up, such was the peculiar whizzing sound escaping from her, and which was heard before she made the landing."

An Execution in Kentucky.—Wm. H. Stepter, a young man 17 years of age, was executed according to sentence, in Greenbush, Ky., on the 5th inst., for the murder of his mother. Nearly five thousand persons assembled to witness the closing scene, and strange as it may seem, full one-half of them were ladies—ladies, too, apparently of respectability and high breeding.

The act for which he suffered was committed, as every one thought, by the boy's father. He was arrested, and would unquestionably have been hanged, if his son, to whom no suspicion was ever attached, had not voluntarily come forward and released his father by declaring that he alone was the guilty person. The son was accordingly, convicted on his own confession. He had always previously borne the character of an inoffensive, goodhearted boy, and no motive can be assigned for the commission of the horrid act. He was a boy of a very weak mind—occasionally insane, it is said.

The African Squadron.—A letter from on board the U. S frigate United States, dated 28th March last, represents the health of the officers and men of the several ships of the squadron to have been, and still continue moderately good. "Our cruisers have been constantly and actively employed; and yet, notwithstanding the energy of the English, and the watchfulness of the French the slave trade flourishes, and wherever slaves are wanted, there they will be carried; the supply will be equal to the demand. I regret to say, that the humane coalition of the three great powers to put down the slave trade has signally failed. To colonize and settle the cost is the only feasible and available plan.—Baltimore Sun.

Immigrants via the St. Lawrence.—From last Wednesday's Montreal Herald we learn that 9,251 immigrants had arrived at Quebec, up to the 7th instant—that 52 vessels had left ports in Ireland, England and Scotland, between the 1st and 19th of May, for Quebec, with 14,592, none of which had arrived in America as yet—that on June 5th, there were 52 vessels detained at quarantine, at Grosse Isle (30 miles below Quebec,) with 14,000 passengers—and that things are improving very much at quarantine.

Important Arrest.—Captain Canot, the proprietor of a very extensive slaving establishment on the Coast of Africa, was arrested in N. York city, on Monday, by officer Smith, charged with having violated the laws of the United States relative to the slave trade, by having in December last fitted out at New York the Chancellor, to be engaged in the slave trade, in which he went as passenger to the Coast of Africa.

The Chuch of St. Philip de Neri, of Philadelphia, at an early hour on Tuesday morning, was crowded to suffocation, says the Pennsylvanian, to witness the solemn requiem mass, as performed by the Rev. Abbe de Massip, for the repose of the soul of Daniel O'Connell.

Another Gone.—We record to-day the departure of another old Jersey Blue, in the death of Thomas Lee, at Rahway, in this county. He expired yesterday, in the 91st year of his age. He was one of the old Revolutionary patriots of New Jersey, having been engaged in the battles of Long Island of Monmouth, and also in most of the actions on the line during the revolutionary struggle.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

Serious Accident.

The honoring of returning Volunteers, proves an expensive business. The incessant discharge of cannon with which they were greeted on Monday last, was suddenly suspended. The cause, we afterwards learned, was a serious accident. The gun went off prematurely, and killed one man outright—Mr. Joseph Fisk, and dangerously wounded another. "Mr. Fisk was blown into pieces, his body being nearly cut in two, and his limbs and entrails torn into fragments." A Mr. Lemaire had his arm shattered, so that it had to be amputated at the shoulder. His recovery is considered doubtful. Another man had his thumbs blown off. The accident suspended all further proceedings for the day, and changed the aspect of Covington, where it happened, from hilarity to gloom.

Another.—The firing was resumed in Covington, on Tuesday with like sad resuls. The cannon went off again prematurely, and seriously injured two of the Volunteers. Jesse Doane had both his hands shot off, and Mr. Gracy one. Another man was seriously burned by the explosion. Who can fail to see the frown of Heaven in these calamities? The sufferers have our sincere commisseration, and this one consolation in their case, viz that they were not wounded in an attempt to shoot and mangle their fellow creatures.—Cin. Prot.

Destructive Hail Storm at Peoria, Ill.—A Child Killed by Lightning.—Peoria was visited on Saturday week by one of the most terrific hail storms ever recorded. It continued for half an hour, accompanied with high winds and heavy thunder; many of the hail stones that fell, measured from three to six inches in circumference. The destruction of property was very great; all the glass in the windows exposed to it were broken, and even the sash was cut through in many instances, while the gardens and fruit trees suffered great damage. The forest trees were stripped of their foliage and small branches, and after the storm had passed, every thing around wore a shattered aspect. The house of Captain Moss was struck by lightning during the storm, and killed a little girl about eight years of age.

A Nunnery in Pennsylvania.—The Catholics have purchased the beautiful estate of Mr. Cowperthwait, on the Delaware river, near Adalusia, Bucks county, for $30,000. It is stated that it is to be converted into a nunnery.

Awful Calamity.

A paper published at Charleston, Ill., gives publicity to an accident of a heart rending character which occurred in the vicinity of Oakaw, near that place, on Sunday the 30th ult. On the afternoon of that day, Mr. Chandler, his wife, his son William's wife and child, his own son and daughter, and a Mrs. Mosely, were going to preaching in a two horse wagon. Before they reached their destination, a storm came upon them with all the fury of terrific violence. There was but one tree from which any danger was to be apprehended, and Mr. Chandler, (who was driving) had his attention directed to it. He scarcely saw it falling; but it fell, and with its fall crushed those on the back seat, Mrs. Mosely, Mrs. Chandler and child. Mrs. Mosely and the child were instantly killed, and Mrs. Chandler survived one half hour. Mrs. Mosely's skull was fractured completely across, while the injuries of Mrs. Chandler and child were principally upon the limbs and body. The others escaped without injury, as it was the body of the tree which fell on the wagon.—Cincinnati Dollar Weekly Commercial.

The Mormon Temple.—This celebrated edifice has been sold to a committee of the Catholic Church, for $75,000. This community have also purchased other property at Nauvoo. The building is to be appropriated to educational purposes, connected with the church into whose hands it has passed. The contract requires only the sanction of the Bishop, to complete it.

Melancholy Case of Drowning.—Theodore Smith, 19 years of age, son of Jos. H. Smith, was drowned in the Schuylkill, near Philadelphia, while bathing on Monday afternoon.

Mount Benedict.—We are authorised to state, says the Boston Times, that the report that the convent at Mount Benedict has been sold, is incorrect. It is not for sale and has not been.

Major Hammond, better known as Gen. Hammond, of Milton, Pa., recently appointed paymaster in the army, died lately on his passage from Vera Cruz to New Orleans. He formerly represented his district in Congress. A son of his, attached to the United States Dragoons, was killed a few months since in one of the engagements in California. The remains of Major Hammond were conveyed to New Orleans by the steamer Orleans.

Shipwrecks and Great Loss of Life.—The correspondent of the Montreal Herald gives some particulars of the loss of three emigrant ships bound for Quebec from England and Ireland, and several hundred human beings had found a watery grave. In addition to the Miracle, wrecked near the Magdalen Islands, with the loss of sixty-four drowned and thirty dead from fever, (some account of which we have before published,) the Zenobia with 179 passengers, has also been wrecked at Manadieu, and the brig Carricks also, about four miles eastward of Cape Rosier. Out of 167 passengers in the latter vessel, only 48 reached the shore. These disasters all happened in the latter part of May.

Chicago, Illinois.—The New York Courier has an article descriptive of Chicago, the city in Illinois at which the River and Harbor Convention is to assemble on the 5th of July. In the opening of its article the Courier says:

"Chicago is now a large city. At the close of the Black Hawk war, not more than 14 years ago, the site now covered by a city of many thousand inhabitants, and with all the arts and elegancies, the substance and the comforts of long civilization and settlements—was a frontier military outpost, which had no habitation without its pickets, and few or none but for the accommodation of a small garrison within.

Doctor Albert G. Upham died at Boston on Tuesday night, of Typhus Fever, which he had taken in the discharge of his duties. He was distinguished for ability in his profession and high moral worth, and was a professor of anatomy in the College of Castleton, Vermont. He was the son of the member of Congress from N. Hampshire, brother of the professor in Bowdoin College, the Doctor in this city, Judge U. of N. Hampshire, and the late Doctor U. of Waterford, N. Y. He published several medical works.

More Counterfeits.—Counterfeit one dollar bills on the State Bank of Indiana are in circulation. They are pretty well executed, and may deceive the uncautious. They are somewhat paler than the genuine, and the paper is of a stiffer texture. A merchant on Fifth street took three of them on Saturday. Look out.—Cincinnati Dollar Weekly Commercial.

☞ Our exchanges all around us, in Virginia and Maryland, bring most cheering accounts of the crops. Everything looks well, especially the wheat, which in wholesome abundance rapidly ripens to the harvest.—Balt. Sun.

The Tongue.—There is a world of meaning in the following from an old scrap book:

If thou wishest to be wise,
Keep these words before thine eyes:
What thou speakest, and how, beware,
Of whom, to whom, when and where.

Worthy of Imitation.—The sum of $8,000 has recently been raised, by subscription, in the city of Providence, R. I., for the purchase of forty-two pews, containing 206 sittings, in Grace church, to be forever free! An example which ought to be followed by every church and society in this city of every denomination.

A Fatal Accident occurred in the University College (as we learn from the European Journal) in dissecting the body of Harvey Leach, alias Hervio Nano, the gnome fly or man monkey, whose performances in N. Y. used to attract thousands to the Bowery Theatre. He left orders that at his decease his body should be given to Mr. Liston, of the University College, for disposal. Mr. Liston handed it over to Mr. Potter, who on dissecting it, prick ed his finger with the lancet. This caused little care beyond placing his hand in a sling for a day or two; but on the third day fever ensued, abcesses formed on the hand, extending up to the muscle of the arm and over the chest, causing great agony. Death finally put an end to his suffering.

Father McElroy, the Catholic missionary of the Rio Grande, is now in Cincinnati, and was to preach on Sunday last in the Cathedral in that city.

POETRY.

Written for the Western Recorder.

My Cottage Home.

I'd not exchange my cottage home,
Its wild woods and its flowers,
For all your stately halls and domes,
Your gardens and your bowers.

Its social board and cheerful hearth,
And friends all gathered round,
With many a joyous laugh and mirth,
Are in my cottage found.

Its singing birds, and purling streams,
Which through the meadow flow;
Its beauteous sights and pleasant scenes,
Its sunset splendid glow.

I'd not exchange my cottage home,
Its groves and shady ways,
For all the wealth your city boasts,
Or splendor it displays. [NORA.

Devotional Lines.

My God, my hope, my friend,
On thee I would rely;
And unto thee my wishes send,
Far, far above the sky.

* * * * * *

I bid my passions all awake,
Whilst I before thee fall.
And now, dear Savior, for thy sake,
I on the Father call.

Eternal Spirit, now assist
My weak, unsteady mind,
That I to thee may ever list,
Blest agent of mankind.

My all to thee I now submit;
My guilt, my sin remove:
O may that Blood so freely spilt,
Cause me to ever love—

That blessed one that died for me,
And in his footsteps tread,
That I with him may happy be,
When my spirit from earth has fled.

PAUL PRY IN REPLY TO J. H.

A plain, candid, face foremost reply to the inquiries of J. H. on the unstationed minister question, by the self same Paul Pry, hailing from the self same place, Home, June 18th, 1847.

Mr. Editor—Sir: At the time I prepared the communication, headed, "All hands ahoy, Paul Pry and the local preachers," I had but one object in view, and that was, to set forth the advantages of an unstationed minister in the M. P. Church, over and above those enjoyed by a local preacher or minister in the M. E. Church; on this subject thus far there has been no contradiction, even Br. J. H. admits all that has been set forth, and even goes further than Paul P. and says that (they) "the local preachers of the M. E. Church can never hope to enjoy the rights and privileges secured to the unstationed ministers of the M. P. Church," and thus places them in hopeless despair. The Br. then proceeds to state, "he takes it for granted that Br. Pry knew the object of the organization of the M. P. Church; to wit, to secure the mutual rights of every department of the church." To this I answer, this has always been my understanding of the subject, it is for this I have for the last fourteen years of my life, contended, it is for this I write; it is this I wish to see accomplished, if it is not already secured.

Br. J. H. further states "he will feel himself under obligations to Br. Pry if he will point him to any section or item either in the discipline or constitution which authorizes an unstationed minister to vote for a representative, either lay or ministerial to an Annual Conference, other than to attend the Electoral colleges." Well now my good Br., I am pleased to have the opportunity of pointing you to the law and testimony, if I write not according to this, it is because there is no light in me. Get your discipline, Sir, turn to page 29, Article 12, of the Constitution, item 1st, read it. "EVERY MINISTER and preacher and every white lay member in full communion and fellowship having attained to the age of twenty-one years, shall be entitled to a vote in ALL CASES." Now Br. Batavian, acknowledge the corn, for certainly the election of a representative to an Annual Conference is one of the cases on which they may vote, if indeed they may vote in all cases; how it has happened that my worthy Br. J. H. overlooked this prominent item of the Constitution I cannot tell, as it is the great safe-guard of our right of franchise; hope however he will turn to it, and on this subject be perfectly satisfied, but before I dismiss it I beg leave to turn to the discipline pages 54 & 55, (turn over, Sir,) here the manner of electing delegates to the Annual Conference, both in Stations and Circuits is set forth; (where the Annual Conferences do not prescribe some other mode,) in Stations it is said, "the election shall be by the male members under the direction of the Stewards." In Circuits all qualified male members belonging to the Circuit may vote if present." It will be seen that the discipline sets forth the election only on general terms, whilst the Constitution particularizes. You know Br. J. H. that laws must be enacted agreeable to Constitution. The Constitution says, every minister and preacher shall be entitled to a vote in all cases, who then can prevent him? who dares attempt to prevent him? and if any tyrannical, overbearing Steward, should stop him at the polls, his gun is double triggered, (if he is a white man) he can claim membership, he can challenge as to color, and is of proper age, and therefore strictly entitled to a vote,—But as a minister independent of color, or age, no man on earth, according to our Constitution and book of discipline, can bar the statute of the right of suffrage in his case; true the discipline says nothing about ministers either itinerant, or unstationed, voting in the case, but his majesty the Constitution stands by at the time of the election, and says in language loud as peals of thunder, Mr. Steward, take notice, Sir, these ministers are to vote in all cases—and the voice of this majestic instrument, is neither to be unheeded, nor misunderstood. How Br. J. H. deprives the unstationed minister of the right of franchise, (with the discipline in his hand,) and make him stand back like a bound boy at a husking, and give him neither part nor lot in the matter, is, I must confess, something past my comprehension.

I turn my attention for a moment to the abscision of heads spoken of by my friend J. H., and beg leave to inform him, that according to my mode of computation, I shall save him the trouble and expense of taking 10 off heads, as the difference between 50 and 66—is 16 instead of 26 as stated by the Br., now as the taking off of heads must be a very unpleasant task, I think he will be pleased to save even the official life of so many good brethren. If however this No. 26 is a typographical error, this piece of pleasantry, is most cordially taken back, but if a slip of the pen, take notice, I have a right to pry into it, and accordingly rectify it. Now, Sir, I am of the opinion, if every Station, Circuit, and Mission, that has an unstationed minister would send him to the Electoral College,—in nine cases out of ten, they would have a majority of ministers in the College—making an allowance amongst the Itinerants for superannuated men, Home missionaries who seldom or never attend, probationary preachers who have no seat in Conference, not being ordained, and others whose temporal circumstances prevent them from attending Conference, reducing the number of these 50 Itinerants in the Pittsburgh Conference to perhaps not more than 40 in actual attendance. When the College is formed should there be found present an unstationed minister from each of the Cts., Sts., &c., there would be enough to effect all that J. H. asks; the prevention of the election of any Br. or brethren opposed to the rights of the unstationed ministry. Once for all however, as an individual I have no objection to the unstationed ministers voting in the College separate and apart from the Itinerants, though I do not see any thing in the Constitution or discipline, either to warrant it, or prevent it; certain it is, in my mind that every thing necessary to secure the rights of unstationed brethren is, to make those rights known. Our motto is mutual rights, and while you by electing one preacher leave another at home, we by the same principle leave our probationers out of Conference and our superannuated members, &c., bringing every thing as near equal as possible.

Yours, &c., PAUL PRY.

Answer to Some Questions.

Mr. Editor—In the 36th No. of your paper there appears an article headed "a few questions for those who can answer." Now Sir, I do not have the audacity to think that I am the person to whom he directs his questions, but it may not be amiss to say a few words in reply (to "W. S. S.") And first, he says (or rather asks the question) "Have we not the history of secret societies from the days of Moses?" Answer—yes, this is true; well, where do we find this history? Answer—in the Bible; well, did Moses or Moses' God condemn them? No. Why did they not? because there was nothing to condemn in them—(a very good reason.)

Secondly, he says that "St. Paul alludes to these societies and condemns them." And where does he find the place? Is it where Paul was caught up in the third heavens, and saw things which it was not lawful for him to utter or make known? Did he condemn this society in which he was at that time, and yet this society had a secret that Paul would not reveal? But "could all the apostles form such a society?" It seems so, for when the disciples met, they closed the doors for fear of the Jews, and likewise they met in caves and dens of the earth, secluded from the world in their transactions; this was their "city under ground." But says the writer "mark a secret society formed in the name and by the authority of their Lord and Master." And is there no precedent given by Christ for such a society amongst the disciples? Says the writer, no. Why then did the apostle say, "how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?" John 14: 22, and 24. The reason that Christ gives is because they have not the secret which the disciples had. "For the secret of the Lord is with them that love him." Psalms 25 and 14. But says the writer, "a man (who belongs to a secret society) can do no good in the moral world." I ask, has Jesus Christ done no good in the moral world? The writer does not say, no. And does the gentleman think that he knows all that Christ does, or does he think that he knows all that the society knows in which Christ lives now, or would the gentleman acknowledge that there are some things known by Christ and in heaven, which he does not know? If he acknowledges this fact, then is it not clear that Christ lives in a secret society? Then it follows clearly, that there can be good done by one who has some things secreted—for this is the nature of all secret societies, (at least so far as I am acquainted.) "But says the writer, there cannot be a soul saved in such societies." It is an old proverb "that what has been done once can be done again." I remember of having read in a certain place in a certain book called the New Testament—"John 20th chapter, and 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th verses," when those who had the secret of the Lord had met in secret "conclave," that there was a sinner amongst them by the name of Thomas, and he then and there received the evidence that proved effectual in his salvation;" and, Mr. Editor, if Jesus Christ did enter into such a secret conclave as that, and save a sinner, would the writer dare say that he never since that time, or never will again enter such a place on the same mission? Then Mr. Editor, "in all seriousness, I close," by saying that it is my opinion that Solomon died before W. S. S. was born. Yours, &c.,

HARRIET JOHNSON.

Deceased, on the 24th of May last, Harriet daughter of John & Nancy Johnson in her 16th year.

Harriet was the only child of her mother, and seemed to be the great tie by which she was bound to the numerous family of her deceased husband, by his first wife.

On this daughter the widowed mother placed a high regard, not only on account of the peculiar condition she occupied in the family, but also, on account of the amiableness of her disposition her companionable habits and her ardent piety.

On the 4th inst, she embraced salvation by faith, and was enabled to rejoice in God her Saviour, the love of God being shed abroad in her heart; she embraced her mother in her arms and exclaimed. "Oh! mother I love you, and I love the Saviour too, for he hath said, they that seek shall find, and he is as good his word," she expressed her sorrow, that she must leave her mother, but consoled her disconsolate parent, by assuring her, that God, the widow's husband, would take care of her. She exhorted her mother, and family, all to meet her in heaven, and spoke in terms of the strongest confidence of meeting her dear Father, who had gone before, from the church militant to the church triumphant. "That said she is a land that flows with milk and Honey," and tho' naturally timid and retiring, she was enabled to meet the king of terrors, assured that when she would walk through the dark valley and shadow of death, the Lord would be with her, his rod and staff would comfort her.

The morning before her departure, she said to her friends "my suffering time will soon be o'er." On being asked if she thought her end was nigh, she answered, "O yes, and I shall go to a better world than this." O, bless the good Lord.—After some moments spent in silence, she desired to have prayer made, during which she was extremely happy, and exclaimed "O, sweet Jesus." O, bless the good Lord." And with many other such expressions did she evidence the glory and excellence of the Christian Religion; comfort the hearts of her numerous acquaintances—and friends and especially her disconsolate parent. Her funeral was largely attended at the meeting house in Springer's neighborhood, and the occasion improved with a discourse by the writer of this. Yours,

WM. H. MARSHALL.

JONATHAN CARLISLE.

DIED, on the evening of Friday, June 18th, Mr. Jonathan Carlisle, and old resident of Brush Creek township, aged about sixty-nine years.

The occasion of his death was the unprecedented rise in the water of Brush Creek on that day.

He had for a number of years resided in a small apartment within the mill of Mr. Wm. Frazier. It is supposed as the waters rose he thought best to leave (from the articles found about him when taken out of the water) but from some cause not known, probably from the falling of some of the ouside timbers he was precipitated into the water, and was either struck by the fall of timber, or fell on to it, as his head was much bruised. He was found about two hundred yards below the mill. On the Sabbath following he was interred in the Zanesville Cemetery, where a number of his family had found a resting place.

Mr. Carlisle removed to this county from Pennsylvania, some thirty years ago, purchased a large tract of land, something over a section; but not being given to the acquisition of wealth, and not possessing the shrewdness of most of his Quaker friends, to which denomination he had a great partiality, if not a member; he had disposed of all his land and left with very little of this world's goods.

He had however the name of an Honest Man. Beloved by all his neighbors, all speak kindly and respectfully of him, and all lament his sudden and tragical death. Calm and unruffled he met all the changing scenes of life. Amidst the losses of property and dear friends, was never known to complain. But mild and benign at doing all the good he could to his neighbors, and sitting in his little room, making his brooms and baskets and with the contentment of a philosopher, and we hope a christian philosopher, enjoying his little, and knowing with the poet he should not want that little long, he waited his appointed time—It came! a crash! a plunge! and all was over!! dust returned to dust and the soul to God who gave it. May the great Patriarch above receive him into that haven of rest, where sorrow shall never come, and love and harmony reign forever. H. S.

Western Sketches.

The Lakes of North America.

The chain of "Fresh-water Mediterraneans" that go so largely towards dividing the territory of "Uncle Sam" from the domains of Queen Victoria are a geographical wonder. Extending from east to west over nearly fifteen and a half degrees of longitude, they seem, regarding them upon the map, to rest like a crown of waters upon the head of the Union, their centre of gravity; the Island of Macinac, balancing upon the meridian which separates Indiana and Ohio, equi-divides Kentucky and Tennessee, and passes between Georgia and Alabama, and East and West Florida, in the Gulf of Mexico. The difference in the latitude of the northern & southern extreme points of the Lakes is not far from eight & a half degrees. The estimated area of country draining into them si 400,000 square miles; the extent covered by the waters of the whole is 93,000 sqr. miles, divided as follows:—Ontario, 6,300; Erie, 9,600; St. Clair, 1,060; Huron, 20,400; Michigan, including the Bay, 24,400; Superior 32,000. The waters of the "Father of Lakes" (Superior) are 568 feet above the level of the sea; which elevation is attained by unequal gradations, each lake rising above the previous one from Ontario to Superior. The surface of the waters of Ontario is 232 feet above the tide-water of the St. Lawrence—Erie rises 333 feet above Ontario—St. Clair, 6 feet above Erie—Huron and Michigan are 13 feet higher than St. Clair—and Superior rises 44 feet above those.

The St. Clair is by far the shallowest of the Lakes, the average depth being about 20 feet; Erie averages in depth about 85 feet—Ontario 500—Superior 900—Huron and Michigan 1,000, as nearly as can be arrived at. The deepest soundings are found in Lake Huron; off Saginaw Bay, we are told, leads have sunk, 1,800 feet, or 1,200 feet below the level of the Atlantic Ocean, without reaching the bottom.

Great difference is observable in the transparency and purity of the water of the several Lakes. Those of Ontario, Erie, and the southern part of Michigan have no peculiar excellence—while those of the northern part of Lake Michigan and Lake Huron surpass in clearness and flavor any waters of which we have ever drunk, though a still greater purity and a higher relish is said, by those who have visited that Lake, to distinguish the waters of Superior.

So completely transparent are the waters of Huron, that the rays of the sun are said to pass through them as through the cloudless atmosphere, without meeting with solid matter in suspension to elicit their heat. Thus Dr. Drake accounts for the fact, which he himself ascertained by experiment, that the water on the surface, and that 200 feet below the same spot, had precisely the same temperament, fifty-six degrees.

Through the Welland Canal the navigation of the Lakes is uninterrupted for the distance of 844 miles from east to west: the distance north and south is, of course, various, ranging from 347 miles as the extreme distance. The country to which these waters are the great highway of transport has often been the theme of high-wrought eulogium, for the variety and richness of its soil, and the extent of its resources. The justness of these praises, as well as the extent to which this fertility has been subjected to the hand of culture, and the rapidity with which these resources are being developed, under the life-bringing touch of the enterprize which peculiarly characterizes its inhabitants, is gathered from the bare glance at the fact that the commerce of the four great Lakes, including all capital afloat, during the year 1843, was estimated by the Topographical Bureau at 65,000,000 of dollars. The total amount expended by the general Government of the United States on these Lakes for the improvement necessary to protect and convenience this commerce is stated by Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, at 2,100,000 dollars.

When the projected ship canal around the falls of Ste. Marie shall be completed, the wide expanse of Lake Superior will be added to the present extent of the Lake navigation, allowing the adventurous commercialist to crowd some 175 miles still farther north, and several hundred farther west. The length of the road proposed to be cut by this canal is said to be but three-fourths of a mile, and the whole expense of the improvement is estimated, if we rightly remember, at 230,000 dollars. By this comparatively small outlay, access is at once obtained to the whole country tributary to Lake Superior—a tract so rich in timber and mineral wealth, that it has not unaptly been termed "the Denmark of America."

The following is a most accurate statement of the length, width, expenses, &c., of the respective Lakes, which cannot fail to be interesting to our readers:—

THE GREAT LAKES.

	Greatest length.		Greatest width.		Aver. depth.
		MILES.		MILES.	FEET.
Ontario	"	180	"	40	500
Erie	"	270	"	80	200
Huron	"	250	"	100	900
Superior	"	350	"	150	900

Of these, the surface of Lake Superior has been calculated to be 1,048 feet above the level of the high tide of the sea; Lake Huron is 570 above the level of ditto; Lake Erie 330 feet above the level of Lake Ontario, and 566 feet above the Hudson at Albany. The Ontario is 218 feet above the St. Lawrence and Three Rivers.—Simmond's Colonial Magazine.

NEWS ITEMS.

Independent Post-Office.—Jas. W. Hale, so well known as an independent letter carrier between New York city and Boston previous to the reduction in the public rates of postage, is about to resume business on his old route. He will take letters for three cents.

A cotton factory at Pittsfield, Otsego county N. Y., has been again destroyed by fire. Estimated loss $150,000.

Appalling Accident.—A lad of nine years of age, named Victor Hemphill, fell from a baggage car, while in motion, on the Columbia railroad, near Philadelphia, on Tuesday, and was most shockingly mutilated. The wheel crushed his left arm, from the tips of his fingers to his shoulder; his right arm was crushed half way between his wrist and his elbow, and one foot and leg was dreadfully shattered. He was conveyed to the hospital, and though he still survived in the evening, his death was looked for every moment. Another warning to boys to beware of riding upon the cars.

Accident at Trenton, N. J.—Four persons were buried in a gravel pit, on Monday evening, at Trenton, New Jersey—a father and his two sons, and a laboring man named Temple. One of the sons managed to extricate himself, and before assistance arrived succeeded in rescuing his brother and father. Temple died before he was taken out.

Dreadful Railroad Accident and Death.—On Thursday week, in the town of York, Pa., as a train of burden cars were leaving the depot for Baltimore, a son of Mr. Reichert, aged four years, (deaf and dumb,) was accidentally run over, and instantly killed, the whole train passing over him, severing the head, four fingers, and the arm above the elbow, completely from the body.

The barn, carriage-house and stables of Mr. Joseph R. Stewart, near Cambridge, Md., were entirely consumed by fire on Thursday night, together with all of his corn, and a number of farming utensils, that were in the barn at the time.

A large fire occurred at Columbus, Ga., on the 6th instant. Loss about $16,000. Mr. Goetches was the heaviest sufferer.

Great Mortality on Ship Board.—The St. John (N. B.) papers of the 11th inst., received by the Boston Daily Advertiser, quote letters from Miramichi, stating that the ship Looshtauk, Capt. Tahin, from Liverpool for Quebec, with about 400 emigrants, put into that place on Thursday last, in distress, having lost 140 passengers by disease, and that all the crew, with the exception of four, were laid up with sickness.

Sheriff Taylor, of Kent county, Delaware, died last week of the "black tongue," the second or third case in the same family. This disease appears to be of an epidemic or endemic character—an erysipelas affection, which seizes upon the palate and glands of the throat, swelling them, as well as the head, to an extraordinary size, until death ensues.

Outrage.—Some scoundrels in Boston have been throwing bottles filled with tar and grease through the house windows of Deacon Grant, the well known temperance advocate and friend of Gough. Considerable damage was done to the carpets and furniture.

Drowned.—Mr. B. B. Steel, a student of Lafayette College, and son of the Rev. B. Steel, of Abington, Pa., was drowned while bathing in the Delaware, about a mile above Easton, Md., on Thursday. He had repaired thither (it being the usual place of bathing) in company with some half a dozen other students, and undertaking the difficult task of swimming the river, he sunk within a few feet of the opposite shore before assistance could reach him.

Serious Accident.—On Sabbath evening last, the 13th of June, as Miss Shoemaker, daughter of Daniel Shoemaker, of Frederick county, Md., was returning home from a meeting, and when about 2 miles from Boonsborough, her horse became frightened at a heavy clap of thunder and threw her, badly breaking her arm, and otherwise severely injuring her person. The lightning struck but a few rods distant from her.—Baltimore Sun.

Drowned.—Mrs. Cornwell, a respectable lady aged 55 years, was found drowned in the cistern of her house, No. 33 Hawk street. The deceased, who leaves a family, had been for some time laboring under an aberration of mind.—[Albany Argus.

Mortality.—Out of 60,000 persons who made the last pilgrimage to Mecca, no fewer than 20,000 died of the cholera.

Killed by Lightning.—On last Sunday, Miss Ann Brooks, aged about 20 years, was killed by lightning. She was standing at the time near a tree in her father's yard, which the lightning struck. She was the only daughter of Thomas Brooks, Esq., of this county, and who resides near the Calaway line.—Columbia (Mo.) Statesman.

Distressing Casualty.—We learn from the Hagerstown Herald of Freedom, "that Mr. William Schleigh met with an accident on Saturday morning last, about five miles from Hagerstown, Md., which resulted in his death. When in the act of mounting his horse, the stirrup broke and he fell to the ground, the horse falling on him, injuring him internally. He has left a wife and five children."—Baltimore Sun.

From the Boston Reporter.

A Sermon twice Preached.

Mr. Editor:—Permit me through your columns, to mention an interesting incident in my rambles through the country. The 1st day of May, a bright sunny day, as you well know, found me pleasantly strolling around a delightful village, not thirty miles from your goodly city. I will not stop to describe the place, as your readers all know what a country village is. Suffice it to say, I found sufficient attraction to induce me to spend the following day which was the Sabbath. Although the weather was unpropitious I found upon entering the church in the afternoon, a large congregation assembled. After the usual preparatory services, the preacher rose and commenced his sermon with this preface: "I propose to deliver a discourse this afternoon, which was the first which I preached in this place, and which was delivered on the first Sabbath in May, 1798." The text was in Genesis 1. 1. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." Subject; the power and goodness of God, and the immensity of his works.

The sermon, as you may well imagine, was full of interest, both on account of its own worth and the circumstances attending its delivery. What reflections was it calculated to awaken in the minds of those who heard it, particularly, the very few present, who heard that preacher's voice, in his first appeal to his people!

Here then was a man, through all the changes and revolutions which have taken place, and which have rent so many Churches in pieces, has, for forty nine years, gone in and out before his people, followed most of the members of the Church then gathered, to their last resting place and who now stands before these his spiritual children, speaking to them words rendered serious and weighty, by the wisdom and experience of half a century. An interesting scene truly, to witness a pastor standing as a connecting link between the past and present generation, directing attention to the rapidity of time, as exemplified in his own experience, and to the many changes which must inevitably take place, before another such lapse of time. And long may he live, a guide and counsellor to the Church, a witness for truth, and a monument of the goodness of God.

It may not be amiss to suggest to ministers, as they sometimes wish to use their old notes, that if they will labor in one place till their first sermon is forty nine years old they may safely venture upon the experiment of repeating it. How many by this rule, would ever preach an old sermon?

I. The dispensation of the Gospel the subject of prophetic anticipation.

II. The evangelic announcement of the Savior's nativity.

III. The divine mandate at the incarnation of the Son of God.

IV. The introduction of the Mediatorial economy the subject of rejoicing in heaven.

V. The work of grace on the day of Pentecost the model for religious revivals.

VI. The primitive Evanglisits the patterns of all succeeding preachers.

VII. The divine institution for saving the world.

VIII. The moral revolutions which the triumphs of the Gospel accomplish.

IX. The religious excitement produced by the successful preaching of the Gospel, defended.

XI. The penitent sinner on earth the delight of the Angels in heaven.

XII. The final consummation of the dispensation of grace in the solemnities of the day of judgment.

The views embodied in these discourses are such as are held in common by all evangelical denominations. The author eschews all controversy. The style is didactic. Nothing sectarian has a place in these sermons, which are simply devoted to popular impression and instruction. It is proposed to put to the Press these Sermons as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers have been secured to justify their publication. If the author meet with adequate encouragement in the sale of this first Volume, it will be succeeded by a second, and so on.

[The contents of the second, third, fourth and fifth volumes are also given in the prospectus which has been furnished us, but as the first volume is to be published separately, the above will sufficiently for the present, indicate the nature and plan of the work. Ed.]

The whole of these discourses were prepared and delivered during a not unsuccessful ministry of upwards of twenty years, partly in this country and partly in Great Britain; and are already committed to writing.

Each Volume will be sold at the moderate charge of One Dollar, to be paid for on delivery.

The Volumes will be neatly bound,—octavo size,—and printed on good paper, in a clear type. Each Volume will contain upwards of three hundred pages. Subscriptions will be received for the first Volume alone; or for the first and second; or the whole series may be subscribed for at once.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Shall the Sword devour Forever?"

Oh! Prince of Peace, when shall it be,
That thy benignant reign,
Shall bind the earth from sea to sea,
In love's unbroken chain?

When shall the brazen trump of war
No longer spread alarms,
But every tribe of earth abhor
The clashing din of arms?

When shall the earth no more be gorged
With blood of battle fields;
And implements of peace be forged
From guns, and swords and shields;

The sword—the sword—the ruthless sword,
Has bath'd in human gore,
As hist'ry's faithful leaves record,
From earliest days of yore.

The flood—the flood—the crimson flood!
How long—how deep—how wide,
Has swell'd the ceaseless stream of blood,
Since the first fratricide!

The groans—the groans—the dying groans,
From many a field of death,
Have mix'd their melancholy tones
With midnight's chilly breath.

The tears—the tears—the widow's tears,
Have fall'n a ceaseless rain,
For him—her hope for future years,
In war untimely slain.

The aged parent's piercing wail,
The tender orphan's cry,
Have floated on the burden'd gale,
And rent the troubled sky.

The duteous son—the tender sire,
Their only earthly stay,
Upon the gory field expire,
From lov'd ones far away.

Unfurl thy banner Prince of Peace,
And let it nobly float,
Till hush'd—forever hush'd shall cease
War's last discordant note.

AID SOCIETY.

NO. II.

BR. BASSETT: In my last I took up the five dollar plan, which, I am satisfied, could be accomplished if a right course was pursued, and each minister and member felt that they were personally interested. But, for the present, we will drop this, and make another proposition which I know can be met; it is this: suppose each member within the Pittsburgh District should contribute only one dollar, and when you find one who is not able to do this, you may find five who are able to give the five dollars. This would amount to $7,000; this, as a permanent fund, would yield annually $420, which sum would greatly relieve the wants of the poor widows, orphans, and superannuated ministers that we have among us. I am persuaded the church-member, who has the ability and will not contribute this small sum out of the much that God has given him, has not religion enough to carry him safe to heaven. If I have any thing like a correct knowledge of the Christian religion, charity is the crowning grace; and where this is not found religion is unknown. Can it be possible for any man to enjoy the love of God in his soul, and at the same time cherish all the selfish principles of the MISER in his heart? That most inhuman wretch who sets among his riches, and with a look, which hell might be ashamed of, drives the poor away without alms. Of all the creatures GOD has made, and in their nostrils breathed a living soul, such a one is the most fallen, most prone, most earthly, most debased. Illustrus fool, selling eternity for time.

"Faith," says Dr. Clark, "is the foundation upon which the Christian builds. Hope rears the superstructure. But charity finishes, completes, and crowns it in blessed eternity." Charity is a delightful theme, resembling the songs which are continually sung before the LAMB. Hence says our blessed Saviour,—"it is more blessed to give, than to receive." Again, says Mr. Watson, "in the popular sense, charity is alms-giving; a duty of practical christianity which is solemnly enjoined, and to which special provisions are annexed." O, that there was more of this in the M. P. Church!

In all probability, many of our old soldiers who have been in the field some thirty or forty years, should they become unable to travel, would have to suffer, they have not means to feed and clothe themselves six months, and were they called home to heaven, the same might be said of them, that Mr. John Wesley said of one in his day:—he says John Lane, a preacher, took a fever by travelling on foot to an appointment one very hot day." All his clothing, linen, and woollen stockings, hat, and wig, are not sufficient to answer his funeral expenses, which amount to one pound seventeen shillings and three pence. All the money he had was, one shilling and four pence. What a CENOTAPH is this to stand upon the history of the church, to the honor of the good people amongst whom he labored. They did not possess that charity which goes about in search of poverty and misery. I suppose they were just such a people as our Dutch brother names, "O, vat a long sited beobles da were." Could see much better far off, than they could at home.—We have some of those people in Pennsylvania, who need no telescope, they see any and every thing that is going on in the world, but the poor preacher and his family.

We read the sad story of poor James, the membership read it, we all read it, we all drop the sympathizing tear, and say that it was hard.—Yet the same epitaph might be written upon the tomb-stone of many of the ministers of the gospel in this christian land, in the nineteenth century. The good people in this our day, can see backwards, and forwards, and a great way off into other lands, and appear to forget that charity begins at home. I will here state one or two facts which I am pretty well acquainted with.—Shortly after I entered the Itinerancy, one of our travelling ministers had an appointment in the town in which I lived. I went to hear him; I have heard but few better sermons—had a feeling time,—good meeting. This brother travelled a circuit, I think of upwards of two hundred members, some of them wealthy farmers, you would have thought, could you have heard them converse upon the subject of slavery, that they were the most religious, benevolent, and sympathetic people in all the world, just ready for heaven, yet you may think strange, I would not have given six and a fourth cents for all the clothes that the minister had upon his person, his coat especially, you could scarcely have told of what it was made at first, it was patch upon patch. It looked as though he had a wife who had done her part in keeping it together; nothing but poverty could have given the poor woman patience enough to sew such a great number of patches upon it.—I said to myself, that I would much sooner take a mission to the heathen, than preach for that people. I am glad that it has never been my lot to labor among such a people. Every person was enquiring, is that the best coat that Mr. M——— has? I felt ashamed that this was the condition of a poor minister in the Methodist Protestant Church,—members of other churches felt ashamed,—the world was ashamed. Measures were immediately taken to get him a coat, I believe a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church made it free for him. Thus the circuit upon which the brother labored was disgraced, many of them were loud professors. In the language of Rev. Mr. Neal, "such a people may shout, and shout, until they burst their windpipes, and shout themselves down to hell at last, unless they do better." Again, I am credibly informed, during the last year, in this land of plenty, a minister upon a circuit, I will say of something like two hundred members, had not within his house a morsel of meal of any kind for two weeks, his family had to live upon some potatoes he had raised himself. This all took place within a short distance of farmers who were members of the Church and in good circumstances, plenty of every thing, some I think owned as much as four hundred acres of land. Had I been a member upon that circuit, I would have sold the coat from my back sooner than have heard his poor children crying for bread, and had I been their preacher, I would have gone to work with my hands sooner than have starved my family. O, charity! dost thou sympathize with sighs, tears, and groans,—art thou god-like, ready to heal all misery? Find out the members of the church of God upon this circuit. Hast thou taken thine everlasting flight? With silent footsteps tread this dreary region once more, and teach them what true Christianity is. Let them know without it no man can ever enter heaven. Charity is a grace, a virtue, no other grace is half so fair; to all the other graces however fair, it gives the polish and finishing stroke. At the judgment day, the man who in the name of Christ, gave the poor a cup of cold water, or a bit of bread, around him shall be thrown heaven's fairest dress. There the witness shall stand, to tell his gracious deed before the THRONE OF GOD. The apostle Paul in speaking to his Corinthian brethren, says,—"And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity."

Again, saith the word of God,—"Put on charity as the bond of perfectness." Brethren, look at this important matter. Throw in your mite into the TREASURY of the LORD. It may prove a blessing to some poor soul, when your head is laid low amidst the wild-flowers of your grave yard. Do you love the cause of Christ? Do you love religion? Do you love the ministry? Do you love God?

The gospel in every page of it inculcates the spirit of benevolence, and represents charity as the badge of those who in sincerity profess it.—I hope some of the brethren who are in the habit of writing will take up this matter.

Yours, W. A. PORTER.

DEATH OF AN EMINENT MAN.—Died at Hempstead, L. I., on the 16th inst., Reverend Timothy Clowes, L. L. D., aged 60 years. He was one of the greatest mathematicians of the age. He graduated at Columbia College in 1808. In 1821 he was principal of Erasmus Hall, Flatbush. In 1821 he was chosen president of Washington College, Maryland, and rector of the Church in Chestertown and St. Paul's, Kent County. In 1838 he was invited to preside over the Clinton Liberal Institute, Oneida County, where he remained till the fall of 1842.

TEMPERANCE.

From the Western Christian Advocate.

Evils of Intemperance.

It is the good fortune of the writer to reside in a reputed by sober district of the country. Few are found who will advocate the cause of intemperance; and few will countenance the use of liquors by example. Still, there are cases of intemperance frequently occurring, a few of which I will state. Within the space of a few miles of my residence, in the winter of 1845–6, no less than three persons were frozen to death while intoxicated, leaving families dependent on the "cold charities of a cold-hearted world!" But a few weeks since a young man, who had been considered of sober habits, was induced to join a company for a Christmas drunken spree. After drinking to inebriation, they started from the neighborhood tavern for home. The young man was thrown from the sleigh and injured. He was then taken up and carried into the house in a state of insensibility, where, at last, he was made conscious of his condition, when his language was, "O, pray for me!" which he continued to ask until death ensued!

Still more recently, an individual went to his sugar-camp to prepare his troughs for the coming season of sugar making. While he was thus engaged in this employment, he noticed his dog eating what he supposed some animal. When, upon examition, he found it a human being, nearly devoured by birds and dogs! A jug was lying ing beside the skeleton, but emptied of its contents! Who can reflect on scenes like these without feelings of sadness, or who in contemplating them does not feel disposed to assist in staying the ravages of intemperance? But how can assistance be given, or how can a check be given to this deadly evil? 1. Let all well-wishers of the cause of temperance be decided in their opposition. Let every man give an unequivocal rebuke to the evil, and he will have an influence which will be felt. 2. Let all discourage the sale of liquor. "But how," asks the temperance man, "can I discourage the use of them more than I do? I buy none. I speak against the use of liquors?" But does he not deal with those engaged in this nefarious traffic? I know many venders who depend upon the custom of the temperate for support; for the intemperate part of community are but poor customers, save in one article, alcohol. Many temperance men do almost all their trading with such men; and when travelling, will stop under the auspices of a rum pole, instead of calling at a "temperance house." In this way they bid these individuals God speed, as well as aid them by these means! I am sorry to say, that I even know Methodists who are at fault in this matter. I would to God that they would consider these things in their true importance. I cannot place a high estimate on principles, which are not strong enough to carry one a square or two, to a place freed from the disturbance occasioned by the presence of that bane of all order, alcohol! Can we reasonably hope for success, while such encouragements are given to the votaries of this evil? We think not. L. F. W.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

From the Missionary Herald.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

TRANSLATION OF A LETTER FROM DEACON HARITOON, A NATIVE MISSIONARY.

Time does not permit me to describe to you by writing the exceeding great joy of our city.—It is true that when the Evangelical Armenian Church was first organized here, there was great joy; but, by the blessing of the Holy Spirit, its members increase from day to day. At first it consisted of only fourteen members; but now it has increased to twenty-two, sixteen of whom are males, and six females. The whole church has been in great joy ever since your beloved pastor, Mr. Apisaghom, by the favor of the Lord, came to our city. We have had large meetings every evening, except the present, on which we have been prevented from meeting by the Governor of our place. We have had two services for baptism, one at the house of Deacon Haritoon, where the child of Baron Garabed was baptised by the name of Soorpoohy; and the other at the house of brother Hohannes, the painter, where the child of Baron Gaspar was baptized by the name of Antranig; and on these occasions the number present was seventy and eighty. On the following night we met for the breaking of bread, at Deacon Haritoon's house, where were present twenty-two communicants, and a little less than a hundred persons in all. Of these, seven had never heard the gospel preached before; and not only so, but they were formerly pesecutors of the truth; and when they heard the gospel, they were pricked in their hearts, and they confessed their evil deeds. These very men, when the persecution began; armed themselves with clubs, and lay in wait at the episcopate, that whenever any one of the brethren who had been called up, came out without signing the confession of faith, they might fall upon him and beat him. What joy it gives us, to see these very men now come and listen to the preaching of the gospel; and to see in this city, where at first the work began with a few, it now amounts to a hundred! Blessed be the name of the Lord, who adds to his church from day to day!

On the morning of the following Saturday, we attended the funeral of our beloved brother, Hadjy Yeghia; and, assisted by the counsel of our reverend brother Apisaghom, every thing was done in such a manner as we did not dare to hope for. But the Lord evidently helped his people, and every thing was done in good order. When we passed out of the door, accompanied by six soldiers furnished by the Governor, we found a large multitude of Armenian women and boys, great and small, waiting with stones in their bosoms and pockets, to make an attack as soon as the coffin should appear; and the soldiers were not able to disperse them. The multitude momentarily increased; and when the coffin was carried out, they began with loud voices, to insult and blaspheme, and to mock us with the most shameful language, and to spit upon us. It is impossible to repeat in writing the language they used; but we walked along in order, two by two, without uttering a single word. . . . Even the soldiers feared being stoned. We at length reached the burying ground; and while we were waiting for the grave to be dug, Mr. Apisaghom, after resting a little while, read a chapter from the Scriptures, and preached to the people about an hour. The hearers were astonished, and silence reigned over the whole mixed multitude, and all listened with earnest attention, both Armenians and Turks.—After prayer we returned with the soldiers in all peace to the bazars. The Armenians of the city wondered much that we had been able to bury our dead; for they supposed that we could not do it without first getting permission from them.

They subsequently stirred up the Governor (the Armenian and Greek Bishops uniting in the thing) to give orders that henceforth there should be no more meetings at night. He said, "By coming together thus, two hundred men and women, in the night season, you give offence to your follow countrymen, and will cause them to rise. Every community has a fitting time for performing its worship; but you perform yours in the night." He also said, "Prayers cannot be said after the season of Yatsoo," that is, the last regular hour for Mahammedan worship each day, which, at this season of the year, is about seven, or half past seven o'clock. However, on the same evening, we had service again for the baptism of a child, which we continued till a quarter past seven. In the meantime the Governor, being informed by the enemy that we were holding another meeting, was going about with soldiers, endeavoring to find the house where we were assembled. Learning from those who were returning home the place where the meeting had been held, he went there and reproved the owner of the house, saying, "Did I not command you not to hold any more meetings?" It seems as though the Lord blinded his eyes that he should not find the place before; for we were thus able to finish our service before he came.

The next morning Baron Garabed called on the Governor, who said, "You are to have no more meetings; and if you do not obey I will come and seize you all, and put you in prison. I am ruler of the city, and you have no permission in your hands from the Porte for these meetings." When the Armenians and Greeks heard of this, they became still more exasperated. With a mob, in the most shameful manner they stoned the house of Yeghia, the deceased brother; and they have since insulted and stoned the brethren with greater boldness in the streets. The Lord grant them his grace! They show plainly whose servants they are.

This is the present state of our city; but all the brethren are entirely without fear, for they know that the church of Christ prospers by persecution; and we have seen with our own eyes, "that whenever there are no trials, we soon become slothful."

INSTALLATION OF PRESIDENT WASHINGTON.

CINCINNATI, MAY 18th

MR. CIST.—In a recent conervsation you requested me to give you an account of the installation of President Washington, after his first election to the Presidency, which I had the pleasure of witnessing.

You will recollect that the first Congress chosen under the Federal Constitution, assembled at New York, early in the month of April, 1789; and that after the two Houses were organized, they proceeded in the manner prescribed by the Constitution to open and count the votes given for President and Vice President of the United States; when it was ascertained that George Washington of Virginia was elected President, by the unanimous vote of the nation, and John Adams, the elder, of Massachusetts, Vice President, by an overwhelming majority. A certificate of the election of Gen. Washington, signed by the President of the Senate, was immediately transmitted to him by charles Thompson, Secretary of the old Congress, and delivered at Mount Vernon, on the 14th of April.

Having determined, after serious deliberation, to accept the appointment, and being aware that the affairs of the nation required his presence at the seat government; he bid a reluctant adieu to Mount Vernon, and commenced his journey to the seat of government, on the second day of the arrival of Mr. Thompson.

It would be impossible to describe the manifestation of veneration and affection which he received, at every step of his progress, from the commencement to the close of his journey. They are recorded in the chronicles of the day, and ought to be universally read. At every city, village and settlement, the people,—men, women, and children—assembled by thousands, from great distances, to see and admire the man whom they venerated and loved above all others. Addresses and odes were presented to him, couched in the most affectionate and flattering terms. At many places, groups of females—matrons and maidens—dressed in white, welcomed him in strains of the highest eulogy.—Wherever he stopped, crowds of people collected, surrounded and escorted him on his way. The bridge across the Schuylkill, in the vicinity of Philadelphia, was richly decorated; and his reception at that place, was peculiarly splendid. At each end of the bridge a triumphal arch had been erected, and as he passed the first, a crown of laurel was let down on his head, unperceived by him; and as he passed from the bridge to the city, the streets, fields and avenues, were filled with rejoicing multitudes. In the evening the whole city was illuminated. On the next day, when he came to the Assanpink, at Trenton, (on the west side of which he had encamped with the remnant of his half-clothed, half-famished troops in the gloomy winter of 1776, on the evening before he surprised the British at Princeton,) he found the bridge across the creek superbly ornamented and his approach welcomed by the roar of cannon—by military displays, and the enthusiastic shouts of grateful citizens. There was a triumphal arch erected on the bridge supported by thirteen pillars ornamented with wreaths of flowers and laurel, on which were conspicuously inscribed these words, "The Denfender of the Mothers will protect the daughters." Under the arch, bearing this inscription, he was met by a group matrons, with their daughters, dressed in white, carrying baskets of flowers in their hands, which they strewed before him as they sang a complimentary ode with great sweetness.

The Governor of New Jersey joined him at New Brunswick, and accompanied him to Elizabethtown Point. On the road, between those places, the President was met by the Committee of Congress who received and conducted him and his suite with military honors to the Point, where they embarked on a magnificent barge; built and decorated for the occasion, and rowed by 13 Branch pilots, selected from different harbors and dressed in white uniform.

Writers of that day have represented the incidents of the journey, from its commencement to its close, as being equal in splendor, and far exceeding in sincerity, kindness of feeling and unfeigned admiration, the triumphal processions of the great conquerors of antiquity.

New York bay was literally white with vessels and boats of all sizes, filled with admiring multitudes, both male and female, clad in their richest attire. Many of those vessels had bands of music on board, and all of them displayed flags painted for the occasion, each having an allusion to some interesting event in the life of this great man. The bay, a broad sheet of water extending eight or nine miles, seemed to be animated with grateful and happy multitudes, competing with each other to do the first and the highest honors to him whom they idolized and regarded, not only as the greatest but the noblest and the best of the human family. It was understood that the city would be crowded with people from every section of the country, on which account it was thought prudent not to make public the place at which the barge was to land; but as she neared the Battery, the place of her destination was pretty well ascertained by the multitude, from the course she was steering, which they had closely observed; so that when she reached the stairs erected on Murray's wharf, where the admired of every admirer was to debark, the landing and the streets as far as the eye could extend, were filled with crowds of human beings, anxious to see their great benefactor. At the landing the President was received by the Governor of the State of New York, and conducted with military honors through an immense concourse of admiring friends, to the lodgings prepared for his reception. In the evening the city was brilliantly illuminated, and there was a fine display of fire-works from the Battery.

Being myself, at that time, a student of Princeton college, and these interesting scenes taking place during the spring vacation of the institution, it was in my power to be present and witness the greater part of them. In the memoranda made by the General, in his private journal, was the following statement:

"The display of boats which attended and joined on the occasion,—some with vocal, and others with instrumental music on board—the roar of cannon, and the loud acclamations of the people, which rent the sky as I passed along the wharves, filled my mind with sensations as painful as they were pleasing."

Before the arrival of the President-elect, Vice President Adams reached the city and took his seat in the Senate, as the presiding officer of that august body; without doubt the most learned and patriotic political assembly in the world. Both Houses were then organized, and while they were awaiting the arrival of the President elect, various subjects were moved and discussed, referring to the modes and forms of conducting he public business that might be bro't before them; and among other topics, a proposition was made to settle the title, or more properly the style, in which the President of the United States should be addressed. On that subject various opinions were expressed. It was proposed by some to give him the title of "His excellency." By others, "His Honour," and by others the simple address of "Mr. President." For some time, the subject was discussed with seriousness and good feeling, but finally, an effort was made to laugh down the whole subject, and bring it into ridicule. with that view, a resolution was offered declaring that the title of the President should be "His High Mightiness." By that movement it was seen at once, that it was time to dismiss the whole subject, which was done, without arriving at any conclusion, or making any record of the proceeding.

The spacious edifice which then stood on Wall street, immediately facing the entrance into Broad street, had been procured for the accommodation of the two Houses of Congress. In front of the building there was a capacious balcony, ornamented with columns and rich carved work; communicating with the hall occupied by the Senate. In that structure the ceremonies of the inauguration took place, on the 30th April, 1789, in full view of the surrounding multitude. It had been carefully fitted up and richly and tastefully furnished for the occasion. The floor was covered with costly carpeting, and the front and sides were ornamented with damask curtains, gaily trimmed, hanging in festoons from pillar to pillar, so adjusted as not to interrupt the view from the streets below. I had taken the precaution in time, to obtain a safe, convenient position, on the porch of a house at one of the corners of the two streets, about fifty feet from the balcony on which the ceremony was to be performed.

At the appointed hour, the President-elect, accompanied by the Senate and the House of Representatives, and their officers, appeared on the portico, when the air was made to resound with shout and huzzas, from the lips and throats of more than twenty thousand enraptured spectators. Those boisterous expressions of excessive joy, were however soon hushed and a profound silence ensued—every eye being rivetted on the illustrious man who had defended and saved his country, and every ear listening attentively.

"Conticuere omnes, intentique ora tenebant."

At this juncture, the venerable Chancellor Livingston, of New York, advanced to Gen. Washington, who was standing on the front of the balcony, and presented aa open Bible, resting on a damask cushion, ornamented with tassels of gold, on which the President reverently laid his right hand. The Chancellor then, in an audible voice, read from the Constitution the oath directed to be taken, by every President of the United States, before he enters on the duties of his office. The President elect repeated the oath with great solemnity, and, bending his head kissed the book. The Chancellor, then turning, and bowing gracefully to the multitude, repeated these emphatic words, with a very audible voice, thus indicating that he was installed without a title, and was to be addressed in the simple language of "Mr. President." The shouts which instantly followed that annunciation, were almost deafening; and during their continuance, the President again advanced to the front of the balcony and bowed very gracefully to the multitude before him, and those on his right and left.

"Long live George Washington, President of the United States,"

The ceremonies being thus concluded, the President with the two Houses returned to the Senate chamber, where he delivered his inaugural address; after which they retired by a private way in the rear of the building, and repaired to St. Paul's where appropriate religious exercises were performed. The President, as was his custom on public occasions, was dressed in a suit of black velvet, with shorts, black silk stockings, shoes, shoe-buckles, and knee-buckles. His hair was turned back on his forehead, curled and powdered according to the fashion of the day, and gathered behind, in a black silk bag. He had also a neat dress-sword suspended at his side. The symmetry of his finely formed person, the ease and dignity of his movements, which were peculiar to himself, were observed and admired by every beholder. Judging from every thing which transpired on that occasion, it was manifest that he was venerated by the nation, to an unexampled degree. Very respectfully,

Mormonism and Tobacco.

BR. BASSETT: As you, and some of your readers, as well as the writer of this article, are interested in the Anti-Tobacco reform, I thought it might be of some little use, and a matter of some curiosity to learn the object of that weed, by the way of one of the Revelations of the Mormon Prophet, Joe Smith. It is said to be given, "not by commandment, but by revelation, and the word of Wisdom showing forth the order, and will of God." It may be found in the Mormon Book of Covenants: page 208. "Again, tobacco is not for the body neither for the belly, and is not good for man; but is an herb for bruises, and all sick cattle, to be used with judgment, and skill. And again, hot drinks are not for the body, or belly." A few things claim our attention in this wonderful revelation. We are here told that tobacco, is not good for the body, neither for the belly, and not good for man. Whether man, is here to be taken in the general sense, to embrace the human family at large, or merely man in distinction from the female, and juvenile portion of said family, we are not told; but it is clearly said that, it is not good for man. Positively tobacco "is an herb for bruises." But then, "it is not good for the body or belly, hence it would seem that these bruises should be on some other part of the human corporeity; for instance on the fingers, toes, or head; and these bruises not on man,—"tobacco is not good for man." Again, it is said, that this "herb is for all sick cattle, to be used with judgment, and skill." Here seems to be a sovereign remedy for all sick cattle. With such a revelation one would almost be led to think that the cattle, under the use of this medicine, would live forever, or die without sickness, if it was only used with judgment, and skill. That issue your judgment in relation to the quantity to be given, if very sick use the more, if not so sick use a smaller dose, and use your skill in getting the offensive, but efficacious medicine down the sick brute. Now, Mr. Editor, if we were to take this revelation in our hands, and pass around in community, and witness the practice of not a few of the ministers, church members and other citizens of our land, would we not come to the conclusion that there were a great many, who choose to be among the sick cattle?

Yours, J. GAY.

TAKE WARNING.—A knock at our door—a messenger entered. "Mr. McF." He is present. "I have come," said the messenger, "to ask the living to visit the dying." Who is sick? "Mr. ——, on —— street. He is nearly off, and asked to see you." We hastened—entered the room, and found the poor, expiring man, contending with death, in almost the last struggles. We approached the beside, and inquired after the state of his soul. He responded, "My affairs are in a bad condition." Are you not prepared to die? "No," he responded, with emphasis, "O that I were." "No hope?" "None at all," was his reply. "Have you no heart to pray?" He answered, "No heart to pray!"—"Were you ever a Christian?" "Yes," he replied, "I was happy for four years in the church, at V., but I gave way to temptation—addicted myself to the use of strong drink, and lost all relish for divine things." We prayed for him, and commended him to the mercy of God. He spoke but little afterwards, and in a few hours passed away to his God, to answer for the deeds, done in the body.—Nashville Chris. Advocate.

THE WEATHER AND THE CROP.—The weather for the last three weeks has been most propitious for an abundant harvest of wheat and rye, whilst it has also improved the prospect for corn, oats, buckwheat, and grass. We regret, however, to learn that the worm, which always follows a mild winter, is beginning to threaten the corn, eating its way into the heart of the promising stalks, with fatal effect.

The wheat and rye crops of this section of the country which are now almost ready for the sickle are reported as usually fine, and indeed we have received some specimens cut indiscriminately from the field, some of which have been already noticed, superior to any we have ever examined.

PITTSBURGH DISTRICT.

Pittsburgh, Pa., June 21st, 1847.

Mr Editor: Since our last report we have held our third quarterly meeting, at which we were favored with the services of Br. R. Andrew, from Steubenville Station, Muskingum District. Our Br. F. A. Davis, too, was here at the time, and assisted in the labors of the meeting. We had a profitable season; and the addition of three members to the church. In the society, we are still going on very harmoniously and comfortably. It might be said, in one sense, that we are too peaceable. We need more zeal and energy in the use of the means of grace. Our people are now intent upon cleansing and repairing the sanctuary,—have already commenced in the Lecture room below. This was desirable;—and O that we may all be equally intent upon the purification of our own hearts! Then will the Lord into his temple come, and there abide.

Two weeks previous to our quarterly meeting I had the pleasure of attending a meeting in Steubenville, and of meeting my esteemed Br., G. Clancy, President of the Muskingum District, and of hearing him preach on Sunday morning, as well as taking a part (myself) in the exercises of the meeting. The pleasure of the opportunity was also heightened by the company of several other fellow laborers in the vine and doctrine, Brs. Z. Ragan, J. Nichols, and J. Ewans, with our old and tried friend and Br., D. B. Horsey. How spirit cheering is the company of those Brethren who can sympathise with each other in the toils, trials, and joys, incident to an Itinerant ministry. May the Lord abundantly bless us all, and make us more useful. W. REEVES.

MUSKINGUM DISTRICT.

Woodsfield Circuit, June 30, 1847.

Br. Bassett: Thus far we have got along on this Circuit, in peace and harmony, and are striving to maintain and elevate our standing among the leading churches of this place, to do good in saving immortal souls, and to bring all efforts to bear against the reigning power of darkness, until our world shall be filled with peace and love; and until sin shall finally be done away. Our last quarterly meeting will be held at Louisville, the first Sabbath in August, to which we invite J. Nichols, W. Remsburg, J. M. Winn. H. T. LAWSON.

OHIO DISTRICT.

Buford Circuit, June 25th 1847.

Br. Bassett:—By your permission, I wish through the W. R. to say something, in relation to our operations, on Buford circuit during the last quarter; and though we cannot say as many good things, as some others, yet the prospects are somewhat encouraging.

Our 2d quarterly meeting, commenced the 5th inst., at a school house, on White Oak—an appointment where we had a few weeks before, organized a society, of six members—we continued three days. Had a pleasant time. Were favored with the assistance of Brs. Ewans, Fowler and Wamsley, received three members on probation. I think a profitable meeting. The week following, I held a three days' meeting (assisted by Br. Ewans) at a new appointment where I had preached a few times—we had large, attentive congregations—six gave their hand, to become members of the M. P. Church. The Thursday following I returned, preached for them again, two more gave their hand, they elected their leader, and were organized. This class is composed of materials, that promise great usefulness to the church.—May the Lord bless, and make them humble and pious. We have received 28 on probation during the last quarter—and what is more encouraging, a large number of the members that have joined, are men of influence and firmness, and some of the most promising young men in the country. Blessed be the God and father of our Lord Jesus Christ who has given us the victory. We have only one thing to regret, viz: that we have not had as many conversions as accessions: yet we pray, and look, for the bursting of that little cloud (though it may not be as 'large as a man's hand,') when we may have a glorious shower of converting grace. The little bark is again refitted and is beginning to ride the waves; and we think has suffered but little, or no loss from the wreck. Some of the scattereb sheep, are beginning to look wishfully towards the fold again.

I regret that I have been prevented from attending three of my appointments for the last two rounds, on account of the small pox spreading in that region, which will make very much against our operations at those appointments.

Our next quarterly meeting will be held at Beach grove, M. H. near Br. Aid's; commencing 21st August—to meet the President's visit: this (Beach grove,) is an old house recently moved (from Ash Ridge, and repaired in good comfortable style. The society here is in a prosperous condition. Two other houses of worship are going up, and I hope will be done before Conference. May the Lord help.

I will now say in conclusion, that I have never travelled a circuit where the brethren were acting more harmoniously, with but a single exception; peace, perfect peace, and harmony pervade in all the societies. Brethren pray for us. J. NUTTY.

Contributions to Missions.

The King of Prussia has recently given one thousand thalers (about $750) to the Rhenish Missionary society, towards defraying the expense of sending its first Missionaries to China. The Minister of State, Dr. Eichorn, in transmitting the donation, informed the society that he was charged by the King "to testify the lively interest which his Majesty takes in the enterprise, in behalf of which he invokes the gracious aid and the rich blessings of the Lord."

London.—At a public meeting recently held, it was stated that out of a population of more than two millions, there was an attendance of only four hundred thousand persons on the services of the Lord's day, in the churches and chapels of all denominations! "If inquiry was made as to the occupation of the rest, the crowded state of steam vessels, railway carriages, public houses, tea gardens, club and gaming houses, would furnish a melancholy reply."

London Societies.—The total income of the Church Missionary Society during the year which has just closed, was £116,827. The total income of the Wesleyan Missionary Society during the last year was £115,762, of which sum £4770 were derived from juvenile Christmas and New Year's offerings, £11,738 were raised by foreign auxiliaries among the missions. The receipts of the London Missionary Society have amounted to £76,319. The receipts of the Baptist Missionary Society were £23,223.

Effect of Missions.—The native population of Lahaina, Sandwich Islands, in January 1846, was 3447. Rev. Dr. Baldwin supposed that "about five hundred native families eat at the table in the style of civilization, and prepare their food after the manner of Europeans."

The Colored People of Antigua have lately subscribed seven hundred dollars towards the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland.

Three Chinese Youths, recently brought to this country by Rev. S. R. Brown, are now at Monson Academy to be educated, with a view of returning to their native land. They were struck with surprise at the comparative sparseness of population in Massachusetts.

The Home of Freedom.—Two hundred emigrants arrived in Baltimore, a few days since, said to be the vanguard of a colony of several thousand Hollanders, who, are about to settle in Missouri. They are well clad, and fine looking people, and have an abundance of means to carry out their intention. They fly from religious persecution under the King of Hanover.

WESTERN REGORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, JULY 8, 1847.

To Correspondents.—Please exercise patience, as we have a large mass of communications on hand. Articles not prepared for the press, may have to wait longest, always excepting religious intelligence, which we give every week, come from whom it may, without laying over. Some must excuse us if their articles never appear. It is necessary we should respect our own paper. Our friend the "Dutchman" is informed that his real name must be entrusted with us before his 2d art. can be attended to, especially as he is now 'joking on facts.' And then, it is too much like some of our articles written in English, (English?) If some of our dear brethren who write for us would try and improve themselves in penmanship and English Grammar, it would greatly accomodate us.

Tour of the President.—Mr. Polk spent three days in New York, during which time he was treated with great ceremony, and parade, and visited by thronging multitudes. On Saturday morning, accompanied by the Mayor of the city, he took a walk through the markets, exciting unintentionally a sensation and a rush. After breakfasting with the Mayor, he was introduced to nearly 2000 of the citizens. During the day, he made a short visit to Brooklyn, and returning, visited the Croton reservoirs, then the Orphan House, then the Asylum for the blind, and at night, Tammany Hall. He was serenaded till midnight, by a brass band. On Sabbath, the President attended at St. Bartholomew's Church in the forenoon, at Dr. Skinner's Church in the afternoon, and in the evening the Reformed Dutch Church, Lafayette Place, and professed to be very much gratified with the services of the day. Early on Monday morning, the President and suite were escorted by a large concourse of citizens, as well as by troops, to the New Haven boat, upon which he was to take passage for New England. On departing, twelve cheers were given, whilst music and the din of artillery were not wanting. Before noon, the boat reached New Haven, where the visiters spent a few hours, and then took a special train for Hartford, where an hour or two was spent, when the party proceeded to Springfield, and there spent the night. The President was met by two aids from Gov. Briggs, and welcomed to Massachusetts. After visiting the Arsenal at Springfield, he proceeded by special train to Worcester, and thence to Boston. By the way, he was met by a military escort, saluted by the Roxbury Artillery, and escorted into the city of Boston, where he was welcomed by Mayor Quincy. The Bostonians, we presume, were not outdone by other cities, in their attentions paid to their distinguished guest. He was to proceed thence to Lowell, and so on to Concord, New Hampshire.

War Matters, and Prospects.—The N. Y. Sun has information that Santa Anna had a second time sent in his resignation of the Presidency, and had also made formal resignation of his military office and command. Intelligence was also received, that Generals Scott and Worth, had advanced as far as Rio Frio, on their way to the Capitol, without opposition, and that they were there met by a deputation with propositions for peace. What the terms were is not made known, but General Scott declined, proposing to push on to the Capitol to make peace. It was subsequently reported that Santa Anna had withdrawn his resignation, under the apprehension that it would be accepted. Col. Curtis, formerly of the Ohio regiment, has volunteered for the war, and been appointed governor of Saltillo. It is believed that the Mexican people for the most part, are in favor of peace, but little confidence is placed in their leaders.

☞ The Pittsburgh Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has been in session for a week past, at Wellsburgh, Va. The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate of this week, which we have received, gives account of the proceedings only of the first day. Bishop Janes presides—Dr. Cooke is Secretary.

Steamer Newark.—We omitted to mention last week that this unfortunate boat, met with another disaster a few days ago. She struck a rock in the Ohio river, on the 22d ult. and sunk, though, it seems not in deep water. No person was injured. We learn by the Zanesville Gazette, that the owners, Messrs Bishops, never discouraged, have raised her again.

Washington's Installation.—The article on our first page by Judge Burnet of Cincinnati, who was an eye witness of the ceremonies, will be found very interesting, especially as this is Independence week.

Anti Slavery Paper at Louisville, Ky.—We have seen a number of a paper called the "Examiner," recently commenced at Louisville, Ky. We understand that it is a continuation, or rather revival of the paper of Cassius M. Clay, the "True American." The Examiner is edited by J. C. Vaughn, Esq., who is a native of the South, and therefore, we presume is well qualified to address his southern brethren on the subject of slavery.

Celebration.—The Anniversary of American Independence, was celebrated at Zanesville, by the Sons of Temperance, on Monday, the 5th inst. The several Divisions of the order, in Zanesville and Putnam, turned out in full, with the Divisions also from McConnellsville, Dresden, and Irville. A large and well conducted procession passed along the principal streets, and proceeded to a grove at West Zanesville, where appropriate exercises were had. We are gratified to see such an occasion pass off, without the scenes of Bachanalian revel and disorder, which used to characterize these anniversary observances.

Violent Storm.—We learn by the Cincinnati Commercial that a severe storm visited Tiffin, Ohio, on last Friday week. It was of short continuance, but damaged nearly all the buildings in the place, and destroyed many. The Methodist Episcopal Church was unroofed, and many stables, houses and out houses were leveled. Many cattle were killed by falling timber, and much damage done to crops, in the surrounding country. We are not informed of the loss of any lives. But it is marvellous indeed if all escaped.

Another.—A Correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial, writing from Columbus, Indiana, gives account of a destructive hail storm which visited that place and vicinity, on the 12 ult. Hail stones, he says, were as large as hen's eggs. Much damage was done to crops, and many domestic quadrupeds and fowls were killed. He states that 185 windows of the hotel at which he stopped, were smashed. This last statement, we judge, must be either a mistake or a yarn, or else those Hoosier brethren must be building pretty considerable sized hotels now a days.

Emigrants from Sweden.—We see by the Cincinnati Protestant, that a large colony of emigrants from Sweden, are locating themselves in Henry Co. Illinois, having purchased nearly all of said county. Five hundred reached there a year ago, and recently, 400 more arrived at Chicago, on their way. More are coming. The emigrants are said to be linen manufacturers. They have brought with them large quantities of flax-seed, with which to seed their rich soil. Their religion is said to be a modification of Lutheranism, acknowledging no spiritual guide but the bible.

Effects of Presumption.—A man lost his life by his own folly, in a steam bakery, in Cincinnati, last week, as we learn by the Commercial. He made a bet that he could take the band from the drum, while the engine was in full run. In the attempt, he was drawn into the machinery and crushed to death.

Northern and Western Convention.—The great River and Harbor Convention, assembled at Chicago Illinois, on the 5th inst. From notices we see in many exchanges, we apprehend that it will be very numerously attended. More than fifty delegates were appointed at a public meeting in the city of Pittsburgh.

The Press at Roseville.—We have received the first number of a small paper, to be issued weekly at Roseville in this county. Mr. Taylor, the proprietor, seems to be a man of enterprise and perseverance. He states that though not a practical printer, he has himself, with the assistance of a boy, executed the first number.

Herald of Truth.—We have received the July number of this valuable periodical. Like the preceding ones, it contains much instructive and useful matter. The leading article, on Natural Science, is particularly worthy of attention. We have read it with much interest. Other articles are also interesting, though we cannot say we are prepared to endorse all the sentiments expressed in them. The July number commences a new volume. We sincerely wish the Herald an extensive patronage, and we should rejoice to see it supplanting the works of fiction, so extensively read by our young people. After having been for so long a time beholden to the East for our periodical literature, we are gratified to find in the Herald so creditable a representative of Western mind and mechanism. Each number contains 80 pages. L. A. Hine, Editor. Terms; $3 per year.

ORIGINAL REVIEW.

Written for the Western Recorder.

A few additional Notices of Dr. Whitehead's, and Dr. Southey's Lives of Rev. John and Charles Wesley.

The itinerant preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, taking their instructions from the official papers of that church, have wonderfully succeeded in persuading their people, that they ought not to read Dr. Whitehead's Lives of the Wesleys. These preachers fear for the episcopacy! It is proved beyond all controversy to have no ecclesiastical foundation; for, Mr. Wesley had no ecclesiastical right or privilege to ordain any man to the episcopacy, in England. He had not the shadow of such a right. No one knew this better than he knew it. He never pretended to such a right, as a minister of the church of England. Did he, then, possess power as a Methodist, to ordain an episcopacy for the Methodists of North America! Whence could he have derived that power? He did not derive it from the Methodists of this country (in 1784, numbering about 14,000,) upon whom the episcopacy was to be imposed; for, they were ignorant of his intentions, even if he had any of the kind.

Dr. Whitehead, however, treats this whole subject on the supposition that Mr. Wesley did ordain Dr. Coke to the episcopal office; and he fully proves that Mr. Wesley had neither the right nor the power to do so. He gives a history of the whole of these doings—Dr. Coke's agency—Charles Wesley's indignation at the impositions practiced on his brother, then in his 85th year, and the cunning and secrecy of the ordination in a private chamber at Bristol. These are what are called in modern parlance, "fixed facts." They cannot be denied; they cannot be set aside.—There they stand, incontrovertible; supplying the chief causes of the proscription of the truthful records of Dr. Whitehead. Now, the question is, Are Episcopal Methodists willing to be deceived by parties interested in their deception?

Dr. Whitehead's records have been vindicated in a full review of his work, and of all cotemporaneous Methodist literature comprehending the subjects on which he wrote. This review has been extensively circulated. Not one of the Papers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, nor its Quarterly Review, nor one of its writers, has attempted to deny the facts stated in the vindication. A copy of this review was sent to the Editor of the London "Watchman," a large Weekly Paper devoted to the interests of Wesleyan Methodism. In his notice of the review, the Editor does not deny a single fact stated—he regrets, however, a revival of the controversy. Not one of the biographers of the Wesleys deny one of the statements respecting the episcopacy, as given by Dr. Whitehead; not one even hints a doubt of their accuracy.

Dr. Whitehead wrote in the spirit and power of pure religion, as experienced by himself and the Methodists of his time, and as taught by the Wesleys. Are not Methodists persuaded of the contrary? Those who are guilty of such injustice to persons looking to them for guidance, have not a little to answer for. For, no one desiring spiritual good can read this work without receiving spiritual benefits. Every individual and family possessing a copy are blessed. There is nothing in it contrary to saving truth. To Methodists duly appreciating primitive Methodist doctrines—or, the doctrines of the Bible as taught by Wesley and the early preachers, the work is invaluable.

'All this is written for the purpose of inducing the reader to purchase this book?' Yes; for this very design is this written. And, we know that a great kindness will be done to any one, and especially to families, who shall purchase the book, and read it carefully—a book which will only do good, and always do good, now and for generations to come. As a biography of the Wesleys, it is as authentic, as John Wesley's manuscripts and printed works, and as Charles Wesley's Private Diary, and the manuscripts of the Wesley family—as true as the author's personal knowledge. And it has this other glorious and distinguishing characteristic—it is a spiritual work.—Nevertheless, from the Dan to the Beersheba of Episcopal Methodism, Dr. Whitehead is represented as the opponent of Methodism—and he is so represented, no doubt, by many preachers who have never read his Lives of the Wesleys—for, they have been so instructed by Church organs, not one of which dare to admit evidence of their wrong doings in their papers.

Dr. Southey's Life of John and Charles Wesley is to be recommended rather than Dr. W's. See, we copy from 'Zion's Herald and Wesleyan Journal,'—'Published by the New England Annual Conferences of the Methodist E. Church,'—a paper which was in a great hurry to condemn Dr. Whitehead, on his first appearance before the American public. And the Herald spoke officially—by authority—decisively—there was no appeal—no one was permitted to reply—the book was interdicted—placed under the ban of the itinerancy. Here is what the Editor of the Herald says, of Southey's books:

"Southey's Life of Wesley.—We referred, some time since, to the probable publication of this work by the Harpers. It has appeared in two fine volumes. No other work of Southey's, in prose or verse, excels it in interest or ability.—Defective as it is in its estimate of Wesley and his opinions, it is almost romantically entertaining. The present edition, besides the notes of the Rev. Mr. Curry, the American Editor, contains also those of Coleridge, the 'remarks' of Knox, on the Life and character of Wesley, and a large portion of Watson's 'Observations.' Mr. Curry has performed his task skilfully; and with all the guards which accompany the work, even Methodists themselves will not refuse it a welcome, though it may be a somewhat hesitating one."

What Methodist, after reading the above, will not desire to see Southey! We assure them it is a book to make one laugh at the expense of Mr. Wesley and the simple societies of his day. But, we will give the opinions of others; of those best qualified to judge. We borrow from the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine: Southey represents "ambition as entering largely into Mr. Wesley's actuating impulses;"—that "he regarded those under his directions as instruments of his power, and thought all other considerations must give way to the interests of the spiritual dominion which he had acquired." "The work will not injure us. Our fears respecting it have no reference to Methodism, which has stood attacks far more virulent than any which Dr. Southey indulged; but we do fear that its tendency will be to mislead in the matter of spiritual religion, and to induce in many minds contempt and ridicule for this sacred subject."

Such is the correct opinion, of the English writer, of the vols., which according to Zion's Herald, "is almost romantically written," and to which "even Methodists themselves will not refuse a welcome,"—"a welcome!" Now, every reader will be endangered by Southey's Life of Wesley,—especially, will the young be in peril—and the young Methodist will be so misled as to laugh at the religion of his father—regarding spiritual religion with contempt and ridicule; and, John Wesley as an enthusiast—an ambitious enthusiast—meaning well, and accomplishing some good in his day. That is all.

Let us see a little farther what Zion's Herald recommends—for he commends the whole of the volume—what Coleridge, Knox, Watson, and Curry, as well as Southey, has written. Recourse is again had, here, to the Wesleyan Magazine: "Mr. Knox has sought to undervalue the intellectual character of Mr. Wesley. If the introduction of such a sentiment had been but incidental, we should have allowed the matter to pass without reference. But it is not so: the entire "Essay," or "Critique," is framed on this principle; this depreciatory spirit pervades his "remarks" from the beginning to the end; it impregnates every page. The writer has presented us with a sketch of Mr. Wesley more heterogenious in its character than that of any other of his numerous biographers, not excepting even Dr. Southey. He raises him to the highest pinnacle of moral greatness, and then hurls him almost to the lowest grade of intellectual frailty! This he does by turns: he literally plays with "the good old man," as a fond parent tosses his infant, first, suspending it in his arms above his head, and then rolling it at his feet!" The writer then proceeds to specify the injustice done to Mr. Wesley by Knox, and convicts him of several errors in point of facts. And this is to be welcomed by Methodists!

Southey for the Methodists—says Zion's Herald,—"No other work of Southey's, in prose or verse, excels it in interest or ability." Southey and Knox will unmake Methodists—and turn the children of Methodists from the religion of their fathers; "inducing contempt and ridicule for this sacred subject." Think of that ye Methodist parents! We have no doubt that some few of the Methodist "Christian Advocates" will endorse the opinions of Zion's Herald, as given above; as they did the condemnation of Dr. Whitehead's work by this same Zion's Herald.

But, turn to Dr. Whitehead, see his Observations on Mr. Wesley's intellectual capacity—on his ability as a writer—on his character as a preacher—his travels, labors, and many sermons—his cheerfulness, peaceability, temperance, charity, disinterestedness, power, character in full; his usefulness—and the reader will love the founder of Methodism; and seeing in him a chosen instrument of incalculable good to the world, will rejoice that he was born. Dr. Whitehead will turn none from Methodism—no parent who wishes his children to be Wesleyans and Christians in doctrine and in practice, need to fear for the spirituality of their religion in consequence of reading his volumes. Would that all the preachers who so senselessly and wickedly prevent the circulation of this work had a tithe of his piety and sense.

Place Southey in the hands of a young man under conviction for sin, and a thousand to one if the young man does not laugh outright at his sorrows. Place Dr. Whitehead in the hands of that young man, instead of Southey, and he will be taught the way of Life. Here is the difference. But, some of the enemies of Dr. Whitehead's book, may say, we shall not recommend Southey, though we hate Whitehead. Very well; hate one, but do not commend the other. It is true, the incumbents, the subjects, and the sticklers, for mere Methodist Episcopacy, live in a free country. But they may do great harm to the interests of spiritual religion. We beg them to think on these things.

Having a small space, it may be usefully occupied. "Having known Mr. Wesley for twenty-five years, (says Dr. W.) and having examined his private papers, I have no hesitation in declaring, that I am fully convinced he used all his influence and power to the best of his judgment, on every occasion, to promote the interests of Christianity, the prosperity of the people he governed, and the peace and welfare of his country, disregarding any private concern, or attachment whatever, when it stood in the way of his general purpose of doing good." But Southey, who had no personal knowledge of Mr. Wesley, says, "ambition entered largely into his actuating impulses." Which book is to be commended to Methodists? Dr. Whitehead does justice to Mr. Wesley's intellectual character. Knox disparages his mental capacity. What say Methodists here?—Will they take Knox's, or Dr. Whitehead's estimate? So we see that between Southey and Knox, Mr. Wesley is represented as having been a weak and ambitious man. Can Methodists believe this—and do they wish their children to believe this? Nothing which could be said of Wesley would be more false. Yet Southey, Knox, and Coleridge, (the latter) with his German mysticism, are to be greatly preferred to an author who only speaks the truth, and that truth honorable to Methodism the world over—in so far as the Wesleys were concerned. But Dr. Whitehead was not a bigot—he was a christian, an impartial biographer. His impartiality is his only fault. Thus we end.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Dear Br. Bassett;—Since my last, I have been favored with health and opportunity to visit the Portsmouth, Columbia, Woodsfield, Leesburgh and Bucyrus cts.; upon each of which, I was glad to find, peace and harmony prevailing. As there was no reason to believe that Br. Kingsbury would be at his post this conference year, when on the Columbia circuit, I appointed Br. S. Elliott, superintendant of said circuit. What a pity that an appointment which results in the crippling of both the spiritual and disciplinary interests of a circuit, should ever be made! But it sometimes happens, that this is done.

Upon the 21st inst. (being the day I left the Leesburgh circuit) I had the bad luck to founder my animal. This befel me at Br. D.'s some 2½ miles west of Dover. With much difficulty, I succeeded in getting my animal to this town on the 23d, where, (leaving it in the care of Doctor Hildreth,) I hired one at the livery stable to go to Bucyrus circuit,—for which I had to pay the little sum of four dollars. Upon returning here, I find my beast still unfit for use, and it is thought, will never be much, if any, better. My only opportunity of getting to the Sandusky, Thompson and Belview circuits, is by the cars, via Sandusky City,—I intend leaving at 4 o'clock this day.

This has been to me a year of sore afflictions, I have been severely tried; but I thank God, I have profited by this trial. The christian kindness of all, ministers, members and others, has a deep place in my heart, and cannot soon be forgotten. Yours in love, GEO. CLANCY.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Alarming Rail Road Accident in England.

The scene of the accident is the noble bridge over the river Dee, close to Chester race course. The river is there crossed by an iron bridge of three spans, each span 100 feet in width; each span is composed of massive iron girders, supported by stone of the most firm and durable construction; there are four of these girders in each span, one on each side of the up and down line of rails; strong wooden beams were fixed across the girders, and along these the lines were laid; the girders themselves were formed of two pieces of iron firmly riveted in the centre, and seemed well adapted to sustain an immense weight. The train consisted of one first class carriage, two second class carriages, and a luggage van.

The train was proceeding as usual along the line, had already crossed two of the arches, and was in the act of crossing the third, when, without a moment's warning, all the carriages were precipitated in the river, a depth of about 30 feet; the engine and tender which had crossed the bridge, pursuing their course along the line. The tender, however, soon became detached from the locomotives, and was thrown across the line. Most of the sufferers who survive became insensible. One man, however, who found himself in a carriage turned upside down in the river, managed to get through the window, and swam ashore. The crash had spread the alarm far and wide, and plenty of assistance was soon on the spot; the people were taken out of the carriages and conveyed to the infirmary.

As soon as the agitation consequent upon such a dreadful occurrence had subsided, attention was directed to the fallen arch; but, strange to say, only one of the girders, that on the outside, had given way, while the other remained perfectly firm and entire. Of course, the weight of the carriages bore down the rails and the horizontal beams, which with the girder, now broken into several pieces, fell into the river. It also tore with it a portion of the stone work in which it was fixed on the Welsh side of the river. Very fortunately, however, nothing seemed to have fallen upon the carriages; and though they were crushed one against the other, they did not appear so completely smashed as would have been the case had the arch been built of stone.

Beware of Counterfeits!—On the counterfeiters arrested last night were found two hundred dollars of spurious money—Lafayette Bank of Cincinnati, notes of denomination of five dollars—the most dangerous counterfeit, probably, ever detected. Letter B, payable to James Findley; Gano, Cashier; Carlisle, President; No. 1960, dated January 16th, 1847; Vignette on head of Liberty, on the left; on the right of centre the signing of Declaration of Independence. All beautifully engraved, and paper good. Line of Underwood, Bald, Spencer & Hafly, (engravers,) runs up. Beware, for these bills are calculated to deceive any body.—Cincinnati Dollar Weekly Commercial.

Arrest of Counterfeiters.—Spurious Money—Plates Secured.—By far the most important arrests of this year have just been made in our city. Constables Peter Davision, Evan Ewan, James L. Raffin, and D. Kelly, by dint of their own peculiar knowledge, succeeded last week in arresting a man named Burkheimer, and sending him to Adams county for trial. On Monday evening the same officers arrested an engraver named John Lovejoy, in his own house, where they found one plate ready for printing spurious money, or nearly so. Soon after Lovejoy's arrest, they took a man named Lewis Sleight, in a house on Centre street, between Elm and Race streets. In this house was found several plates for striking spurious money, and a large amount of spurious notes, ready for circulation. Of the Lafayette Bank, described yesterday, there were some $500; a lot of one's, Indiana; some Jefferson county, N. Y., notes, and divers others, amounting, in all, to about $1,000. They also found a lot of Galliopohs. The plates—seven or eight in number—are of the most dangerous kinds; but they are now where they cannot be used to swindle the community. The persons arrested are now in jail, and will be examined before Esquire Brooks. The officers named deserve great praise for securing these men and this money, and saving the public from loss.—Cin. Com.

Musketoes.—As the musketo season is approaching, we give the subjoined receipt for what it is worth, as we find it in that valuable periodical, the Scientific American. There is little doubt but that our Zanesvile readers will have ample opportunity to test its efficacy in a few weeks, and the experiment will cost but little time or money. We suppose that faith is not necessary to success.—Z. Gaz.

"Attach a piece of flannel or sponge to a thread, made fast to the top of a bedstead, wet the flannel or sponge with camphorated spirits, and the musketoes will have the room."

Valuable Discovery for Hot Climates.—A gentleman in Brooklyn has discovered a plan by which the temperature inside of a dwelling may be reduced twenty or thirty degrees below that of the outside. He proposes to construct barracks upon this plan for the U. S. Army at Vera Cruz; and by having the soldiers live a temperature below that in which the yellow fever and other tropical diseases become contagious, he hopes to save hundreds of valuable lives. He has explained his system to us, and from his successful experiments, made during the warmest day this season, we are favorably impressed with its utility. The invention can be applied to new dwellings at a very small expense. We believe he has taken the necessary steps to procure a patent.—N. Y. Sun.

Oregon and Califonia.—The St. Josephs, Missouri, Gazette of the 11th inst., says—Four hundred and thirty-three wagons passed through Independence this spring destined for Oregon and California. The number that have passed through this place added to the above will increase the number to upwards of 1300 wagons, now on their way to Oregon. Averaging five persons to each wagon, you have 6500 persons large and small, now on their way to Oregon and California. We heard yesterday that near five hundred Mormons had left their encampment at the Bluffs, with the intention of settling in or near this place.

The Truth.—Good old Wesley said, "He that is nurturing self-love in his child, is nurturing a devil." We believe it. Mother, do you think of this when you are "tipping off" that little daughter of yours, in all the gay, foolish, frippery and finery of the day; making her proud and haughty as a little Lucifer? You are murdering the soul; planting a dagger in your own bosom!—Golden Rule.

Another Ship Dispatched.—The new ship Reliance cleared at Boston, on Friday, for Cork. She is partly filled with breadstuffs, clothing, &c., shipped by the Boston relief committee, and is valued at $29,369 13.

AN LOST.—A young man named Garnel Bry-disappeared from Sherwood's Corners, Caycounty, on the 30th of May, in a state of de-

Perilous Voyage on a Table.

When the Chesapeake was about going down, Mr. A. M. Stem, of Green Spring, O., Mr. W. H. Higgins, of Farmington, O., and Mr. George Van Doren, of Lower Sandusky, O., left the wreck and attempted to reach the shore supported by a table, to which they clung. After they had floated a few rods from the wreck, Mr. Wm. Steele, of West Mill Creek, Pa., thinking all would be sucked down with the then fast sinking craft, took his chance of escape by leaping into the lake astride the tiller stick. Mr. Steele being a large, resolute, muscular man, and somewhat familiar with the water, soon overtook the persons clinging to the table, and joined his fate with theirs. Not long after a sea knocked off his hat in which he had placed his pocket book containing valuable papers, when he left his hold on the table and tiller stick, swam after and secured his hat, and returned to the table. His pocket book and tiller stick, however were lost in the daring adventure.

The four found it difficult to keep the table balanced, and the action of the waves frequently plunged some of the number under. In one instance Mr. Van Doren was swept completely under and came up on the opposite side of the table. He was much strangled, and after this failed fast in his efforts to keep his head above water. About an hour after leaving the wreck, as Mr. Steele thinks, Mr. Van Doren succeeded in raising upon the table face down, and lacking strength to support his head, he soon drowned, and his body rested upon the table some minutes after life was apparently extinct, before the waves washed it off. He said but little after leaving the wreck, and was divested of all his clothing except shirt and pantaloons.

After losing Mr. Van Doren, Mr. Stem and Mr. Higgins occupied one side of the table, and Mr. Steele, being a heavy man, balanced them on the other. The table was without a leaf, and bottom up. By drawing their breasts up against the edge they could reach over and clasp the legs of the table with their hands, and in this way they kept afloat for hours. Mr. Steele urged his companions to exert themselves constantly in order to prevent chillness and stupor, but by daylight both had become nearly unconscious, and when picked up by the Harrison, Mr. Higgins had been insensible for some time, his hands fixed to the table legs in a death grasp.

Mr. Steele informs us that he relaxed no effort to work the float toward shore, until the Harrison come in sight and gave hope of rescue, and that until that time he did not feel much exhausted or chilled, nor did hope for a moment forsake him. But when the Harrison passed by without hearing or heeding his cry for help, his heart sunk, and he nearly gave up all for lost.—Still he struggled on, and fortunately the boat soon returned and rescued himself and companions from the very jaws of a watery grave.—Cleveland Herald.

THE TELEGRAPH TO HALIFAX, N. S.—Mr. F. O. J. Smith, the Director of the Telegraph, says that in a short time he expects to have the wires of the Telegraph reach Halifax, thereby bringing England nearer to us by at least two days.—The Telegraph to Portland from Boston, he says, will be finished this week.

IMMIGRATION AT NEW YORK.—The arrivals of vessels and passengers at this port during the month of June in three years has been as follows:—

	1845.	1846.	1847.
Vessels from foreign ports,	251	251	386

HARBOR AND RIVER CONVENTION.—The authorities of Chicago have voted $500 for the use of the Committee of Arrangements appointed to receive the delegates to the Convention. Large numbers were arriving.

WARNING.—Persons disposed to be inquisitively mischevious, should take warning by the following: A Mrs. Brown, at Palmer village, New York, went behind the counter of a store and commenced examining some bottles of essences, oils, &c. Taking up a vial of the oil of Tansy—a very active poison—and either without knowing its true character, or supposing it to be merely the essence, she swallowed some of it. She was almost immediately taken with convulsions, and death ensued in less than three quarters of an hour.

A DIFFICULTY.—The citizens of Chicago, Illinois, are having quite a quarrel with their city government in regard to their river and harbor convention. The city council appropriated $500 to be expended by the committee of arrangements; but the sum being deemed entirely inadequate, $1,000 more was asked, which was summarily refused. The citizens thereupon held a public meeting, and an angry debate ensued.—Much excitement prevails, as we infer from the tone of the Journal, which devotes a long article to the subject.

AN INDIAN LEGISLATOR.—The Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and seven or eight of the Governor's Council, Passamaquoddy Indians, announce to the world through the Eastport Sentinel, that they had given in their votes for Joseph Lolah Selmo, to represent the Passamoquoddy tribe of Indians in the present Legislature of the State of Maine.

SUICIDE.—A Mrs. Butler, of Oberlin, Ohio, committed Suicide on Friday night last, at that place, by cutting her throat with a pair of scissars. She was in bed at the time, with a little child.—She was laboring under a fit of derangement.—True Dem.

BIBLES FOR SLAVES.—The Bible Societies of Virginia have authorized the presentation of bibles to such colored members of the Baptist Churches as are able to read and unable to purchase them. Very few of the slaves, if any, are able to read.

SAILING OF MISSIONARIES.—The following persons embarked on Monday afternoon for Smyrna, in the bark Catalpa, Capt. Watson, viz:—Rev. Messrs. Cochran, Benton, and Bliss, with their wives, and Miss Rice. Mr. and Mrs. Cochran and Miss Rice are to proceed to Oroomiah, to join the Nestorian mission. Mr. and Mrs. Bliss will go with them as far as Ezeloon, where they are to labor in behalf of the Armenians. Mr. and Mrs. Benton are expected in the Syria mission. We have learned this morning that the Catalpa was not able to leave the harbor yesterday on account of a sudden change of the wind. Mr. Cochran pursued his theological studies at the Union Theological Seminary, New York; Mr. Bliss at Andover; Mr. Benton at the East Windsor Theological Institute. The American Board are expecting to send out two missionaries to Bombay in a few weeks; and during the coming autumn, some ten or fifteen others will probably go to different missions.—Boston Traveller.

DISTRESSING ACCIDENT.—A melancholy scene occured at Easton, Pa., on Thursday afternoon, the 10th inst. R. Beatty Steel, a student in Lafayette College, 18 years of age, went to bathe with some of his fellow students, and, while swimming, was seized with the cramp, and sank to rise no more. He was a son of the Rev. Robert Steel, of Abingdon.

BURIED ALIVE.—On Saturday morning last a horrid accident occured to a laborer on front street, below Market, Philadelphia. Several laborers were at work excavating an old foundation, for the erection of new buildings, when the stone arch beneath the pavement gave way and fell in on the workmen, burying one of their number, named Samuel Caswell, beneath the mass of stone and brick. It is supposed he was crushed to death almost immediately. The others escaped without injury, and were occupied the entire day in removing the ruins, to extricate the body of their fellow laborer. The base of the arches became weakened, it is supposed, by digging the cellar or foundation still deeper.

STARVATION.—On Friday afternoon in New York, a foreigner, who had been in the city but a couple of days, named John Turner, was taken from the street in a dying condition, and died soon after being deposited in a station-house. He perished for want of nourishment. Soon after a lad, who proved to be his son, was taken by the police from another street in an equally exhausted condition, but by the timely and judicious administration of nutriment, aided by his youth, his life was saved.

TALENTS.—"I have no talents." Indeed you have, young man; but they are in a crude state. Dig them up—drag them to the light—turn them over—polish them, and they will sparkle and serve to give light to the world. You know not what you are capable of doing; you cannot sound the ocean of thought that is consolidated within you. You must labor—keep at it—and delve deep and long, before you will begin to realize much. Be inactive; mourn because you were not created a giant in intellect, and you will die a drone and a ninny.

Dr. Chalmers.

The late news from Europe brought the startling intelligence of the death of this eminent man. No event which has occurred for many years will produce a deeper sensation in the religious world, and will be more generally lamented, than this. Christians of both hemispheres, and of every name, will unite in mourning over it as a common calamity.

Dr. C. was known as a profound theologian, an eminet preacher, a zealous and laborious philanthropist. His printed works are an invaluable treasure of noble thoughts and stirring eloquence, and have always been esteemed the finest specimens of theological writing. No man of the present age was more remarkable for strength of intellect and unwavering moral courage than he. The part which he took in asserting and maintaining the rights of the Free Church of Scotland against the encroachments of the State, is well known, and his subsequent influence in her assemblies, in harmonizing and controlling her deliberations, was such as to show the love and veneration with which he was regarded by his own people. His loss to his country and his Church will be deeply felt, and long and loud in every vale of Scotland will be the lamentation over their "great man fallen."

We shall look with interest for further information respecting this melancholly event. At present, all we have is contained in the following extract from a foreign paper:

DEATH OF DR. CHALMERS.—The death of great men is extraordinary. Dr. Chalmers is dead.—The light of the Free Church—the sturdy asserter of ministerial independence—the acute preceptor—the eloquent pulpit orator—the pride, in fact, of the Scottish Church, is no more. He expired as calmly, in Scotland, the other day, as the babe at the mother's breast—as placid, resigned, contentedly. No previous intimation showed that he was heir to nature's infirmity; the hand of disease was upon him. The brilliant intellect was to have shed its light next day on the General Assembly. He was a great man—great in his power, in his mental supremacy, in his moral grandeur. Foremost amongst one of the most enlightened and best educated nations in the world, Dr. Chalmers was his country's idol—her favorite son. Peace to his memory! He broke through the fetters of self-interest, in establishing the Free Church, and preferred the dictates of conscience, the sense of manly independence, to the smiles of power or the blandishments of a throne. In his life he was revered—in his death he is deeply, sincerely, and affectionately mourned. —Episcopal Recorder.

CONFORMITY TO THE WORLD.—The following paragraph from Bishop Eastburn's Address to the Convention of his Diocese, will find an application in various sections of the Church. We hope its suggestions will be duly weighed, and perfectly improved:—

"There is one subject to which I would affectionately advert, before closing the present Address. I refer to the sad increase of a spirit of conformity, on the part of our communicants, to the course of this frivolous and vain world. Against these inconsistencies by which the character of our Church is so deeply wounded, let it be your part, my brethren of the Clergy, faithfully to lift up the warning voice. Let the door of Confirmation be carefully guarded; so that none may be encouraged to come to that rite, and to profess themselves followers of the Savior, who do not give good evidence of having been elevated in heart and taste above these pleasures, so calculated to bring reproach on religion, and destruction on the soul. By holding up a high standard of Christian practice, you may, it is true, diminish the number of those whom you present for the laying on of hands;' and may seem to many, to be unsuccessful laborers in your Master's vineyard. But you will be infinitely the gainers by such fidelity. You will rid yourselves of that heaviest drag on the wheels of ministerial success,—a band of persons numbered among the Lord's people by profession, and yet failing to adorn that profession by a consistent course of living. And, above all, you will approve yourselves to God."—Episcopal Recorder.

Folly of Hypercriticism.

Some individuals take it for granted that the more they criticise a performance, literary or otherwise, the more they are to be commended for their wit and smartness. Thus influenced, they will find fault with things which all others esteem beauties, and which they themselves know to be beauties. Of such a class of characters was Lord Halifax, the pretended friend and cotemporary of Pope. On the occasion of the latter having finished his translation of the first three books of Homer's Iliad, the former expressed a great desire to have them read at his house. To this the poet was somewhat averse, as Congreve the dramatist, Garth the physician, and Addison the essayist, were to be present, and throw in such remarks as each, in his respective department, saw fit. Pope, however, received little or no rebuke at the hands of his literary compeers. Halifax did all the criticising, and he did it, too, in a manner not spiced with great love and kindness, though he was himself a rigid disciple of civility.

Ever and anon he would say, "I beg your pardon, Mr. Pope, but there is something in that passage that does not quite please me. Be so good as to mark the place, and consider it at your leisure. I am sure you can give it a little turn."—Such loose and indiscriminate views on his translation, gave Pope great annoyance. He was perfectly non-plussed; and in a conversation with Dr. Garth, a short time afterward, said, it was utterly impossible for him to guess at what his lordship could be offended. The Doctor laughed at him heartily, and said he did not understand the ways of Halifax. Garth then told Pope to leave his lines unaltered; to call on his lordship in some three or four months; to thank him for his kind and judicious observations; and all would turn out well. Pope did as directed; called on the hypercritic at his residence; returned, very politely, and gracefully, his thanks; and then read the lines exactly as he had read them two months before in the presence of Garth, Congreve, and Addison. Lord Halifax was now in the height of good feeling, and exclaimed, as Pope concluded the manuscript, "Ay, now they are perfectly right; nothing could be better!"—W. C. Advocate.

Biographical.

Written for the Western Recorder.

One more of our members is gone to rest. Sister ELIZABETH GARRARD, relic of Br. William Garrard, (a worthy and useful member who deceased some 6 years since,) after a painful and protracted illness, departed this (transitory) life on May 6th, 1847, in the 68th year of her age.

When Sister Garrard united with the Methodist Protestant Church, the writer is not informed, but from the records it appears she was a member some years. Her last illness was evidently sanctified to the good of her soul, and the manifestation thereof a great comfort to her sympathising friends. Before she closed her eyes to sleep in Jesus, she was much afflicted with frequent paroxysms of a spasmodic character, but through the whole she seemed in patience to poss ess her soul, and not a murmuring utterance was heard to escape her lips, nor the shadow of a doubt arise to darken her sky. Hers was not a tumultuous or ecstatic joy, but a settled serene peace, and the surface of her soul was unruffled by doubt or fear. She felt her own weakness and utter unworthiness, but she belie vingly relied upon her Saviour, and found in Him an all sufficient friend and support in the trying hour. She was sensible her end was nigh, and was ready and willing to exchange a world of affliction and trial, for a heaven of repose, tranquillity and joy. O may we all ready stand, believing, waiting, watching unto prayer, against the final day. Then shall our end be peace, and our salvation sure. W. REEVES.

Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church.

NO. II.

MR. EDITOR:—By your permission, I will now direct the attention of your readers to part of that portion of the constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church, which may be called the preamble. The Convention reviewing the past, and, no doubt, feeling deeply impressed with the high responsibility they as members, were under to their brethren, who had elevated them to the station they then occupied; with their still higher obligations to God, and knowing that the eyes of friends and foes were upon them, they commence their work by saying. "We the representatives of the Associated Methodist Churches, in General Convention assembled, acknowledging the Lord Jesus Christ as the only Head of the Church, and the word of God as the sufficient rule of faith and practice in all things pertaining to godliness; and being fully persuaded, that the representative form of church government, is the most scriptural, best suited to our condition, and most congenial with our views and feelings as fellow citizens of the saints, and the household of God: And, Whereas, a written Constitution, establishing the form of government, and securing to the Ministers and Members of the Church their rights and privileges, is the best safe-guard of Christian liberty." In the foregoing, the members of the convention set forth the authority by which they contemplate acting, their full conviction from the scriptures,—of the correctness of the representative form of Church Government, and the necessity of a written constitution, forever to secure the rights of every minister and member, and to govern the legislative bodies of the church, in all their future deliberations and enactments. The ministers claim no exclusive or divine right to expel the lay delegates from this convention; they feel themselves, both ministers and laymen, upon equal ground; and proceed from delegated authority. Some have contended, however, at least in effect, that the Church of Christ can never be governed successfully, by a government when the people, or lay membership participate; and that it was the design of the Great Head of the Church, that his ministers of the gospel should be the rulers exclusively; that these, only, have a right to make rules, and exercise moral discipline. From what portion of the word of God they obtained their information, respecting the correctness of this position, I am not prepared to determine. When the question was propounded to the Lord Jesus, Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven? Jesus, instead of informing them that his ministers of the gospel should bear rule alone, and that all others must bow with meek submission, called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, and said, verly I say unto you, execept ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven. When James and John desired to be promoted above the other disciples, and these became much displeased; Jesus called them unto him, and saith unto them; ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and the great ones exercise authority upo n them. But so shall it not be among you; but whosoever will be great among you, shall be you minister; and whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. We here discover nothing presented, suitable to the equipage and pompousness of a domineering prelate. There are no pretensions here favored, by the Great Head of his Church, to superiority, and the divine right of his ministers to make, and enforce laws, where the governed have no participation in their enactment. The apostle Peter said to the elder; Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock. We find in the second century, "Each Christian society, governed by its own laws, and directed by its own ministers, formed within itself an independent republic, unconnected with its neighboring state by any other alliances than those of mutual faith and reciprocal good offices. But near the end of the second century the churches of Greece and Asia established, as a custom and a law, that the bishops of the independent churches should meet in the capitol of the province at the stated periods of spring and autumn. "It is not to be supposed, in this arrangement, either that the people foresaw the alienation of their rights, or that the clergy looked forward to that power which in succeeding ages was obtained by the ecclesiastical order." Ch. Hist. by M. Reeter, page 52. Here is quite enough, though but a small portion of the testimony, to prove that in the early age of the church, the laity, or people, shared largely in the enactment of rules for the goverment of themselves and their brethren immediately associated with them. It was by the encroachments of the clergy, that this RIGHT was wrested from them, and that they were, finally reduced to the humiliating state of vassals. To guard against similar encroachments, and to secure the ministry and laity in their rights as brethren, I conclude the Convention acted wisely, to adopt, and write down a fundamental law, for the government of all legislative assemblies of the Methodist Protestant Church.

I will now, by permission, proceed to the "ELEMENTARY PRINCIPLES." In these, in a condensed state, are contained the fundamental principles of Methodist Protestantism; and he who discard, the doctrines herein contained, let him be called by what name he may, does not belong to the Methodist Protestant family. These principles are the grand basis upon which the constitution is founded; and they are contained in eleven items. I shall only notice a part of these: and I shall not feel myself bound to take them in the order in which they stand. I commence with the fifth item, which says, "Church trials should be conducted on gospel principles only; and no minister or member should be excommunicated except for immorality; the propogation of unchristian doctrines; or for the neglect of duties enjoined by the word of God." No christian can object to this feature of the constitution; no man or association of men, can scripturally possess the right to make any other tests of membership, than those contained in this item, & here presented. Where the power is assumed to enact laws, making any others than those herein contained, terms of church membership, the authority of the Lord Jesus, the only legislator for his Church, must be encroached. The second item confines this view of the subject; it says, "Christ is the only Head of the Church; and the word of God the only rule of faith and conduct." The 4th, item is of great importance. Many of the members of the convention, and their electors, had experienced the sore effects of expressing opinions which they religiously believed were in accordance with the rights of men and the word of God, by being expelled the church, without any remedy, but either to relinquish their conscientious views, or to organize another branch of the Church upon more liberal principles. Hence, this item says, "Every man has an inalienable right to private judgment, in matters of religion; and an equal right to express his opinion, in any way which will not violate the laws of God, or the rights of his fellow men."

The position which ministers occupy in the church is defined in the 6th item. It says, "The pastoral or ministerial office and duties are of divine appointment; and all elders in the church of God are equal; but ministers are forbidden to be lords over God's heritage, or to have dominion over the faith of the saints." There are three very important principles contained in this item. First, The divine call of the ministers of the Lord Jesus. Secondly, The equality of all elders, and consequently deacons, in the church of God. Thirdly, The prohibition to claim dominion, as lords, over the household of the Lord our Maker. The first, I believe, is a common doctrine among the whole family of Methodists, both in Europe and America, and throughout the world, where Methodists are found. The second, viz: "All elders in the church of God are equal," is a doctrine, not common to all; though the Methodist Protestant Church has declared that she believes this to have been the primitive view of this subject. They have no third head order of the clergy in their church. Elders, both stationed and unstationed, who are all equal, are the highest order with them. In the second century, there appears to have been no distinction. M. Reeter, in his Ch. Hist. page 51, says, "Accordingly we find, at the comme ncement of this century, that few alterations had been proposed or adopted by the Church. The bishops and presbyters were still undistinguished by any superiority of station or difference of apparel; they were still chosen by the people." The third idea in this item, involves that, of the sight of the laity to participate in the enactment of the laws by which they are to be governed in the church. I have already paid some attention to this, and I deem it unnecessary to adduce anything further upon this branch of the subject.

MR. EDITOR: Please say to Brother Banks that Paul Pry is not certain whether he did or not vote, that local preachers should attend the Annual Conference for examination before receiving orders; he is rather of the opinion he was absent on a committee; but if Brother Banks wishes to know how he would vote if present, should the vote again be taken, he would inform him, he would support the resolution. He is a Virginian and votes vice voce, and trusts never to give a vote of which he would be ashamed, even though called on to declare it in a public newspaper. He thinks such a course will be for the benefit of many of our very good and worthy unstationed brethren, as the examination would be likely to be more in accordance with the spirit and nature of the design of examining candidates for the ministry.

Narrative.

How to Govern a Family.

Now sit down, and I will tell you how Jacob Humphrey,—Uncle Jacob, every body used to call him,—tried a new method for governing his family, and how he succeeded.

You see Uncle Jacob was a plain sort of a man, who knew a great deal more about his own farm than he did about Europe or Asia; and why shouldn't he, for he was born there, and so was his father before him; nor did he often meet with folks who had been every where and seen every thing, and moreover, he didn't take a paper.

"O that was the worst of all."

Well, perhaps it was; but Uncle Jacob had never had his mind enlightened on the moral turpitude of such conduct, and some allowance is to be made for that, you know.

When Jacob's father died, he took charge of the homestead, married a daughter of farmer Clapp, who lived next neighbor, and which daughter Jacob declared had not her equal in the whole world; all of which was very natural, especially as he never had been acquainted with more than about a dozen girls beside Betsy. Betsy Clapp, however, was a nice girl, and so Jacob made her his wife.

Now it came to pass, after many days, that Jacob Humphrey had quite a large family of children growing up around him, consisting of five sons and four daughters. It came to pass, moreover, that these 5 sons and 4 daughters, as they grew up, did not receive any education, except what each one provided for him or herself, with such juvenile assistance as other children could give.

'What, didn't they go to school at all?'

O yes, they went to the district school, where the teacher taught them 'to read, write and cipher;' and the scholars taught them sundry other things in their line, which they learned sooner, and remembered longer. And all this wasn't strange, as their parents did not take the 'Common School Journal,' nor the 'Mothers' Magazine,' nor did they believe much in sending children to the "cademy,' to learn what 'wouldn't never do 'em no good.'

They all bid fair to be self-educated men and women; and prominent among the branches in which they became proficient were 'disobedience to parents,' and 'quarrels with one another.'

Uncle Jacob and Aunt Betsy had no control over the children, so that each one did what seemed right in his own eyes. Sometimes, when all were pleased, every thing was fair and mild in the old kitchen as a summer sunset; but as there were so many of them to be pleased, this did not very frequently happen; and then a cloud would pass over the sky. Then it would happen that some unquiet spirit would possess them all at once, when the storm, for a time restrained, but gathering force all the while, would at length break forth in a very tempest of passion, in which Lion, the old house dog, and the cats, would not unfrequently bear a part; indeed, it did not seem quite so out of place in them.

'What the dogs is all this racket about,' said Uncle Jacob, as he entered the house one day. 'Wife what do you have such a noise for?'

'You know, Jacob, I can't do nothing with the plaguey young ones,' replied Mrs. Humphrey.

John sat on the floor, pinching the ears of old Lion; Nanny, a fat little thing, just learning to walk, was trying to lift the cat by one leg; Bob and Sal, who had just returned from school, were attempting, in 'converse high,' to settle the disputed boundary in a plate of pudding, out of which they were both eating; while little Jake, his father's favorite and namesake, was drawing about, at fearful speed, a little wagon with board wheels, thus completing the deafening harmony.

'I do declare, Jake,' said Aunt Betsy, 'if you don't take that old wagon out doors, I'll knock you over.'

So saying, she aimed a murderous blow at poor Jake, well skilled in such discipline, dodging it with an aptness only acquired by long practice, and waiting till his mother was fairly out of reach, his chariot wheels were again heard in the grand chorus. Uncle Jacob said nothing, but sat a few minutes, to give patience her perfect work; then, with one foot he sent chariot and charioteer in one general ruin arcoss the floor, and marching straight over the fallen hero, went out 'to do the chores.'

In process of time, the old man became interested in the subject of religion, and subsequently, a genuine Christian, simple-hearted and honest as a child, and devoted as a Christian only can be. Aunt Betsy, also, and two or three children, became the subjects of regenerating grace. How changed! Old things were passed away, and all things became new; affairs went on so sweetly, they marveled at themselves, 'the change appeared so great.'

But the old leaven was not wholly worked out, and occasionally, little fretful disputes would becloud the otherwise fair sunshine of the family. True, it did not increase to any alarming degree, but was sufficient to disturb the quiet harmony of the family circle, and caused many a sad moment to the pious heart and sensitive conscience of Uncle Jacob.

'The happiness of many a Christian family is almost destroyed in this same way.'

Alas, too often. The old man queried with himself how he could stop this, for argument and exhortation he had tried in vain. At length he hit upon a plan, and determined the next occasion to try its efficacy.—He had strong faith in the power of prayer, and usually, strong faith with which to pray.

He was not long in waiting for an opportunity to test his plan. Some trifling thing gave occasion to a disagreement between two of the younger children, which waxed quite warm, and was taken sides in by the others, until there was a complete jargon of sharp and rather angry contention.

'Children,' said Uncle Jacob, after stitting in silence until the storm had gotten dangerously high, 'Children, let us pray.' This was a new mode of attack. Aunt Betsy raised her spectacles, and gazed in astonishment at her husband, as if she had a presentiment that something was going to happen. The five sons and four daughters looked aghast, first at their father, and then at each other, uncertain as to what really was the old man's meaning. But they were not long in doubt, for before they could exchange the second look, their father was on his knees, sending up his supplication, simple and ardent, that God would give them grace to overcome the sinful habit that so destroyed their peace of mind, and especially that those who were disciples of Him who did not strive, might exhibit the spirit of their Master.

His prayer was short, as all good prayers are, and when he said 'Amen,' there was a calm, as complete and grateful as that which rested on Galilee's waters, when the Lord said, Peace, be still.' I need not say, that dispute was settled, and never alluded to afterward.

A week or ten days had passed, and all was quiet in the old kitchen, when one day Uncle Jacob came into the house, and as he entered the door, the sound of angry voices struck upon his ear.

'They are at it again, husband,' said Aunt Betsy, as she saw him enter.

'Let us pray,' said Uncle Jacob. They all understood it now, and felt the severe rebuke. Again the storm was hushed to rest, and a sacred fear pervaded that circle, which lasted many days.

A month or two had passed, and the boys were one day in the field with their father at work. Something went wrong, and a severe dispute arose. The old man bore it as long as he could, and stopping, 'Boys,' says he, 'boys, let us pray.' He did pray, and contention ceased.

'Husband' said Aunt Betsy, 'husband, what a difference it has made with the children, your praying with them so. That was a first-rate plan, that's a fact. They cry so when you pray, and then they are so good and loving afterwards,—'tis first-rate. And then they don't hardly ever speak cross now; and they mind so much better, too. I guess you must pray every day, husband; hadn't you better, it does so much good?'

'I guess I must,' said Uncle Jacob, for he hadn't done it before. 'I guess I must, and read the Bible more.' 'Yes,' said Aunt Betsy, 'read the Bible too.'

Well how did they did come out? Why, well enough, of course.

Those who persevere in prayer, in the right spirit, always prevail. Uncle Jacob's family became one of the most pleasant and well-ordered families that could be found.—If any serious difficulty ever occurred, 'Let us pray,' would set it all right in a few moments; and I think if Christian parents would adopt this plan, the bickerings and strife that too often destroy the peace of the household circle, would be more effectually overcome.

'That was nice, that plan of Uncle Jacob's; that 'Let us pray' was the very thing, wasn't it?'

Battle with a Lion.

A letter from French Algeria gives us the particulars of a battle between a detachment of French soldiers, and a huge lion, one of those kings of the forest that range through the mountains and plains of Africa. In clearing the Arabs from around Oned Zerga, last June, the French soldiers discovered this monstrous lion in friendly intercourse with the natives. His female companion and numerous progeny, occupied a natural fort in one of the neighboring hills, from whence, as general purveyor for the whole community, he sallied forth daily to visit the Arab village, where every attention was paid to him, and his wants duly cared for. His visits created no uneasiness among the Arabs. Men, women, and children, could approach him without fear. Occasionally, it is true, he would carry home with him a cow, a sheep, or a dog, without asking permission.—But he only did so when the villagers neglected to furnish his usual supply, and being a good friend in other respects, the Arabs rather encouraged him in the exercise of his free choice of whatever he wished, themselves and families of course excepted.

The French having expelled the Arabs, his lionship was compelled to take a wider range in search of food, and in an unlucky hour, on the 18th of June last, made himself known to eight French soldiers, who had heard of his majesty, and were in search of his lair. He approached them quietly, apparently anxious to open negotiations for a treaty of friendship, similar to that existing between his late neighbors, and himself. But the French soldiers, being a civilized people, entertained moral antipathy against lions and Arabs—and without waiting for an opportunity to smother the lion and his family in a cave as Col. Pelisser, or Marshall Begeaud destroyed seven hundred men, women, and children in Dahra—the eight soldiers formed into line, and discharged a volley of musketry at his majesty. For the first time in his life, he discovered that mankind are not all alike. His first impulse appeared like a determination to give battle, but the odds were against him, and with a slight wound in one leg, he returned to an adjoining thicket. The soldiers surrounded him, and as night approached, they built large fires—four of their number remained on guard whilst the others slept. As the fires began to kindle, the lion commenced his war cry, and in a few minutes the whole wilderness resounded with the echo. Lions and lionesses, answering the cry of the forest king, poured down from the hills. The thicket appeared to be surrounded with beasts. The soldiers were unable to sleep, but they entertained no fear of an attack so long as they kept their fires. Fagots were thrown upon the burning heaps. Higher and higher rose the flames, and louder and fiercer roared the beasts. Thus passed the night. At daylight, as the soldiers were preparing to dislodge their game, one of them discovered the lion within four paces, in the very act of crouching for a spring upon him, and had barely time to present his bayonet, when his powerful adversary came down upon it, the bayonet passing through him to the lock of the musket. The shock was so great, that the soldier was thrown to the ground, and in an instant the paws of the monster were plunged into his flesh. The other soldiers flew to the rescue, but dared not fire lest they should kill their comrade. The unequal combat was horrible. For a time, the menacing attitude of the soldiers around, prevented the frantic lion from despatching his victim. He lay upon the poor soldier with his huge paws indented in the flesh. Although frantic with pain, the lion hardly moved for some moments. He growled terrifically at his enemies, while his motionless victim implored protection. At last the lion moved. His claws sunk deeper. Screams of anguish from his victim pierced the hearts of the spectators, and at the risk of shooting their comrade, two fired. Piercing shrieks from the soldier now rent the air, as the wounded beast attacked him with greater fury. Supposing from his cries that their shots had seriously wounded their comrade, the soldiers fired three more, and the lion fell! They marched forward, and despatched the monster. The comrade, thus happily rescued, was found to have received only one gun shot wound, and that not dangerous, being in the thigh; his wounds from the lion's claws were more severe, and he suffered severely from the loss of blood before reaching the hospital.—The lion was found to be twelve feet long, and six feet nine inches round the body.

A Pleasant Surprise.

A young man of eighteen or twenty, a student in a university, took a walk one day with a professor, who was commonly called the student's friend, such was his kindness to the young men whose office it was to instruct.

While they were walking together, and the professor was seeking to lead the conversation to grave subjects, they saw a pair of old shoes lying in their path, which they supposed to belong to a poor man who was at work close by, and who had nearly finished his day's work.

The young student turned to the professor, saying, "Let us play the man a trick; we will hide his shoes and conceal ourselves behind those bushes, and watch his perplexity when he cannot find them."

"My dear friend," answered the professor, "we must never amuse ourselves at the expense of the poor. But you are rich, and you may give yourself a much greater pleasure by means of this poor man. Put a dollar in each shoe, and then we will hide ourselves."

The student did so, and then placed himself with the professor behind the bushes close by, through which they could watch the laborer, and see whatever wonder or joy he might express.

The poor man had soon finished his work, and came across the field, to the path where he had left his coat and shoes. While he put on the coat, he slipped one foot into one of his shoes; but feeling something hard, he stooped down and found the dollar. Astonishment and wonder were seen upon his countenance; he gazed upon the dollar, and turned it around and looked again and again, then he looked around him on all sides, but could see no one.

Now he put the money in his pocket and proceeded to put on the other shoe, but how great his astonishment when he found the other dollar! His feelings overcame him; he fell upon his knees, looked up to heaven, and uttered a loud and fervent thanksgiving, in which he spoke of his wife, sick and helpless, and his children without bread, whom this timely bounty from some unknown hand, would save from perishing.

The young man stood there deeply affected, and tears filled his eyes.

"Now," said the professor, "are you not much better pleased than if you had played your intended trick?"

"O! dearest sir," answered the youth, "you have taught me a lesson now that I will never forget. I feel now the truth of the words which I never before understood, "It is better to give than to receive."

We should never approach the poor, but with the wish to do them good.

VARIETY.

Neglect of Family Prayer.

Prof. Ten Broeck, of Michigan University, writing in the Christian Herald, from Central N. York, thus describes a home scene. Let the sketch be read and pondered by all heads of families to whom it applies.

"The father was one of those still men who, much as he thought of company, carried on his part of the conversation in brief questions and monasyllabic answers. He had deceived himself into the belief that his talents were not such as to make it his duty to conduct family worship. With this view he had lived for more than forty years, in every other respect a consistent Christian. A son, who, at the time referred to, was preparing for the ministry, and already licensed to preach, was spending a vacation at home, the last evening of his stay had arrived—the family Bible, as usual, is placed before him on the stand, with a request to lead in prayer. The thought occurred, that now for a year or more, whatever devotion might be felt, no voice of prayer could be heard in the family, except from the lips of strangers who should turn in for the night. The thought afflicted him, and endeavoring to use such a manner as would become him in addressing a father almost threescore years and ten, he said—"Father, I delight to lead in this exercise when at home, but I am affected with the thought that there is to be no more prayer here, until I shall return. How is it that you have never established family prayer? I know the diffidence of your nature, I know that it would be hard to overcome it, but would it not have been attended with satisfaction to yourself, and a blessing to the family, worth a far greater sacrifice? You can ask a favor of a neighbor—to do the same thing with God, is prayer; and he greatly mistakes who thinks that the best prayer is that clothed in the most fluent language." The old man was affected—said he knew that it was so—and then gave an account of his feelings and practice in this respect since the commencement of his Christian course. Tears glistened in the eyes of some unaccustomed to weep for sin, and the father's expressions gave encouragement to hope that the suggestion would not be in vain, and that an altar would still be erected, whence incense and a pure offering should daily rise to Heaven. On the following day before leaving, the son mentioned the scene to the minister of the place, who took an opportunity to add his influence to what had been said, and it proved effectual. The man whose voice, though for forty years a professed Christian and a father, had never been heard in prayer by his children, at the age of threescore years and ten, commences the discharge of that duty in his family, and so far as I know, never ceases until the infirmities of age render it impossible.—His children, ten in number, who had not before, have since professed the religion of Christ, though I cannot say how much the father's prayers had to do with this result.

"I have digressed to mention this scene, thinking that it might perhaps meet the eye of some father in the same situation, and encourage him to adopt the same course."

SLAVES EMANCIPATED BY THOUSANDS.—M. Ruminn, one of the principal proprietors in Russia, yielding to the impulse of a noble heart, has suddenly granted complete enfranchisement to eight thousand serfs of both sexes, who belonged to him in the governments of Nijni and Riazan, and what is more admirable in his conduct is, that completing his work of chariry, he has abandoned to this population, restored to liberty by him, for a trifling rent, the enjoyment of the domains over which they are diffused. The Democratic Pacifique, which announces this fact, says:—

"If we join this new fact to the efforts already made for the abolition of bondage in Europe, by the Prince of Woro zoff, the Count Protasoff and M. Kologrivoff, and especially to the powerful encouragement given by the Sovereign himself, may we not at last hope shortly to see the day of liberty dawn for so many thousands of men who still furnish the odious spectable of slavery in the bosom of a Christian and civilized nation."

GAMBLING IN FLOUR.—Few persons not dealers in the article, are probably aware of the extent to which gambling in flour is carried on by dealers in New York. For instance, we frequently see reports in the New York papers, similar to the following:—"Sales of 5,000 barrels flour to arrive in July, at $7 50; sales of 10,000 barrels to arrive in August, at $7 25." We do not pretend to say that none of these transactions are genuine, but we are confident that not one-twentieth part of this flour changes hands. When the time comes for delivery, the difference between the price agreed upon and the current rate, is paid either by the buyer or seller as the case may be. It is in fact nothing more nor less than a bet on the state of the market at a given time. In some cases bets of this kind are probably adopted to bolster up the market. For instance, we find in the N. Y. Shipping List, the following transaction in flour, which took place shortly after the arrival of the last steamer:—A sale of "1,000 barrels Western, (deliverable) within 48 hours of the arrival of the next steamer at $8 50." On the day this transaction took place, good Western flour could have been bought at $8, and the market was tending downward. Breadstuffs would seem to be the last article in which a man would wish to gamble.

TIME.

Time is measured duration; the material of our being, and the index of our progression to eternity.

There was, before time begun its course; there will be, when time shall be no longer.

Time has been a favorite theme with philosophers, moralists, and sages. Some have extolled it much, but none ever knew its intrinsic worth. The light of eternity must reveal it, the day of doom declare it, and all eternity re-echo it.

Time past, how transient; time present, how evanescent; time to come, with many, how uncertain! How different in the lessons it teaches and the impression it makes!

The child wastes it in play, and knowet not its worth; the anxious youth would hasten its course, and the aged put a drag upon its wheels.

Deferred hope, and endured pain, biddeth it fly; enjoyment would arrest its flight and the condemned malefactor is overwhelmed at its velocity.

So intrinsically excellent, it is dealt out in moments, and two cotemporary ones never existed at the same period.

Its travel is regular, silent, butsure. It never wearies, nor halts, nor turns aside; on, on, is its motto; and on, on it has sped for nearly six thousand years.

A thousand years were given to the antediluvians, one hundred and twenty to the patriarchs; but thirty are the measure of the modern generations of mankind.

Time is the space of Man's existence, the bounds of his probation, and his seed-time for eternity.

In possession, it be may improved and enjoyed; gone, it is irrecoverably lost.

Used, it blesses; neglected, it condemns; abused it leaves its curse behind.

Time should be redeemed from vain conversation — frivolous pursuits — -foolishness of life.

Time should be anticipated by prudent forethought, improved by holy diligence, and laid up for serious reflection.

The records of time will furnish the subject for judgment, and influence the destinies of eternity.

Reader, what thinkest thou of time? how hast thou spent time past, how art thou using time present, and how purposing for time to come?

Know its intrinsic value, be taught its importance, and so number thy days as to apply thy heart unto wisdom.—Christian Philosophy.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—At two o'clock yesterday, a two story frame house of Mr. Young, in 35th street, between 7th and 8th avenues, which had been raised some five feet to build under, having five several families therein, fell by the giving away of the blocks, backward into the yard, killing John Roach, and severely injuring his wife and child. Another man, two women and two children, also, were severely injured by the falling building.—N. Y. Sun.

PROSPECTUS OF THE

OHIO HARMONIST.

THE HARMONIST will contain a choice selection of about 150 pages of Psalm and Hymn tunes, compiled with much care from the best authors in the United States, to which is added a supplement of Temperance songs, designed for the use of congregations, singing schools, temperance meetings, and musical associations.

If the author meet with adequate encouragement in the sale of this first Volume, it will be succeeded by a second, and so on.

Each Volume will be sold at the moderate charge of One Dollar, to be paid for on delivery.

The Volumes will be neatly bound,—octavo size,—and printed on good paper, in a clear type. Each Volume will contain upwards of three hundred pages. Subscriptions will be received for the first Volume alone; or for the first and second; or the whole series may be subscribed for at once.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SONG,

FOR THE DEVOTEES OF TOBACCO.

Tune—"From Greenland's Icy Mountains."

From where the broad Pacific
Laves Oregon's fair shores,
To where with sound terrific,
Niag'ra's torrent roars;
From far-famed Yankee Boston,
From Susquehanna's stream,
To where the spires of Austin
In southern sunlight gleam.

In streets of crowded city,
In village, field, or wood,
The gay, sad, dull, and witty,
The wicked and the good,
Of every rank and station,
Of every name and creed,
Throughout this wide-spread nation,
Worship the filthy weed.

They chew, they smoke, they snuff it,
As 'twere their daily meat;
They slaver, spit, and puff it,
In parlor, church, and street:
In vain the house-wife, cleanly,
May labor, wash, and spruce,
Where the vile chewer meanly
Spirts his tobacco juice.

And then, in time of prayers,
At church,—why, true enough,
We all should kneel,—but there is
A flood of the same stuff.
Shall they who never chew it,
Nor thus defile the floor,
Shall they kneel down into it,
And daub themselves all o'er?

In vain the gentle zephyr
Wafts odors pure and sweet,
While stinking smoke, forever,
Our nasal organs greet:
Besides, their breath,—Oh, horrid!—
What odor, dense or rare,
From frigid zone to torrid,
Can with the stench compare.

Tobacco, oh! tobacco,
How many slaves hast thou?
From Grande's stream to Saco,
'Neath thy vile yoke they bow:
Thou pull'st from out their purses
Full many a precious "bit;"
Thou leav'st them nought but curses,
Vile smoke, and "nasty spit."

SECRET SOCIETIES.

BR. BASSETT:—I perceive you have opened your columns for a few temperate articles upon the uses and abuses of secret societies. In justice to myself I beg a hearing upon that subject. Heretofore my advocacy hath been in favor of several good ingredients found in these societies, and their doubtful feature of secrecy hath never seemed so very objectionable to me as to friend S. S. There is a marked difference however between combating a false principle, and merely plucking out some of its fruits after they are fully developed.

At present I feel like saying, should the investigation of the principle (that fiery ordeal it is) be doomed to pass through) not throw more clouds and gloom around it than I at present anticipate, and some one who is competent, be so kind as to remove the few following objections, I may yet be so happy as to get into the secret of some of these secret societies, for I assure you nothing scares me sooner than to tell me I stand as a stumbling block in the way of any moral reform.

Objection 1st. Paintings, Pictures, Jewelry, Carpets, Trinkets, Trash, either in promiscuous parade, or in a pulpit, so confounds the clergyman and the clown, that I can't tell which is which. Yea, I have seen these things dangle a whole hour around a fellow's shoulders in the shaded desk, and then I could not tell.

Objection 2nd. The most efficient advocates of good order, at least the most restraining influences to disorder, in all but one of these secret societies are thrown over board,——the Ladies.

Objection 3rd. Some of these societies claim such close affinity with religious societies, that the unthinking portion of our family, sans ceremonie, substitute the one for the other, but not strictly either, for when a chapter is read and a prayer pronounced (although that prayer as sweetly heard in the ear of Jehovah, may be circumscribed by the selfish limits of their own secret societies' success,) these good friends believe they have made a donation of part of their time to religion, their own time; something more than the prayer meeting folks can do, their evenings being previously devoted to devotional exercises, they have no time of their own to give away.

Objection 4th. Attention! Novelty and excitement absorbs the attention of man more than any thing else. The excitement consequent upon every initiatory exercise, and the novelty arising from the ever shifting, ever changing duties (so called) to be performed, in compliance with multitudinous self constituted rules, in a majority of cases, uses up all the surplus attention man has got to spare, after the affairs of the world and the wants of the family, (and lucky it is when these escape) are attended to. The chief business of life is shuffled to one side, waiting some more convenient season, which too often never arrives.

Objection 5. Time, that precious pearl hath grown so scarce that few amongst us have got any to trifle with; want of time hath become a most convenient excuse. Like the philosopher's stone it will answer for every thing, at least it seems to go current in the cause of religion. Amongst professors, the forenoon hour of worship can only be said to be entirely free from this spurious issue; but Sunday afternoons, Sunday evenings, week night prayer meetings, why it is as current as the best Bank in Ohio. Just say you had not time to attend your religious meetings, and no man will have the audacity to blame your absence, but whether per-force or per-flattery, secret societies make their votaries toe the mark. Hence my objection, for the laboring man has really not time to run to all.

Objection 6. Money, aye there's the rub. Children without Bibles or bread, wife without fuel or clothing, house without shingles or glass; aye and ministers without presents or pay, (especially this last,) still secret societies like the vitiated appetite will contrive to be fed. We know your excuse, saving banks are one of those good ingredients mentioned above, but these can only be made available in a densely settled, and life abiding community, where they can become so strong as to wield the power of attraction in proving a pillow for declining years. A sparse population of from two to ten years residence in one place, need only expect the anxious labor, toil, and expense of nursing a sickly plant divided and subdivided like the semibreve into a double demisemiquavers, and then reap mortification of seeing it languish, sicken and die.

Conversing with a Rev'd. orator on the opposite side the other day, another objection came up, which we will give as the seventh and last today, viz: that secret societies were robbers of our churches, robbing them not only of the life giving (if you please) but of the very living material itself. Closing here with my antagonist he obliged me to give names and dates &c., where professors of religion had apparently lost the little religion they had in consequence of their over anxiety about one or more of these secret societies. Without any difficulty, I gave him that satisfaction that disarmed his argument, but a bystander popped the question, pray sir, "were these men worth anything to your church when you had them at work?" A momentary thought, which reminded me that every branch of the christian church was clogged with a cumbrous load of dead weight upon its back, that only had a name to live whilst in reality it was dead, made me at the time wave a direct reply. Reflection however convinces me that he who knew the end from the beginning, could never make a wrong selection of means, and since his command is to preach his Gospel for the obtainment of the end he designed with his creature man, and has no where told us to organize secret societies. Ought we not to feel much better satisfied performing those duties he hath enjoined upon us, than hewing out broken cisterns to ourselves. Duty alone is ours, consequences remain in the hands of God. To obey is better than sacrifice;—rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft. And may we not add, secret craft, not only sounds but seems exceedingly like Idolatry? Yours,

DEAR BROTHER BASSETT: I wish to offer a few thoughts, on the communications of Brother J. Paris, N. C., which appeared in your paper last summer. I call Br. P. brother, because he informed me at the General Conference, that he was not a slave holder. He would have heard a word or two from me before this, but for two reasons. First, another Brother promised to review the articles of Brother Paris, if anything worth reviewing appeared in them; consequently, I did not wish to interfere. Secondly, I mislaid the papers containing the articles of Brother Paris, and have not as yet been able to find them, and the quotations from them we make from memory, as the result of reading them, at the time they appeared in print. I dislike the practice of making charges or quotations from others without using their own language, but as I have not the papers of Brother Paris before me, I shall have to give the ideas as near as possible, without any reference to his language. The sentiments we wished to notice amounted to charges or allegations against the Abolitionists. The first is "the Abolition Brethren of the last General Conference acted the part of cowards."—And this was sustained by reference to the conduct of a man" (perhaps a slave holder,) "who received an effront in company, and to show that he was a man of courage, he went home, and flogged his wife, and mother-in-law most unmercifully." The argument amounts to this, or to nothing at all.—The Abolitionists have been assailed by some of their Abolition neighbors, and they being too cowardly to stand up in defence of the Slave System against their own convictions of right, and to show that they are men of some courage they go up to the General Conference, and most unmercifully flog some one, or some individuals, bearing a similar relation to them, that the wife, and mother-in-law bore to the cowardly man. If this has any application at all to the Abolitionists, the slave holders, and conservatives of the last General Conference must be the "wife, and mother-in-law" of the Abolitionists. (And for one I should like to know, which is "wife" to the Abolitionists—the slave holders or the conservatives?) In this grave charge there are two concessions worthy of notice, if he means to make the slave holders and conservatives in his argument, answer the place of the wife, and mother-in-law. The first is that the slave holder, and Pro-slavery members of the General Conference were the "weaker vessels" in some way inferior to the Abolitionists, or it would be no more the sign of a coward in flogging them than any one else. As far as truth and right are concerned, I am inclined to think that the acknowledgment is perfectly correct.

The second concession, is that these weaker vessels, did at the General Conference, get a most unmerciful flogging by the Abolitionists. Well, well, Brother Paris, this is a bold, open, and frank concession—just think of it once more, if you please.

Another item I wish to notice in said communication, is the unguarded, and unfounded, attack upon Messrs. Birney, and Tappan. How a minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ can find it in his heart, to utter such sayings against such men as Birney, and Tappan when it is not in his power, to sustain one single allegation he has made against them, I am at a loss to determine. For the information of Brother Paris, I would just say, that I have as good or better knowledge of those gentlemen, than I have of the Rev. J. Paris, N. C., and I hesitate not to say that he would be greatly the loser, if a comparison should be made between their moral worth, and his own.—

In conclusion, Dear Brother, let me say, if your hands are now pure from the pollution of slavery, see well to it, that you remain pure from the guilt of sustaining oppression against the poor, despised, afflicted, and down-trodden colored people, of the South. Remember they are the purchase of Jesus' blood. Yours, &c.,

Things that please me.

MR. EDITOR:—I see that some of your writers in the Western Recorder, meet with things that grieve them, and things which they dont like. I certainly sympathise with those who are thus grieved, but finding myself in quite a good humor, since enjoying a good meeting, I desire to state to your readers a few things that please me.

1. It pleases me to see brethren in the Lord, both ministers and members, dwelling in the bonds of peace, and the unity of the Spirit, and laboring together for the advancement of the Messiah's kingdom, co-workers in the vineyard of the Lord, laying aside all selfishness and bigotry, and seeking for the renewing energies of the grace of God, which alone can fill the soul with heavenly bliss, and raise it above the trials of life.

2. I love to see our brethren in the ministry, show towards each other that spirit of friendship and brotherly love, which should ever characterize the messengers of peace. And if they have not a good word to speak for each other, just let them keep silent, for I fear that brethren too frequently injure each other's usefulness, by expressing their views too freely; for instance, brothers J. and B. called at our Hotel last week, and after a few compliments had been passed, J. enquired of B. how Brs. C. and D. were getting along:—to which B. replied, that as for C. he was a pretty fine man, but expressed his fears that he had got the big head, and that this would be the ruin of him. And as for D. he continued, he was a little too fond of showing his authority. This might be seen, he remarked, by his being so officious in the last Annual Conference. Then, thought I, what a serious influence must Br. C. or D. have to encounter, in case they should be called to labor with us another year.

3. It pleases me to see the servant of Jesus when he goes to visit those under his charge, converse with them freely upon the subject of religion, or something else worth talking about, instead of stirring up their minds to strife upon the moral questions of the day. 'O how good and pleasant it is to see brethren dwell together in unity.'

4. When I see the servants of God stand in the sacred desk, and urge sinners in Christ's stead to become reconciled to God, and hear them picture out the worth of an immortal soul for which Christ died, and the horrors of hell which await the sinner in an eternal world, and the joys held in reservation for the people of God, then it pleases me and fills my soul with heavenly emotions, to see them leave the church, and retire to their place of lodging, without jesting or joking.

5. It pleases me to see brethren when they find objections to the matter or manner of each other's preaching, choose a suitable time and opportunity to converse with them upon the subject, instead of belching forth their objections before the community, and that too at a time when every man should be upon his guard; for when our brethren come together to labor for the good of souls, it is expected that there be no schism in the body.

6. It pleases me to see the brethren remember the obligations they are under to those they have called to labor among them, and then, when they contribute their mite to the support of their preacher, I love to see him receive it as from his friends, and that too without asking questions &c. In short I love to see the minister and his people true to keep up that holy communion and fellowship with each other, that will advance the cause of piety, and promote the salvation of immortal souls. The Passion for Tobacco.

MR. EDITOR: I am much gratified that the Western Recorder is emphatically, a free discussion paper,—that it is made a vehicle of truth in general, and not confined to the advocacy of any "one idea," while other matters of importance are neglected. And, that, among the different enterprizes for the promotion of truth and virtue, which receive its aid and support, a due share of attention is bestowed upon the good cause of anti tobacco reform. This is what I like. Let the subject be agitated; it has been too much neglected. Let the evils resulting from a common use of tobacco, in a pecuniary, physiological, and cleanly (?) point of view, be fully demonstrated, so that the slaves of the habit may see their true situation, and, I doubt not, good will be effected.

'Tis true, we meet with opposition; some are ever ready to defend the virtues of this "good thing," while there are other rather scrupulous individuals, (tobacco bruisers by the by,) who think we had "better let tobacco alone and pay more attention to weightier matters."

But, because there are other and greater evils in the world, is that any reason why all our efforts should be directed against them, and let the smaller evils go untouched? I think consistency demands that we should exert an influence against all evil.

As it may be interesting and encouraging to the friends of the cause, and operate as an incentive to those who are still indulging in the tobacconistic gratifications to quit, I take the liberty of reporting the ease of a neighbor of mine, who had been a loyal subject of his majesty—tobacco, some forty years; but from reading Dr. Alcott's work on the subject, became convinced of the evil of the practice, and at once abandoned it, with the full determination never to resume it. He used it in the form of smoking. It is some 9 or 12 months since his release from the habit, and he now says that he scarcely ever thinks of tobacco, and don't allow "a pipe" a lodgement in his dwelling. He is now about eighty years of age, so that the plea so often set up by the users of tobacco, that they cannot quit, should not receive much credit. They can quit, if they will only quit aright. Let them be determined that they will quit—that they will be freemen, and the work is done. But as long as they say, "I'll try, and see how it goes; and if I think I can stand it, why, I'll stay quit," and proceed in this undecided and experimenting manner, it is not likely that they will accomplish anything.

The Massachusetts Cataract talks about the filthy practice with perfect railroad energy.—Hear him.

A QUID FOR ALL WHO TAKE IT.

What is there ruder, nastier, or more impudent than for a person to enter your office, parlor, or sitting room, and squirt splash-a-te-splash a quantity of tobacco spittle upon your table, bookcase, sofa, clock, looking-glasses, chairs, or stoves?—All such articles were made, and purchased, not to be spit upon, nor to be spit at, but for other and decent purposes, and he that bedaubs either of them with his abominable tobacco juice, commits a disgusting nuisance, and ought to be plunged ten fathoms deep into the detergent waters of some anti-tobacco cataract.

Why don't such edacious coadjutors of the tobacco worm spit on and at each other, when they happen to meet, instead of upon and at the neat and clean articles of furniture that happen to be within spittle shot of their foul-mouthed batteries? If they would only monopolize among themselves all the "proceeds" of the chewing process, the decent portion of the community would be much relieved. And why should they not do so? Just think of it, all ye biped tobacco worms,—just roll under your tongues the sweet morsel of considering,—what is nastier than a spittoon, and what is more suitable for a spittoon, than a person who carries a hole in his face just like the funnel hole of a spittoon, all redolent of the very fag-ends of filth, reeking in a stomach-heaving pool of tobacco gravy? He must have more sugar in his ink than we have, who, while looking at a neat stove all besmeared with tobacco plasters, as we now do upon one in our office, can write sweet words of complacency, or forbearance, upon such disgusting exhibitions of heedlessness, filthiness and ill manners.

SALE OF THE LATE RESIDENCE OF JOSEPH BONAPARTE.—The beautiful grounds and mansion belonging to the estate of the late Joseph Napoleon Bonaparte, ex-king of Spain, at Bordentown, N. Jersey, were on Saturday last sold at auction for the sum of $30,500. Mr. Thomas Richards, of Philadelphia, was the purchaser. It is said that the buildings alone cost over $60,000. A letter in the Newark Advertiser says: "The paintings, sculpture, furniture, &c., sold at much lower rates than I had anticipated; some articles being sold for half their value. The paintings brought from $10 to $1.050. Two lions and a fawn, by Reubens, sold for the largest sum.—"Nativity of our Savior," by Raphael Moengs, brought $1,000; the portrait of a dog, by Hackerts, brought $210. The picture of Napoleon crossing the Alps, by David, the proprietors refused to put up unless the sum of $6,000 was bid for it. As no person present was willing to bid that sum it was passed, and will be sent to Europe."

"Mother what is hush?" "A hush child? I don't know—what makes you ask that question?" "Cause the other day I asked Jane what made her back stick out so, and she said 'hush!'"

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

AHMEDNUGGUR.

REPORT OF THE AHMEDNUGGUR STATION.

In the seminary we have had more reason for encouragement the past year than usual. Considerable religious interest was manifested by several boys, from the commencement of the year; and a small company were in the habit of meeting together for prayer, and of daily visiting the house of Ramkrishna, their teacher, for the purpose of religious conversation and social worship. This continued for several months. Most of them, however, were afraid to exhibit their feelings openly.

At length one of their number, named Rama, the most advanced boy in the seminary, and one who had always maintained a high character, declared his determination to confess Christ before men, and asked for baptism. As he appeared to give good evidence of a change of heart, we cheerfully complied with his request; and he was accordingly baptized on the 13th of December.—He was a boy of good caste, and belongs to a family of pateels (head-men) in a village near this place. His baptism produced considerable excitement. His brothers, his widowed mother and his sisters, came and urged him to return to Hindooism. His poor mother pleaded with him, beseeching him not to destroy himself and his family. He begged her to refrain from weeping, while, at the same time, his own face was bathed in tears. He told her that he did not wish to be lost; that he sought the salvation of his soul; and urged her to come along with him and be a Christian. He was taken before the magistrate by his friends, and, when asked whether he had become a Christian of his own free will, he replied that he had; that he believed Christianity to be true; and had, therefore, embraced it. He was then allowed to go where he pleased, and his friends ceased to give him any farther trouble.

The caste of cultivators, to which this boy belonged, forms the great laboring community of this country; and it is the class in which we have especially desired to see some wide and effectual door opened for missionary labors. Many individuals of that caste have, at different times, given good heed to the word; but the fear of the consequences of losing caste has hitherto deterred them, in almost every instance, from coming forward and taking up their portion with the people of God. The habit of yielding to brahminical influence is so strong with them, that they know not how to break away from it. The brahmins rule them with a rod of iron, as they know that from this caste especially they derive their means of subsistence. They would have little hope were the cultivators generally to abandon Hindooism, and, of course, they watch them with peculiar vigilance, and endeavor to guard against the first entrance of Christianity among them.—The conversion of a young man from a respectable family of this caste is, therefore, a special encouragement to us.

At the commencement of the year, there were sixty-seven members in the church connected with the Ahmednuggur station. During the year, twenty-four persons (twenty men and four women) were received into the church at Ahmednuggur and Wudaley. Only one member has died, and three persons have been excommunicated. Two persons were dismissed to other churches in consequence of their removal to the Madras presidency, in connection with a Madras regiment formerly stationed at this place. At the close of the year, therefore, we had eighty-five members of the church at Ahmednuggur and its vicinity, not including the members of the church at Seroor.

Of the three persons who were excommunicated, one had been previously suspended from the privileges of the church. Two members who were suspended in 1844 and 1845, were this year restored. One other member has been suspended during the year, leaving only two members now suspended from the church.

Of the twenty-four persons admitted to the church in 1846, as mentioned above, eighteen reside in six different villages, some of which are forty miles from Ahmednuggur, and they support themselves by their own labor. This is a very gratifying fact. The number of baptised children under the watch of the Ahmednuggur station is is seventy-one. "Not one of the children of the church," the report says, "has been removed by death during the year; a mark of God's continued favor towards his people which is fitted to arrest the attention of the heathen around.

One of the new converts from the villages, originally of the mahar caste, is quite an intelligent man. He has been accustomed to read the Hindoo shastres to his countrymen; but for two years past he has laid aside his Hindoo books and read the Christian Scriptures to all who have been disposed to listen. We think he may make a very useful Scripture reader and native assistant, and are desirous of training him up for that work.

Of the twenty-four converts received the past year, two were originally of the the koonbee or cultivator caste; the remainder were originally mahars. One of the former is a poor diseased man in the poor-house, who ascribes his first religious impression to the instructions of a Christian in the poor-house, who died the previous year, as mentioned in our last report. The other koonbee convert is the youth Rama, mentioned above in the account of the seminary.

WARM WEATHER AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.—In Philadelphia and New York on Tuesday, there was a change in the weather simultaneously with that which we had here. From what is said on the subject, we should judge that the change was as grateful as it was great. The heat on Monday, in N, York, is spoken of as so intense as to occasion feelings of langor almost insupportable. The first case of coup de soliel occurred there that afternoon. A Mr. Eagle was the subject, but by prompt removal to the hospital his life has probably been saved. It is also said several horses dropped dead in the street. We noticed also, that a young lad at Jersey City was sun-struck on Saturday, from too long and unnecessary exposure to the sun. Another result of warm weather, appears to be the drowning of persons whilst bathing. We have already noticed several cases of this kind and now we have two more. Mr. C. N. Mills, of a firm of brokers, in Wall street, N. York, a gentleman in the opening of life and greatly esteemed, and a son of Dr. Whiley, of Brooklyn, a fine lad, nine years of age, were both drowned on Monday, whilst bathing. If, however, a proper caution was exercised by all, it is likely there would not be so many fatal occurrences to charge to hot weather. Baltimore Sun.

Western Sketches.

From the New York Express.

Supremacy of the West.

We recently detailed, at some length, the comparative political power of the different sections of the Union, and based upon the returns of the late Presidential election. We referred to the present decline and approaching fall of the southern power in our National Government, and the certainty that the Western influence will predominate within a few years. We now propose to pursue the subject a little further.

The map of North America discloses to view as goodly a land—in whole or in part—as a free man could desire. The central valley above all—bounded on the east by the Alleghany range and on the West by the Rocky Mountains—is unrivalled by any other part of the habitable globe. It surpasses other valleys as far as the magnificent river by which it is watered surpasses other rivers. This is the region which is to hold "the balance of power in the American Union;" and that not only for a day, but as far as human foresight can reach for all time.

The Mississippi Valley—although it embraces not a few Gascons within its borders, now, and is not likely to be "the land of lost gods or god-like men," hereafter—is rapidly filling up with a vast population, whose capacity for good or evil will be almost unlimited. The progress of the West is unexampled. Figures alone can give an adequate idea of its gigantic tribes. The population of the United States, as determined by the census of 1840, was about 17,100,000; of whom the East claims 9,600,000, and the West 7,500,000. This inferiority of the West in 1840 has pretty certainly been overcome ere this.

We may as well give in this place a few statistics, showing the increase of population in the West, between the population of the United States on the one side, and that of our own State on the other, during the present century:

	United States.	Western increase.	New York.
In 1800	5,305,925	270,000	586,758
" 1810	7,230,414	600,000	959,949
" 1820	9,638,131	1,170,000	1,372,812
" 1830	12,866,020	1,430,000	1,918,608
" 1840	17,068,666	2,900,000	2,528,921

This table—we repeat—gives the population of the United States and of the State of New York, at each decennial census of the present century, interposing the increase of the population of the West. The intelligent reader may find something to gratify his curiosity in this short table. Our present purpose, however, is chiefly with the central column. It will be seen by it that the advance of the West is absolutely amazing; the increase of the last decennium being over one hundred per centum.

The Atlantic States, during the fifty years preceding 1840, increased, on the average, during each decennium, somewhat less than 1,300,000. We notice that Mr. Kirkland, in his very interesting paper on the next census, estimates the population of the Atlantic States, in 1850, to amount to 10,930,000, (assuming 1,430,000 as the increase for the current decennium) and, allowing the increase of the whole Union to be the same as hitherto, at the rate of one third for every ten years—the entire population of the United States to amount to 22,700,000. The estimate is, perhaps, too moderate; still, it leaves for the population of the West 11,830,000; giving that section a clear majority of 900,000 over the Eastern or Atlantic States. It is perfectly clear, then, to the most casual observer, that after 1850 the centre of the American population will be west of the Alleghany mountains; and there will be the centre of political power, also. As Mr. Kirkland very well remarks, "while the population of the eastern section increases in arithmetical, that of the western increases in geometrical progression. The Atlantic portion has grown with great uniformity, since the first census; during no decennium less than 1,000,000, nor more than 1,600,000. The West has moved forward during the same period at the almost incredible rate of 65 to 70 per cent, for several more successive periods—perhaps nearly through the century.

The changes that will most assuredly take place in the management of the Government, while the West sways the sceptre, are by no means to be deemed trivial and lightly regarded. We who dwell in cities and have our habitations on those shores where breaks the Atlantic, are but too apt to watch the city movements of effete Europe more than the energetic progress of our Western confederates. Let us awake in time, and set our house in order for the coming change. We may be assured that it will be real and not nominal. Setting aside our foreign relations—Commerce and Manufactures have long engrossed the principal care of our government. Agriculture will hereafter command most attention. The commerce of the great lakes and rivers of the West, and of the Gulf of Mexico, will no longer be neglected at Washington. Government patronage will no longer be lavished on ardent young Virginians, when Western men bear rule at the metropolis. There may be danger of the prevalence of Radicalism, but we have more faith in Western good sense than to imagine that their freedom will degenerate into license. The young giant will be no idiot or mad man. We think that it is clearly for the interest of the Anglo Frank-American of the East, to take care that his relations with him be put on the most liberal and cordial footing within the next five or six years. N. Y. Express.

FEMALE SYMPATHY.—Mrs. J. T. Montgomery, principal of the La Grange Female Institute in Georgia, has addressed the Mayor of Savannah, a letter enclosing fifty dollars, contributed by the young ladies of that seminary for the relief of the Irish.

MARRIED A WIFE AND RUN AWAY!—On Monday of last week, a scoundrel named Thomas Conner, induced an industrious Irish girl of Rochester, New York, to marry him, and on the Wednesday following, only two days after, he decamped, taking with him all his wife's things, even to her wearing apparel, together with about $180 in money, the hard earnings of the girl, which had been drawn from the Saving's Bank a day or two previous.

BREACH REPAIRED.—The break which recently occurred in the Schuylkill Canal, near Douglassville, Pa., has been repaired. It required the labor of 300 men for two weeks to accomplish the task.

A lady belonging to Monson, while in a store at Palmer Depot on Wednesday afternoon, drank some oil of tanzy which threw her into convulsions, and caused her death in three quarters of an hour.

MUSKINGUM DISTRICT.

New Lisbon, July 8, 1847.

Br. Bassett: In relation to our circuit, we may say that we have lost none, but gained some nine or ten members, mostly heads of families: and an enquiry appears to be generally waking up for our principles. We have more calls than we can attend to from the surrounding country.—The church at Wellsville has a very flourishing Sabbath school under its direction; and by which they are doing a great good to the rising generation. We have peace throughout our entire membership, and have had no occasion for a church trial thus far, this year. May the Lord revive his work on this circuit, is the prayer of many souls, already here, and especially of its unworthy superintendent. Yours,

T. B. CUSHMAN.

Union Circuit, July 3, 1847.

Br. Bassett: While writing to you on business, I would state that our third quarterly meeting was held in Middleburg, including the 29th and 31st of May. Brother young, our president was in attendance, and labored with zeal and acceptibility. We trust good was done, in the revival of the church, and the conversion of sinners. Three united with us as probationers. We also held a protracted meeting at the same place, commencing the 19th and closing the 27th of June. We were favored with the acceptible labors of brothers P. Inskeep and A. Channell of the Muskingum District. As the result of this meeting, there were several conversions, seventeen united with us as probationers, and a general impression was made for good, on the minds of the public.—On the evening we closed, sixteen came to the altar of prayer, as seekers. May the Lord graciously speak their mourning into joy. Pray for us. Yours, DAVID MOORE,

Sup't.

Dr. Chalmers.

The obituary of 1847 promises to be emblazoned with many illustrious names. Daniel O'Connell has scarcely passed away from amongst us, when we are startled by the intelligence of the sudden death of Thomas Chalmers. Another eminent benefactor of the million has perished. The lamentations of Ireland over her great Patriot are responded by the lamentations of Scotland over her great Moralist. With both do we sympathise from the inmost recesses of our heart. Through the haze of death we recognize the oratorical and liberative glory of O'Connell; through the haze of death, too, we may perceive the equable light of the celebrity of Chalmers.—Their hearts may be motionless, but their fame cannot be extinguished.

Thomas Chalmers is generally believed to have been born somewhere about the year 1780, in a little village called Anstruther, situated on the right margin as you sail southwards up the estuary of the Forth. The birth-place of this eminent man—an insignificant fishing place—is, consequently regarded as among those spots which have been sanctified by the presence of the childhood of genius. Every endeavor seems to have been made for the development of those seeds of wisdom which we maintain, with all deference to the immortal Locke, were implanted by Providence in his fruitful and capacious intellect. From the first there was manifest an innate tendency towards the acquisition of knowledge and the exercise of virtue on the part of Thomas Chalmers; that tendency was assiduously encouraged by his scholastic and spiritual instructors, at the University of St. Andrews.

Such were the distinguished indications of his ability while a student in that northern academy of learning, that he was frequently selected as a mathematical assistant at the classes of Professor Vilant. On his representation, in 1803, to the incumbency of Kilmany, Thomas Chalmers was a living contradiction to that assertion of Professor Playfair, that the Scottish clergy was unadorned by the combination of rhetorical fluency and profound erudition, graceful declamation, and bookish enlightenment. From the first moment of his appearance in the pulpit of Kilmany Ch., the renown of C. resounded through the whole of the Island. The music of his tongue, rising from the golden chambers of his imagination, and harmonized by the breathings of his morality, entranced his hearers, took their judgements by storm, ravished their senses as it were with the utterances of a prophet.

Dr. Chalmers, however, was immeasurably greater as a moralist than he was as an orator.—It was by the combination of those two marvellous qualifications that he acquired such supreme influence over his cotemporaries, and elicited so much of the admiration of mankind. As an orator and a moralist, Dr. Chalmers must hold forever a conspicuous place among the promoters of civilization and the practical benefactors of the human family. His greatness in this respect is undoubted and permanent. Nor were the efforts of this extraordinary man restricted within the limits of oral tuition, as an ethical and metaphysical writer he has assumed a bright and enviable position. His literary compositions are in effect essentially of a declamatory character; they indicate unmistakably the spontaneous torrent of eloquence that rushed perpetually through his mind—the eloquence of the very conception of his thoughts, and the eloquence with which those thoughts were habitually expressed.

Whether he dedicated his ideas by the movements of his lip or pen, the language was always resonant with wisdom, it was occasionally embellishished with rhetorical decorations, and was invariably inculcative of generous and ennobling principles.

Upon the remarkable ecclesiastical movement which in 1843 attached so much of mingled obloquy and applause to the name of Dr. Chalmers we shall say nothing. It is scarcely possible to conceive, however, that this virtuous and learned man was actuated in that movement by any but the purest motives and the loftiest aspirations—Thomas Chalmers might from the fallibility of human nature, unwittingly fall into a mistake—he could never designedly be guilty of any dereliction of duty.

Gifted beyond most men in the capacity and brilliancy of his intelligence, Thomas Chalmers was in like manner gifted with a sublime elevation of purpose. His memory is his panegyric.

Rail Road to the Pacific.—The Legislature to Connecticut have passed a series of resolutions approving of the general features of Mr. Whitney's plan for a railroad to the Pacific, and request their Representatives and their Senators in Congress to give the plan their prompt attention and support.

Ingenious Counterfeit.—We were yesterday shown an altered note, which several of our judges of money had failed to detect. It looks like a five on the State Bank of Ohio—but is, in fact, half of a one, and half of a five, pasted together. The easiest way of detecting this currency is by glancing at the red backs.—In all unaltered notes of the State Bank, both ends are alike. The fives have the word 'five' at each end in large letters.—Springfield Rep.

Too Dear.

A worthy brother of the Muskingum Conference, who does good service as agent for our paper, writes us that he has been making an effort to obtain for us new subscribers, but finds some who complain that the paper is too dear! and informs us that several offer to pay $1,50 in advance, if that sum will suffice. We are thankful for the exertions of our brother, and will take this opportunity of stating a few things relative to this "too dear" complaint. We have met with such an expression, and an offer of $1,50 in two or three instances from other sections. And it has sometimes been intimated to us that the circulation of eastern penny papers, of a secular character, Dollar weeklies &c., has injured our patronage. We have no doubt that this is precisely the case. And there are many persons who seem not to understand why a religious newspaper with much less patronage, cannot be afforded at as low a rate.

Let us attempt a short explanation. Many secular and political papers are in great measure sustained by advertising patronage, being nearly or quite half filled with advertisements, standing matter, every week, whilst we have generally but from one to two columns of standing matter. If we had but the same amount of reading matter to furnish, as some of those Journals, we could nearly make out with half the number of hands in our office; and then the pay we would receive for advertising (which with us at present is next to nothing) would be a large item in our support. Again—there are in the cities, especially at the east, numerous daily papers, sustained, largely if not chiefly by advertising patronage. Then in some instances, the reading matter, after being used in the dailies through the week, is made up into a weekly paper, so that there is scarcely any composition work, or type setting required for those weeklies, whilst with us it requires the constant labor of several hands for the entire week. It will be seen at once that a weekly, under those circumstances can be afforded, at even half the price of our paper, provided it has sufficient patronage.

Furthermore, a number of those cheap weeklies enjoy a very extensive subscription list. The New York Weekly Sun, for instance, a respectable Journal published at $1 boasts a list of fifty thousand subscribers. Had we half that patronage, we could afford to furnish our paper at $1 per year. Or, had we one fourth of that patronage, it could be afforded at $1,50. But what is the patronage of the Western Recorder? We feel called upon to give the facts for the information of our friends, and to disabuse the minds of some. Our entire list, at this moment, is 1238. From this number deduct fifty or more Exchange papers, and then 150 ministers, in seven Conferences, nearly all of whom expect to receive their paper free for their agency. Many of these do so little for us, that they ought, in all conscience, to pay for their own paper; and this, a few of them do, like just and thoughtful men. Our subscription list then, exclusive of agents and exchanges, is but a trifle over one thousand. Is it not seen at once, that we have immensely more labor weekly in the composition and making up our paper, for our one thousand subscribers, than the Sun has for its fifty thousand? After we have once got our paper made up and corrected, for our one thousand it would be comparatively small additional labor to extend our issue to five—ten—or more thousand copies. And we here assure our friends, that so soon as our subscription list shall be sufficiently enlarged, we will cheerfully reduce the price of our paper. But at the present, any experienced printer or publisher, knowing the circumstances will say, it would be suicidal to attempt it. Indeed we were warned by experienced men, before we ventured to take charge of this establishment, that no paper could live with such an amount of patronage, without advertising custom, unless there should be the strictest diligence to collect its dues.

Another matter is perhaps forgotten by some of our friends. It was only at the commencement of the present volume, that we enlarged our paper, and expended between $300 and $400 for new type. The Recorder was published at $2, for seven years, upon a much smaller sheet. And that we should be called upon so soon to reduce our terms, with so small an increase of patronage, is unreasonable. We can't take your $1,50, gentlemen, it would be an injustice to numerous others who pay the $2 so cheerfully, & so promptly, and who would pay even more rather than do without the paper. We have before us a letter from one in an adjoining state, who says he expects to take the Western Recorder as long as he lives.

The above statements and explanation, we are persuaded, will satisfy reasonable reflecting minds. One thing more. We receive in exchange, religious papers of almost every denomination. The usual price per year is $2, same as ours, though some charge more. We have no religious weekly of any denomination, at a less price than $2. Those who wish, then can procure some secular or political newspaper, from one third to one half filled with advertisements, or an eastern weekly half filled with fictitious tales, at a less price. But if they wish to have for the benefit of their families, a religious newspaper, discarding tales, admitting but few advertisements, it is necessary to pay a little more for it—for it is worth more. And yet this would not be the case, were religious papers as well sustained as are secular papers. But "the children of this world, are wiser, in their generation than the children of the kingdom."

Clubs of ten, all paying in advance, receive our paper at $1,50, as per terms. But we shall probably omit that item from our terms, when this volume closes. It does us more harm than good.

Baptised.—The Baptist Banner states that Hon. Henry Clay has recenly been baptised by immersion in one of the ponds on his own estate, near Lexington, Ky. He joined the Episcopal Church, but demanded immersion.

Not So.—Since the above was in type, we see that the same statement is going the rounds of the papers. The Episcopal Recorder, of May 10th, which is just received, gives an account of the baptism of Mr. Clay, by a Lexington correspondent, from which it appears that it took place in his own furnished room, and that the ordinance was administered by the Rev. E. F. Berkley, who applied with his hand the water from a magnificent cut glass vase, to the kneeling subject. The following extract will be found interesting:

The baptism was administered privately, for the reason, that the congregation of Christ Church are replacing their old church, with a new edifice, now in rapid progress of erection, and are not suitably situated for the most solemn and decent administration of this rite in public.

When the minister entered the room on this deeply solemn and interesting occasion, the small assembly, consisting of the immediate family, a few family connexions, and the clergyman's wife, rose up. In the middle of the room stood a large centre-table, on which was placed, filled with water, the magnificent cut glass vase, presented to Mr. Clay by some gentlemen of Pittsburgh. On one side of the room, hung the large picture of the family of Washington, himself an Episcopalian by birth, by education, and a devout communicant of the Church; and immediately opposite, on a side-table, stood the bust of the lamented Harrison, with a chaplet of withered flowers hung upon his head, who was to have been confirmed in the Church the Sabbath after he died—fit winesses of such a scene. Around the room were suspended a number of family pictures, and among them, the portrait of a beloved daughter, who died some years ago, in the triumphs of that faith which her noble father was now about to embrace; and the picture of the last son, who fell at the Battle of Buena Vista. Could these silent lookers-on at the scene about transpiring, have spoken from the marble and the canvass, they would heartily have approved the act, which dedicated the great man to God. There was a deep sensation pervading that small assembly, at the recital, under such circumstances, of the sublime ordinal of the Church, and every heart thrilled with a solemn joy, when the merciful and glorious covenant was sealed, "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

This act will be publicly ratified at the visitation of the Bishop, on the third Sunday in July, in the Apostolic rite of Confirmation.

What a noble and powerful recommendation of Christianity to the world! to see this great old man, the greatest man of his day, in all the vigor of intellect, and ardency of feeling, bending the knee before God, and with the simplicity of a little child, receiving upon his head, a handfull of water, in the name of the Holy Trinity!—thus attesting his faith in the Christian religion, and his determination to live and die by its sacred principles.

Fanaticism.—A party of Second Adventists in New York, have carried ultraism itself to extreme. Their leading man, a Mr. Snow, has set himself up for Elijah the prophet who was to come. They lately circulated hand-bills throughout the city, setting forth that "the only place where the truth is ministered in this world, and God's people fed with meat in due season, is at 67, Crosby street, New York, and here is the strong hold of the daughter of Zion, and here is where that prophet like unto Moses, declares the judgments of an angry God. The Lord's messenger preaches twice every Sunday, and on Tuesday and Thursday evenings of each week."

What next?

Foreign.—The steamer Caledonia arrived at Boston on the 4th instant, bringing dates from Liverpool to June 19th. The prospects of the growing crops, had effected a reduction in the price of breadstuffs, equal to one dollar per barrel on flour. Accounts of the crops on the European continent, also, were quite encouraging. Fever was still quite prevalent in Ireland, but it was hoped that the provision supplies, & pleasant weather would check its progress. Emigration is still the order of the day. All the world seems to be finding out, that this America of ours, is a great country. It is stated that during the last two months one hundred and twenty thousand persons left the shores of the three Kingdoms chiefly Irish; and "the extent of the exodus seems to be limited by the means of getting away!"

The Cicada.—We see it stated in the Baltimore Sun, that the seventeen year locusts have appeared in immense numbers in the Western part of North Carolina. In Ohio we had our turn with them, one year ago.

Nauvoo.—We see by the Religious Telescope, that the United Brethren in Christ have organized a class in Nauvoo, Illinois, and an appeal is made for help to build a church in that city.

Otterbein University.—This is the name given by the United Brethren, to their Institution of Learning, at Westerville, Delaware County. We are gratified to learn that the friends of this enterprize are likely to succeed, notwithstanding a strange and discreditable opposition which has been manifested by some of the "Brethren."

Life, Scenery and Soil in Texas.

The letters of Bishop Paine, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, which frequently appear in the Nashville Christian Advocate, are always interesting. The following extracts from one of his letters in a late number of that paper, embracing part of his tour in Texas, will be found entertaining to those who are interested in the descriptive, or who desire information respecting the new state of Texas.

The seat of the Texas Conf. was Cedar Creek, Washington co., a neighborhood exhibiting more indications of prosperity, industry and piety than any other, with perhaps a single exception, that I saw in the State. The soil is black and gently undulating. It is, like the greater portion of Texas, a prairie region, interspersed with belts of timber. Some of the land here, especially the higher parts of the prairie, is of that stiff "hog-wallow" kind seen in the prairies of Mississippi—and I found that here, as there, various opinions are entertained as to the cause of this unevenness of the surface. But the prevailing, and I think correct impression is, that these "beds" or "wallows" are owing to the contraction of the soil during the long and excessively hot and dry summers and autumns of this country—producing fissures in such of the land as contains a super-abundance of clay. The fissures are regular where the clay is uniformly distributed, and are sometimes sufficiently wide to admit the body of a man, and gradually becoming narrower, reach down fifteen or twenty feet below the surface. This description of land is very rich, and finely adapted to corn. but in the winter, or whenever wet, is very disagreeable to cultivate, because it adheres most tenaciously to the feet and working implements of the laborer. The other and larger portion of the prairie land in this section, while it is quite rich, contains such a proportion of fine black sand, that without materially diminishing its productiveness it is far more pleasant to cultivate and infinitely preferable as building places. Most planters select such land for cotton. The Cedar creek neighborhood has an abundance of the very best cedar. It skirts every little ravine, and is invaluable, both for building and fencing.

I crossed the Brasos one hundred miles above its mouth. Is was not so wide as I expected to find it—not exceeding two hundred feet. Its banks are high, say nearly eighty feet. The water was colored, as it always is, and it runs with a pretty strong current. I see no cause to doubt that it can be navigated, during the winter and spring, a long distance above this paint. It is a very long river, and occasionally rises to great height; yet seldom or never so high as to cover its entire bottom.—And in this respect it differs from the Trinity and Colorado. The day is coming when it will be invaluable to Middle Texas. The Brasos bottom averages about five miles in width. The soil is a dark red, and is alluvian. The prevailing timbers are lynn, hackberry, pecan, oak, sycamore—with some cedar, and vines innumerable. The greater part if not the whole of the bottom wherever I crossed it, may be cultivated. Occasionally a part of it will be overflowed, but much of it has certainly not been under water for many years. It is the richest land I ever saw, and I have seen the best lands of the Western and South-western States. It greatly resembles the best land on Arkansas and Red Rivers, and its superior fertility I autribute to the quantity of saline particles bro't down by the river from the vast salt plains in which it finds its source, and disseminated through the soil it has deposited on its banks in the overflows of past ages.

The celebrated Peach Creek, Old Cany and Colorado lands are of the same description of soil—the good land extending from the Brasos to the Colorado, and constituting the finest sugar lands in the world. Indeed, the entire Brasos bottom, from its falls to its mouth—over two hundred miles by land,—is destined to become one continuous sugar field. And when I say that I learned, from unquestionable authority, that brother J. P. C. actually made three hoghsheads of sugar, weighing each 1200 lbs., per acre last season, it will readily be conceived that there is likely to be no scarcity of sugar among us when once young Texas comes fully in the market. But that day is yet distant. As yet few have made any preparations for sugar growing. And ten years must elapse before they can fairly begin to raise it.

The price of good land here ranges from $1 to 3 per acre. The inhabitants claim to have pretty good health in this neighborhood. But admit they are now suffering, as they are all over the State, with what they call the "winter fever." And I fear that in this prairie region, where northers produce such sudden and great changes in temperature, pneumonia will prove as fatal in winter and spring as fever in summer and fall. Indeed the long continued heat of the summer and fall seems to enervate the system, so that the "winter fever" makes havoc of those not acclimated. The German immigrants have suffered immensely, and all new settlers must expect to undergo hardships and a "seasoning." It was fortunate that I arrived at bro. L. D. Bragg's on the 7th of March, for on that night a norther set in which continued nearly a week. The wind, constantly strong, frequently blew in gusts. The cold was severe, and although the rain was not, at any time, very heavy, yet the sky was gloomy and the atmosphere misty and threatening. In the winter these northers are dreadful in the wide prairies. Instances occur of men and beasts perishing with cold before they can reach the woods. Teamsters sometimes leave their wagons and fly to the nearest timber. The cause of such excessive cold in so Southern a latitude is, doubtless, that the northern blasts, unobstructed by timber, rush down from mountains covered with snow, and over a vast tract of frozen land—and passing with such rapidity over the champaign country, lose but litule of the intense cold of a Northern latitude.

The preachers of this Conference undergo great privations. The circuits are large—the population sparse, the accommodations generally are like those of all new countries—the roads bad and the streams the worst I ever saw.—Bridges have not yet come into vogue—and nothing is more common than to swim three or four ugly streams each round on the circuit.—Every preacher here understands constructing and using 'rafts.' And when to all this we add that few constitutions, not inured to the climate, can sustain, without injury, the sudden changes of temperature—to say nothing of the other local causes of disease which abound in all rich Southern countries; and that they are very poorly paid, it will be readily perceived that Texas is no paradise to a traveling preacher. And yet they generally seemed cheerful and resolved to stick to it. A few, however, felt obliged to locate.

French Steamer.—The Union, the first of the French Line of Steamers, lately arrived at New York. With this Line is to be connected an American Mail Line, and when this is completed, we shall have direct communication, almost weekly with Great Britain, France and Germany. So says the New York Sun. A new era indeed in ocean navigation.

Telegraph.—We learn by the Pittsburgh Commercial Journal that on the 9th inst. the line from that city to Wheeling, was put into successful operation. The company of wire and post men have nearly reached Zanesville, and are hourly expected.

Correspondents.—Will "Julius" modify his article? The latter part of it we conceive is too severe. Our friend "Prudentia" should have entrusted with us his proper name, to ensure the publication of his article.

Rev. Orange Scott.—We regret to see it stated by the editor of the True Wesleyan, in his last paper, that brother Scott's health remains poor, that he is gradually wasting away, and that he will probably before long, go the way whence none return.

A Doctor's opinion of Doctorship.—Rev. Dr. Elliott, editor of the Western Christian Advocate, in the last number of that paper, responding to some venerable brother, who had objected that a certain exceptionable work was recommended by the Doctors, and must therefore pass, expresses himself on this wise:

"As to this matter of the doctorship, we say, that as these titles now come very cheap, they are worth nothing when obtained, and so many incompetent persons wear them, the title it would seem to us, means, just nothing, and is not worth, in argument, the value of the ink that writes it."

And who, of the numerous D. D's. is wiser, or more candid than Dr. Elliott, the author of the above sentiment.

Our Correspondent S. W. W., will be recollected as the writer of "Sketches in the Western Woods." After a long silence, he is welcomed again to our columns. His genius for making verse, we conceive, ought to be encouraged. From the poetical effusion we place before our readers this week, it will be seen, that he can do up a thing of this kind, even upon an unpleasant subject, in good style.

ORIGINAL REVIEW.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Southey and his Commentator.

Br. Bassett: In looking into Southey's Life of Wesley, vol. 2, page 248, I find—Mr. Wesley "Having determined how to act, he communicated his determination to Dr. Coke, and proposed, in his character of presbyter, which he said was the same as bishop, to invest him with the same presbytero-episcopal powers, that, in that character, he might proceed to America, and superintend the societies in the United States. The doubts which Dr. Coke entertained as to the validity of Mr. Wesley's authority, were removed by the same treatise which had convinced Mr. Wesley; and it seems not to have occurred to either the one or the other, that, if presbyter and bishop were the same order, the proposed consecration was useless; for Dr. Coke having been regularly ordained, was as good a bishop as Mr. Wesley himself." So far Dr. Southey.

On the above, the American Editor, "Rev Daniel Curry, A. M.," has the following Note: "As to ministerial, or rather ecclesiastical order, they were indeed equals; but Mr. Wesley was also the actual head of the Methodist societies, (which societies in America were about to assume the character of perfectly organized churches,) and was therefore possessed of, and of course could confer, an authority which Dr. Coke had no right to by virtue of his former ordination. Mr. Wesley also acted in conjunction with other presbyters, and so the authority of a presbytery, which may be assumed to be above that of any individual presbyter, was exercised in that appointment. A parallel case is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, where it is related of the elders of the church at Antioch, that when about to send out Barnabas and Saul, on a special mission, though they had been accredited ministers of the gospel, yet were they formally ordained for that particular work. They were not raised to another grade in the ministry by this act, but simply separated to that particular mission. So Dr. Coke was not raised to "a third order," but he was solemnly appointed to the supervision of the Methodist societies, with instructions to complete their organization as a church. The worst that can be said of this procedure is that it was unusual."

In chapter V. page 257, vol. 2, of his Life of the Wesleys, Dr. Whitehead commences his history and discussion of the episcopacy. If Southey did not derive his conclusions from him, there is so great similarity of language and reasoning as to induce a suspicion of the kind.

We intend to notice Mr. Curry's Note. He is in the original inextricable difficulties inherent in Methodist Episcopacy. Mr. Curry represents Mr. Wesley as having possessed a certain sort of headship different from, and independent of, ministerial order, "or rather ecclesiastical order."—He was the actual head of Methodism in England and America. Therefore the independent right and power of Mr. Wesley! As head over all to the Methodists, he could confer powers purely Methodistical! And he did confer them! Besides, Mr. Wesley was assisted by other presbyters. And what was their assistance worth?—Certainly nothing. For it was not presbyterial power which ordained, but Mr. Wesley's headship alone ordained! Here is a part of the history of these doings: John and Charles Wesley were both at a Conference in Bristol in 1784.—Dr. Coke, according to previous arrangements, persuaded John Wesley, then in his 84th year, to take with him James Creighton, a presbyter of the church of England, and some one beside, into a private chamber, and to set him (Dr. Coke) apart by imposition of hands to a superintendency over the societies in North America. This was done with such secrecy that Charles Wesley was kept in entire ignorance of the proceedings—and when he learnt what had been done, he expressed his indignation in full terms. Secret ordinations, even where the power was unquestioned, were never deemed valid—by any evangelical church. Secrecy vitiates all such ordinations, out of the Catholic Church—in which they have centuries ago occurred; but not in these days!

Mr. Curry is at issue with John Wesley respecting the setting apart of Paul and Barnabas. Mr. Curry says, "they were formally ordained for that particular work"—and this is said to justify the special ordination of Dr. Coke. But Mr. Wesley says (Works vol. 7, page 285,) "But when Paul and Barnabas were separated for the work to which they were called, this was not ordaining them. St. Paul was ordained long before, and that not of man, nor by man. It was only inducting him to the province for which our Lord had appointed him from the beginning."

The only secure ground of defence of Mr. Wesley in ordaining Dr. Coke, (if he did ordain him) is his headship independently of all things beside.

Mr. Curry is more at issue with the orders of ordination in the Methodist Episcopal Church than he is with Mr. Wesley. Mr. Curry says, Dr. Coke was not raised to "a third order." Now for the proof: Dr. Coke brought over to this country with him, a book entitled "The Sunday Service of the Methodists." This book is an abridgment of the English Church Prayer Book—and borrows the three forms of ordination of the English Church. 1. The form of ordination of a Deacon. 2. Of a Priest. 3. Of a Bishop. Now get the Discipline of the Methodist E. Church and you will find each of these three forms of ordination in it—compare them word for word with the forms of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and you will find that both churches have, and use, three forms of ordination constituting three orders of ministry in each church; and that these forms are the same. If Dr. Coke was not raised by Mr. Wesley to a third order, how did he attain to that order? Here is another inexplicable and inextricable difficulty of Methodist episcopacy. Nor can Mr. Wesley's headship bring any relief here; for, Mr. Curry declares, with all the authority of a Commentator on Southey, that "Dr. Coke was not raised to a third order."—The forms of ordination infallibly declare—the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, are a third order—and as such, they are ordained.—Mr. Curry's doctrines won't suit the Church South, which derives all authority for the itinerancy from the episcopacy, as having been anterior to the Conference, and claims the triple order.

Mr. Curry is entirely wrong: 1. Mr. Wesley was not, nor could he be, "the actual head of the American Societies after the independence of this country." This he states himself, and on this fact he proceeded in giving his advice. Mr. Asbury was the actual head of the societies; and Mr. Asbury's headship was confirmed to him by the vote of the first Conference after the peace.—That vote constituted Mr. Asbury independent of Mr. Wesley. This was the intent of the vote.

Mr. Curry is wrong 2: In saying that the "societies were about to assume the character of perfectly organized churches." This must have been written for some Congregational region.—The Methodist Episcopal Church was constituted one and indivisible. This was done without the consent of the societies. Not a Layman had a word to say. Nor from that day to this, has a single Layman ever been a member of a Conference in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Not a Layman had aught to do with the late division of the one indivisible church into two indivisible churches. Each floated off at the command of the imperial one and indivisible itinerancy, carrying all lay-folk in one or other ship.

Mr. Curry is wrong 3: In saying that "Dr. Coke was solemnly appointed to the supervision of the Methodist societies, with instructions to complete their organization as a church." Dr. Coke, Mr. Asbury, and a few of the preachers of 1784, established a government independently of every thing right and every thing wrong, by their own will. The societies had, as stated, not a word to say—were not permitted to say pro, or con, yea, or nay, in their organization into "churches," that is into one church. One Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. Curry is wrong 4: In attempting to vindicate the episcopacy. He is farther wrong in his misrepresentation of recorded facts. He is utterly wrong—does all possible injustice to Mr. Wesley, in placing his right to ordain in his headship over the Methodists. Shame on all human headships. Shame on those who bow to them.—Shame, all shame, on those who teach human headship to christians. John Wesley was a head: Francis Asbury was a head. Wm. McKendree was a head—and so of all the bishops now, each is a head to the church—and each is a head to the itinerant ministry. Human headship indeed!!!—the sufficient source of a third order in the ministry—and of all power to make rules and regulations for christian people! Mr. Curry ought to blush all colors for claiming such a headship for John Wesley, as constituted him the source of all the evils of Methodist oligarchy in England, and of Methodist episcopacy in America. John Wesley's advice, solemnly given, was "follow the Scriptures and the primitive church." How admirably was that advice declined by Messrs Coke, and Asbury. And how modestly is it now repudiated. "Mr. Wesley's headship is an all-sufficient source of authority." Methodist episcopacy is an imposition: it can never be justified.—Methodist itinerant government is a pure spiritual despotism—and it will be destroyed by itself, or from other causes.

Buried Alive.—John Schelinger while digging a well in Kendall county, Illinois, at the depth of 50 feet below the surface, was buried alive. The sand got up to his waist, and before the man at the top of the well could render him any assistance, he was buried to the depth of 7 or 8 feet above his head in the sand at the bottom of the well. Every exertion was made by the neighbors, who were soon on the spot, to extricate him, but this was not accomplished until the evening, when he was taken out dead, having been eight hours under the superincumbent mass. He was a young man, 32 years of age, from Portland, in the State of Maine, where his family resides.

MR. EDITOR: Passing the day of rest in the inity I concluded to attend some place of wor ip in Zanesville. Seeing a number of plain essed serious looking people proceeding in one rection, I followed in the train to a plain built fice, in a sequestered place, and shaded by an ple-tree grove. I entered and having found a mfortable seat tried to compose my mind suitly to the circumstances of the place and the occion. A common and unostentatious looking an arose to address the congregation. His oject was the atonement of Christ. He spoke ently and with energy. His observations were tinent and practical. In his closing remarks dwelt upon the freeness and abounding fullss of that salvation, and with animation and no le zeal invited & pressed all to partake of that vation, the Gospel and its concomitant blessgs provided for all.

This was all very good, but before sitting wn, he requested as they should begin to g all who were not church members would ire, but invited all the church members to rein. Thus we were requested to put, without n the benefit of the benediction. He packed loff, as too unholy or profane to witness what re was to be said or done! What is it that ristian people find requisite to do which they afraid or ashamed to be seen by their neighrs? Query, is this good brother a minister of mething else beside the Gospel? The latter dispenses to all and invites all to partake of it, t, the former it appears is only for the members his own sect.

In the afternoon I visited another place of wor p of the same order. The subject here was rust in God." The observations on the subt, were pertinent and many cogent reasons adnced, why christians should repose their trust the Lord. But in winding up, the minister served that he despised croakers. There are se, said he that predict the decline of the rch. He appeared very anxious to encourhis congregation, which was but small, by serving, "the church has seen more difficult asons than this, and you will yet see the time en these seats (many of them then empty) l be filled with worshippers, and this altar wded with mourners." Now I was led to r that this zealous minister, thus comforting people, had but very contracted views of the urch and christianity; not recognizing any thing he kind beyond the narrow limits of his own le congregation. If it prospers, the church l do well, if the seats in his place of worship filled and their altar well attended, the church n no danger. For who is it in his estimation t constitute the church? We hear much said ut bigotry and priestcraft, but if this is not ed to the spirit and the doings of mother me, I acknowledge I am unable to discrimin. We will venture to say to these good thren if they wish to see, what is with so much f complacency called the church prosper, they t change their own course. And long as a rch seeks to hide its doings from the comnity and co-works in the dark, in the midst of light and intelligence of the present day, it d not expect to enjoy much confidence or cite much influence in the world.

Written for the Western Recorder.

The Annual Meeting of the Zanesville and nam Colonization Society was held at the sbyterian Meeting-house, Zanesville on Mon, the fifth of July, (the fourth being on the bath,) 1847.

The meeting was called to order by the Presit, Rev. W. A. Smallwood.

The annual Report was read by the Secretary, ibiting a prosperous state of the Colonization eme; its gradual advancement in the objects templated by its friends and founders. The of Liberia becoming an indepe ndent nation, taking rank among the enlightened kingdoms l republics of the earth, is an important era in existence. Prejudice seems to be giving way: more enlightened feeling prevails—even the ored race are beginning to think for themves. Communications between this country l Africa are frequent, and the advantages the African race are being appreciated by se who are in a situation to learn the truth. The amount raised the past year for the benefit the parent Society, is one hundred and two lars, which has been duly forwarded on to their easurer.

Agreeably to arrangements made a few days vious to the annual meeting, the different clermen in these villages were requested to preach the subject of Colonization, as our anniversary e on the Sabbath, and take up a contribution, ich was done by two of them, and seven dolrs collected in each house.

The Report being accepted, the following resions were passed.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare for publication, a suitable tribute of respect to the memory of our late President, Rev. James Culbertson. Rev. W. A. Smallwood, committee.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Society be tendered to Rev. Messrs. Brown and Smallwood for the able and judicious discourses delivered by them on the anniversay of this Society.

Resolved, That the prospects of elevating and benefiting the Colored Race, by means prescribed by the Colonization Society, are improving and brightening every day.

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend this subject to the serious consideration of all the friends of humanity.

Officers elected for the the following year.

Prests. Rev. W. A. SMALLWOOD; Vice. Prests. Messrs. S. J. COX and D. CONVERS; Managers, GEORGE JAMES, A. SULLIVAN, J. C. GUTHRIE, G. W. MANYPENNY, JAS. RAGUET, E. E. FILLMORE, JOHN SULLIVAN, REV. S. BROWN; Sect. and Treasurer, H. SAFFORD.

Resolved, That these proceedings be published in all the papers of Zanesville and Putnam, if agreeable. H. SAFFORD, Sect.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Rail Road.

A friend has furnished us with some notes respecting the present condition and business of the Mad River and Lake Erie Rail Road, which will be interesting to travellers and the public.

There are now in full employ seven Locomotives, and three more will be added in the the course of the season. There are four splendid passenger Cars; one first rate baggage car ready to go on the road, and another one building. In each train 150 passengers can be comfortably seated.

Of freight cars, there are 103 now in use, and a large number of hands are engaged in adding to them, so that, by the first of September, there will be at least 175 on the road. With all these facilities, we are now informed by one of the directors, it will be impossible to clear the storehouses on the line, of the present accumulation of produce and other freight, before the first of December next. This being the case, how is the coming crop to get to a northern market?

The business of the road has increased far beyond the expectations of its most sanguine friends. The wheat, &c. sent over to Sandusky in the year 1846, was 354,262 bushs. The number of bushels sent over in the first five months of the present year, is as follows:—

Wheat transported in	January,	18,912,56
" "	February,	64,416,13
" "	March,	40,876,33
" "	April,	63,674,21
" "	May,	122,204,21

making a total of three hundred and ten thousand forty-four bushels and twenty-four pounds!

This increase is astonishing, and we would not be surprised if the number of bushels reached eight hundred thousand for 1847.

This route, in connection with the Little Miami Road, is decidedly the best one for getting from the Lake to the Ohio river at Cincinnati, and by far the most expeditious. The cars now run to Cherokee, six miles from Bellefontaine, and there is therefore but 38 miles of travel by coaches between the River and Lake, and that through a delightful and highly cultivated region.

That travellers may be apprised of the facilities of this route, we state, that the cars leave Sandusky City every morning (Sundays excepted) at 5 o'clock, and arrive at Cincinnati at 11 A. M. the next day, 30 hours. Returning, leave Cincinnati 1½ P. M. and reach Sandusky City the next day at 4 P. M., 26½ hours. Steamboats leave Sandusky regularly for Buffalo, daily, at 7 P. M. and arrive at B. on the evening of the next day; and thus reach Buffalo in about 54 hours from Cincinnati.

The rails are now being laid from Cherokee to Bellefontaine, and the cars will reach the latter place on or before the 5th of July. This will reduce the Stage travel to 32 miles.

The present earnings of the road average $600 per day, notwithstanding one of the Locomotives is being employed in distributing iron and timber along the line of the road where repairs are needed.—Urbana Citizen.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.—The steamboat Financier has been sunk 12 miles below Pittsburgh. She was loaded with government freight and dry goods. The boat and cargo will be saved, the latter in a damaged condition. No lives lost.

The Protestant Episcopal Convention of Illinois, by a nearly unanimous vote, have elected Rev. James B. Britton, now ministering in Chillicothe, O., Assistant Bishop of the Diocese.

IMMIGRANTS.—It is said that the arrival of immigrants at New York, last week exceeded 1,000 a day.

Mr. Pakenham, the British Minister, was amongst the passegers for Liverpool, who sailed from Boston on Thursday last in the steamship Cambria.

ACCIDENTAL DROWNINGS.—On Saturday afternoon, Charles Higgins, aged 10 years, was drowned in a pond at the head of Patroon street, Albany, whilst bathing. Sunday night about 10 o'clock, Jer. Degnon was found drowned in the Little Basin, Albany. He was a laborer residing in the neighborhood.

Col C. H. Brough left Cincinnati on Thursday, with the 4th Ohio Regiment in the steamers Alhambra, Belle of the West, and Pontiac, for the seat of war. The boats reached Camp Ohio, when the tents were struck, and the Regiment embarked.

THE EXPLOSION.—The explosion of the Simon Kenton at St. Louis was not so serious as we first supposed and published. The boat was pushing out and crowded with passengers; one of the pipes broke, by which the lower deck was filled with steam, and many persons scalded. Several in the alarm jumped overboard, but all, except an infant, which a mother dropped while in the water, are supposed to have been rescued from drowning. One poor fellow was found clinging to the rudder. He was taken on board, but so dreadfully scalded that recovery was doubtful.—A lad ten years of age was taken to the hospital insensible, so badly scalded from head to foot.—Several of the crew were scalded. None of the cabin passengers injured. The delegates to the Chicago convention went on board the steamer Herald and proceeded up the river.—Cincinnati Commercial.

☞We learn from the New Albany (Ind.) Bulletin, than on the arrival of the Indiana volunteers there, and while firing a salute, three men were seriously injured by the premature discharge of the piece. The names of the injured are Frederick Jackson, James Bowley and Chas. Fitch.

Terrible Steamboat Disaster--Lamentable Loss of Life.

The Alexander Scott, arrived last evening, reports that the new steamer, "Star-Spangled Banner," from New Orleans, bound for Cincinnati, struck a snag about 11 o'clock on the morning of the 29th ult. a few miles above Baton Rouge, and sunk in about five minutes. The cabin almost immediately separated from the hull and floated off, which was fortunately the means of saving nearly all the passengers. Some fifteen or twenty persons, principally German deck passengers, were supposed to have been drowned.

The cabin floated down the river about two miles, when the Baton Rouge ferry-boat came along side, took off all the passengers, and towed the cabin to the shore. Nearly all the baggage of the passengers was lost. Boat and cargo a total loss. The Star-Spangled Banner was owned in Cincinnati, and was one of the finest boats of her class in the trade.—Louisville Courier.

TRAGIC.—A deep tragedy was enacted at Montgomery, Alabama, on the 11th inst. A physician of standing, Dr. S. S. Perry, was shot dead in the Post Office by Colonel Winston. Perry was Winston's family physician, his personal and political friend, and had seduced his wife.—Colonel Winston was State Senator for Sumpter, and for the last two sessions President of the Senate; Perry was last session a Representative from that county, both Democrats. The affair produced the most intense excitement. A judicial investigation was to commence on the 12th. Perry had a six barrelled pistol in his pocket at the time he was shot, but had not time to use it.

FLY SWARM.—Another tremendous fly swarm on East Canal Street on Friday. They appeared in masses of millions, and presented the appearance of a cloud. The fly was the same as that described as having appeared in swarms near the bagging factory not long since. It is of a dark brown color, and about one inch in length. It appears that these fly swarms are not confined to our vicinity. The Indiana Palladium of Saturday says that the "same kind of insect, in large swarms, have made their appearance thereabouts. The grass and dog fennel along the river bank was perfectly black with them on Thursday, but we believe they have nearly all disappeared since."

Since writing the above, we learn that another swarm made its appearance near the bagging factory on Thursday and Friday.—Cincinnati Commercial.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE POETESS.—The Hartford Courant in its account of the visit of Mr. Polk to that city says:—

"A halt was made when the President arrived opposite Mrs. Sigourney's residence, and Mrs. Sigourney presented him with a boquet of flowers."

This was very pretty and very proper, doubtless; but the following, which we find in the same paper, is quite the reverse:—

"We understand that while the President was at Mrs. Sigourney's, a rogue took from the house a gold watch, a gold pencil case and two or three gold pens.—Balt. Patriot.

DEATH AT A BALL.—A festive party given by Lieut. Colonel Fitzmaurice, at his residence in Berkley street, Cheltenham, England, was shocked by the awfully sudden death of one of his guests, a young lady named Quinelar, who had formerly been governess in the family. The deceased had, after supper danced a quadrille, and had just partaken of an ice, when she was suddenly taken ill, became insensible, and, though a medical gentleman was present as one of the party, she expired within a few minutes.—Cin. Com.

FOURTH OF JULY ACCIDENTS.—A number of accidents occurred in New York, on Saturday and Sunday, from the use of powder and fire-arms, intended for the more humane purpose of giving vent to patriotism. A Mr. Benjamin had his left hand blown off. Mr. Jas. Brown Jr., son of Mr. James Brown, of the firm of Brown, Brothers & Co., of that city, was accidentally shot at Flushing, on Saturday, by a person who was shooting at a mark with a pistol, he lived only three minutes after the unfortunate occurrence.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—A son of Mr. J. M. Stewart, watchman of the Seventh Ward, met with a most shocking accident last evening. He had been sent on an errand to Kendall's Pottery, and carelessly putting his right hand on one of the stone crushing rollers, his arm was drawn in, and bone and all mashed. Amputation was performed by Dr. Kendrick, who took the arm off about two inches below the elbow. The boy was about eleven years of age.—Cincinnati Commercial.

☞Sheriff Taylor, of Kent county, Delaware, died last week of the "black tongue," the second or third case in the family. This disease appears to be of an epidemic or endemic character—an erysipelas affection, which seizes upon the palate and glands of the throat, swelling them, as well as the head, to an extraordinary size, until death ensues.

EXTENSION OF THE RAILROAD TO THE OHIO.—We noticed the other day, the arrival in this city of a committee of citizens of Wheeling, who were deputed by the authorities of that city to visit Baltimore, for the purpose of conferring with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, upon the subject of the extension of that great work to the Ohio River at Wheeling, under the law of the last session of the Legislature of Virginia.

We understand that the Wheeling Committee and a Committee of the Directors of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, to whom the subject was referred by the Board, have had free and frequent consultations on the subject, and they have unanimously agreed upon terms, which it is believed will lead to the acceptance of the law by the Railroad Company, and early ensure the completion of the road to Wheeling.

It is understood that the objectionable features of the law are to be removed, and that the unrestricted right of way is granted from the Virginia line to Wheeling, the road not confined to any particular line, or required to touch any particular point on the way thither.

It has also been agreed that the city of Wheeling is to subscribe five hundred thousand dollars to the stock of the Company, and to secure its prompt payment in a manner satisfactory to the Railroad Company. A free gift of two acres and a half of ground, in a position eligible to the purpose, is to be made by Wheeling to the Railroad Company, for a depot; and the use of steampower on the railroad track in Wheeling, is to be secured.

These are the principal terms of the agreement, which, as we have said above, have been unanimously made by the Wheeling Commitee and the Committee of the Directors of the Railroad Company. The agreement has been sent out to Wheeling for the formal approval of the authorities of that town, which there is no doubt it will receive. It will then be submitted to the Board of Directors of the Railroad, and there is every reason to believe it will meet their sanction.—Balt. Patriot.

DEPLORABLE OCCURRENCE.—We regret, says the Richmond Inquirer, that one of those sad occurrences which human foresight is unable to prevent, took place on Monday, while the volunteers were firing the national salute, and which cast a gloom over the scene deep and sincere.—Immediately in front of the military a large number of spectators were standing, as usual on occasions of firing, &c. It appears that a musket of one of the Grays was accidentally loaded with a ball cartridge, and as soon as the company had fired the third round, a gentleman standing immediately in front (about ten paces) was seen to fall, and, on being examined, it was found that a ball had penetrated his forehead, and, passing through, had carried with it a large portion of the upper part of the head, producing almost instant death.

The deceased was a native of Petersburg, named John M. Brown, a chair painter by profession, and a son of Mr. Daniel Brown, of Petersburg. He was about 30 years of age, and has left an amiable wife and one child. The body was taken in the cars to Petersburg.

DEATH OF A MEMBER OF THE VA. LEGISLATURE.—The Valley Whig of Friday announces the death of Lewis Neal, Esq., the delegate elect from the election district of Giles and Mercer.

A NORWEGIAN NEWSPAPER IN WISCONSIN.—Among other new enterprises in Wisconsin is the establishment of a Norwegian newspaper in the town of Norway, Racine county. There are now in Wisconsin, Illinois and Iowa, twenty settlements; and sixteen of them within the limits of the Territory. They embrace a population of from fifteen to twenty thousand, frugal, industrious, honest, law-loving and law-abiding citizens.

ACCIDENTS ON THE FIFTH.—We note an unusual number of accidents on the National Anniversary, in our exchanges. While every one seems to have enjoyed the day, and a general festivity spread itself over the country, many by the imprudent use of fireworks, guns and pistols have maimed themselves for life, and not a few have lost their lives. In Troy a man was killed by the bursting of a cannon, and another in Schenectady lost his arm from the same cause. The lamented death of young Brown, shows how careful patriotic boys and men should be of Holiday sports with gunpowder.—N. Y. Sun.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—We are informed that a Mr. Wilkinson, when descending the Mount Adams road, on Wednesday night, was knocked down and robbed of a silver watch and a purse containing a small amount of money. There were three of the rascals, who sprang out from behind a tree at the roadside, and knocked him down with a heavy stick.—Cin. Com.

PRICES OF BREAD STUFFS.—The news by the Caledonia has produced an effect upon the prices of flour, grain and provisions in general, that must be gratifying to consumers. Flour went down a dollar, and is now selling at from $6 00 to $6 12, with every indication of a still farther decline.—This is as we have more than once predicted, and we prophecy that flour will be bought this fall as cheap as has been known for many years. Europe seems to have recovered from blight and short crops, and has in prospect one of the best harvests ever known. The weather through Britain, Germany, France, Egypt and Russia continues most favorable, and the grain fields are pouring in a rich supply, choking back the speculation, which had saddled Famine and was riding it at a golden pace. The Deltas of Egypt are described by all accounts, as promising unprecedented supplies. Hungary, Wallachia and other sections of Germany are equally fruitful, while France and Great Britain groan with abundance! The state of our own harvest too, has had its effect on the market. It is impossible even for speculators to cheat nature's testimony, which from every part of the Union cheers the poor man with promises of plenty. The honest farmer has been reaping a rich reward of high prices for the year past, and will be well paid for the year to come, but he cannot wish scarcity and high prices, when so many must suffer—he is not so selfish as that, nor money loving, however much a class of Vandals may prey upon the calamities of the people. We rejoice in common with thousands, that the crisis of starvation is over, and that millions on both continents can breathe freer, in hopes of a livelihood ordained by Providence for all.—N. Y. Sun.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—We learn that on Thursday last, a young man, named Goslin, was killed accidentally, near Berlin, Frederick county, on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. He was engaged with others in the building of a culvert, when the crane car upset and threw him a considerable height into the air, and he fell to the bottom of the culvert, which is about twenty feet deep. He did not live more than twenty minutes. He was taken to the residence of his father, in the village of Knoxville, near Harper's Ferry.—Balt. Sun.

DISTINGUISHED POLISH EXILE.—The barque Marcellus, which arrived at New York from Palermo on Thursday last, brought as passengers John Tysosoowsky, his wife and three children. This gentleman took a prominent part in the last Polish Revolution, and indeed was the supreme dictator when it was brought to a close. He was finally banished to the United States, and in consideration of his written agreement not to return, the Government of Austria undertook to pay his passage over and to supply him with a certain sum of money on his arrival. He is now gone to Washington to receive this from the Austrian Ambassador.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT AND NARROW ESCAPE.—On Friday morning last, about day light, two gentlemen, Mr. Jeremiah Sunday, and Mr. Thos. Trenary, started to watch for deer, at a crossing place, the latter climbing up upon a scaffold erected for that purpose, and the former sitting or crouching behind a log. Mr. T. who was not aware of Mr. S's locality, mistaking him for a deer, fired upon him, his ball taking effect in the back part of the neck, under the mastoid process, and over the atlas, and thus passing through between the large muscles and the bone, neither of which was injured. Mr. S. we are happy to learn, is in a fair way to recover.

No blame at all, is attached to Mr. Trenary, as he did not know Mr. S. was in the woods;—and as Mr. S. had a red handkerchief around his head, and wore a coat somewhat the color of a deer he was easily mistaken for one, and hence the accident.

We understand that Mr. Trenary, has, by the excitement and mental agitation consequent upon this unfortunate affair, been thrown into a severe fever, from which his recovery is somewhat doubtful. His sufferings are said to be even greater than those of Mr. Sunday whom he wounded.—St. Marys Sentinel.

CURIOUS FACT.—A degree of latitude is equal to a degree of Fahrenheit' and 400 feet of elevation is the same. This fact, though curious, is of a demonstrative character, and will go far in enabling us to ascertain facts in reference to climate.

PROSPECTS AHEAD.—A very significant intimation is given by the National Intelligencer, of some movement of the abolition of slavery in Virginia, in connection with some remarks upon the great immigrating scheme now on foot in England, under the auspicies of Mr. Rawling, the editor of the Old Countrymen. Mr. R. proposes to bring out a colony of Englishmen to purchase up the worn-out bottoms of Va., and has been very successful. The Intelligencer, in enumerating the advantages which the emigrant may expect in coming to the Old Dominion, says:

"He will find himself also surrounded (in the valley between the Ridge and Alleghanies) by people whose habits and opinions are congenial with his own, and who, although they live in a slave State, have few, many of them no slaves, nor have they any sympathy for slave institutions, but look forward to the time when a constitutional change will take place, formerly securing the abolition of slavery within the Old Dominion. The elements are now in process of combination toward the formation of this great work, which, let it be understood, will be carried on solely under Virginia counsel and deliberation."

Any way, so it be done. How gladly will Old Virginia, the native State of Washington, Jefferson, and Patrick Henry, that stood hand in hand with Massachusetts in the war of liberty, and whose very motto proclaims eternal hostility to all tyranny, be welcomed to the circle of the free States, and the realization of her own principles and hope of liberty for all. We earnestly hope that the cautious editor has not been too rash.—N. Y. Evangelist.

SERIOUS DISASTER.—Just as the Simon Kenton, having on board a very large number of passengers, including many delegates to the Chicago Convention, was leaving the wharf yesterday evening, a serious calamity occured. There was, it is supposed, a flaw in the stand which connects the boilers, and this giving way, a large quantity of steam and boiling water, issued from it. Two of the deck passengers, and one of the hands were within its range, and the former were dreadfully scalded. It is hardly possible that either of them can survive. The person of one of the sufferers, a boy, presented a most melancholy spectacle. They were provided with medical assistance as soon as possible, and were taken to the hospital. On the person of one of these sufferers was found a very considerable amount of money, which was deposited for safe keeping with P. Chouteou, Jr., & Co. Both of the victims were Germans. The third person had his hand seriously burnt.

The explosion, of course, created very great confusion among the passengers on the deck. In the consternation of the moment, one man, and some persons, say two, jumped overboad and were drowned. A German woman, with her child in her arms, attempted to jump from the stern of the boat into the yawl, but failed to do so. The child was drowned: the distracted mother was picked up by a boat below, and saved. This is the extent of the calamity, although the reports made it much worse. The accident is attributable to a defective piece of machinery, and not, so far as we can learn, to any negligence of the officers of the boat.—St. Louis Rep., 29th ult.

DESTRUCTIVE FRESHES IN BLACK RIVER.—The Galena (Ill.) Gazette, of June 22, says: "A gentleman just down from the Falls of Black river, informs us, that on the 9th inst. the river commenced rising at that place about 8 o'clock in the morning, and by 12 at night it had risen 25 feet, perpendicular height—in the first 2 hours it rose 8 feet. The consequence is an immense loss of property in mills and lumbers. Every boom on the river was broken, and everything they contained swept away. There were 8 booms in all, which contained about 25,000 hogs, with large quantities of square timber, sawed lumber, shingles &c.

TEMPERANCE STATISTICS.—It appears from statistics presented to the late anniversary of the American Temperance Union, that 70,000 American seamen had signed the pledge—that 500 distilleries had been closed in Sweden—that there were 1,200,000 members of temperance societies in Germany and 2,000,000 in England, Scotland and Wales.

THE LAWYER CAUGHT.—A farmer applied about a lawsuit to an attorney, who told him he could not undertake it, being already engaged on the other side; at the same time he said he would give him a recommendation to a professional friend, which he did.—The farmer out of curiosity opened, and it read as follows:—

"Here's two weathers fallen out together:
If you'll fleece one, I'll fleece the other,
And make 'em agree like brother and brother.

The farmer carried this epistle to the person with whom he was at variance. Its perusal cured both parties, and terminated the dispute.

POETRY.

The Field of Wheat.

BY H. F. GOULD.

Field of wheat, so full and fair,
Showing thus thy silver hair,
Lightly waving either way,
Where the gentle breezes play,
Looking like a sunny sea,
How I long to gaze at thee!
Pleasant art thou to the sight,
And to thought a rich delight;
Then thy name is music sweet,
Silken sounding field of wheat!

Pointing upwards to the sky,
Rising straight and aiming high,
Every stalk is seen to shoot,
Like an arrow from the root;
As a well-trained company,
All in uniform agree.
From the footing to the ear—
All in order strict appear,
Marshalled by a skillful hand,
All together bow or stand.

Still within the proper bound,
None o'ersteps the given ground,
With its tribute held to pay
At his nod whom they obey.
Each the gem that studs its crown,
Will in time for man lay down.
Thou with promise art replete,
Bearing precious sheaves of wheat!
How thy strength in weakness lies?
Not a robber bird that flies
Finds support whereby to put
On a stalk her lawless foot;
None her predatory beak
Plunges down thy store to seek,
Where thy guard of silver spears
Keeps the fruit and decks the ears;
No vain insect that could do
Harm to thee, dare venture through
Armory like thine, to win
From the sheaf the grain within.

What a study do we find
Opened here for eye and mind.
Who that sees thee as thou art,
Can disown a grateful heart?
Here upon this favored ground,
Faith is blessed and hope is crowned;
Charity may find the bread,
Wide abroad her gifts to spread;
Wisdom power, and goodness meet,
Beauteous, bounteous field of wheat.

Ode to the Fourth of July.

BY OTWAY CURRY.

God of the high and bouncless heaven!
We call upon thy name—
We tread the soil which thou hast given
To Freedom and to Fame.

Around us on the ocean waves
Our starry banners sweep—
Around us in their lowly graves
Our patriot fathers sleep.

With fearless hearts and stalwart hands
They bore their eagles high;
O'er serried arms and battle brands,
Careering in the sky.

For freedom, in her darkest day,
Their life-blood bathed the plain:
Their mouldering tombs may pass away—
Their glory shall remain.

God of the free! thy children bless—
With joy their labors crown—
Let their domain be limitless,
And endless their renown.

Proclaim the morn of Freedom's birth
O'er every land and sea;
Till her pure spirit frees the earth,
E'en as the heavens are free.

Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church.

NO. III.

MR. EDITOR: The next department of the Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church which will demand attention, is that which contains the several articles; which, as already stated, are based upon the elementary principles. If any thing is found in any of these articles to conflict with said principles, it will, of course, have to be set down as an oversight, or misapprehension. I however, do not contemplate finding anything of a conflicting nature. I have again and again examined this Constitution; and have no recollection of any thing in the least favorable to a view of this character; unless the existing laws relative to the rights of the several Annual Conferences to make their own rules relative to "the admission and government of colored members within" their own particular district, forms an exception; which I do not believe. This provision of the constitution, instead of being deemed incongruous, from the peculiarity of the association,—free with slave states: and the Church having no political control over slavery, should be esteemed one of its excellences.

Article first contains the name of the Church, comprising the associated Methodist (Protestant) Churches, throughout the several states. The second article presents the "Terms of membership," Which are, "A desire to flee from the wrath to come, and be saved by grace, through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, with an avowed determination to walk in all the commandments of God blameless." Those continuing in fellowship must conform "to such rules of moral discipline as the word of God requires." There is to be a probationary state, which the discipline declares shall be four months.

Article third refers to the "Division into Districts, Circuits, and Stations." A District with the Methodist Protestant Church, is the same as a conference in some other Methodist Churches; and does not include the idea of the jurisdiction of a Presiding Elder, for of these, they have none. Each District is divided into circuits and stations. This article also sets forth, that ministers and preachers removing from one district to another, and every member removing from one circuit, station or Church to another, who has a certificate of good standing, shall be entitled to a reception in any other district &c. This latter, is a peculiarity of M. P. Church as it respects the obligation, by law, to receive those who hold certificates of good standing.

Article fourth points out the prerequisites to constitute an associated M. P. Church; the mode of receiving churches; and confers upon each church or society the power, when two thirds of its qualified male members concur at a meeting called for that purpose, to purchase, build, lease, rent, sell, or otherwise obtain or dispose of property, for the mutual benefit of the church. Each church has the power to receive persons "into full membership; and to try, censure, or expel unworthy members, in accordance with the provisions of this constitution, and the rules of discipline."

The power secured in this article of the constitution to purchase, build, lease, rent, sell &c., is a peculiarity of the Methodist Protestant Church. Without any design to offend others, I remark; in one branch of the great Methodist family, though, by and with the consent of the quarterly meeting conference, they may purchase ground, erect a house of public worship thereon, and have trustees appointed, under the deed of settlement contained in their discipline; yet, these trustees are bound, where ever this deed is obtained, to open the doors of the church to every bishop, presiding elder or traveling preacher; but they may close them against every local preacher; for he is authorized to preach by a Quarterly, and not by an Annual or General Conference. The trustees of houses of worship in the Methodist Protestant Church, hold the property in trust, for the exclusive use of those who erected them, and no others, only as a gratuity; and a circuit preacher has no further rights, or control over these houses, than any other preacher or minister of this church; and neither, really, has any!

Article fifth directs that there shall be a leaders' meeting in every station; to be composed of all the class leaders and stewards; the superintendent is to be the chairman. At first view, it might be conjectured, that there is an unnecessary prohibition of the trustees, exhorters and unstationed ministers having a seat in the leaders' meeting; but when it is considered that cases may in this meeting be investigated, that may also come before the Quarterly Conference, to be re-examined and passed upon; and since none can sit twice on the same subject, if all were at first to act upon any case, and it then be brought before this conference, the Quarterly Conference would, to a great extent, be disorganized.

Article sixth treats of "Quarterly Conferences." There are to be "four quarterly conferences in each circuit and station, in every conference year; to be composed of all the ministers, preachers, exhorters, stewards, leaders, and trustees, in full membership, belonging to the circuit or station." Though the superintendent may call special quarterly conferences at other than the regular times, to attend to special business; yet, not one of the members of this conference, is in any way, dependent on the superintendent for his office. These conferences have the power to hear, and decide on appeals, to admonish or reprove any of its members, as occasion may require; to grant licences to exhort and to preach, when the applicants come properly recommended by their class, and are qualified; to renew the license granted, annually; "to recommend ministers and preachers to the Annual Conference to travel, and for ordination." This conference has no power to license any man to exhort or to preach, unless the applicant first obtains a satisfactory recommendation from the class af which he is a member; if they were to grant a license without this pre-requisite, it is very doubtful, if a legal investigation were instituted, whether the decision of an intelligent tribunal would be; "He is legally authorized to preach." Without the recommendation of Quarterly Conference, the President of an Annual Conference, or the conference itself, has no power to employ any man, (unless he has been a preacher or minister in some other church,) to travel as an itinerant minister in the Methodist Protestant Church. But the constitution empowers the Quarterly Conference, alone, to recommend ministers and preachers to the Annual Conferences for ordination. It is a settled proposition among Methodist Protestants, except, probably, an isolated few, who would wish to ape some others, that "all elders in the church of God are equal;" and of course, all deacons in the church equal. Every man of common sense would, at once decide, that no unstationed preacher—no unstationed deacon could, equally, be elected by the proper Annual Conference, the preacher to the office of a deacon, or the deacon to the office of an elder, unless he had first been recommended by the proper Quarterly Conference. Then, why is it, that the itinerant ministers must not pass the same ordeal, which the unstationed, are required to pass? There is nothing, either in the constitution or discipline, which relieves the stationed ministers from a compliance with the foregoing requisition. I cannot believe that the itinerants of the Methodist Protestant Church, ever intended to act, only, in accordance with the law in this matter; yet, it must be conceded, that it is the business, and that it is the duty of the LAITY, to guard, and carefully guard against every encroachment. By the neglecting of this, in the early ages of the church, their rights and privileges were entirely wrested from them.

Article seventh defines the "composition and powers of the Annual Conferences." Each District is to hold an Annual Conference, to be composed of all the ordained itinerant ministers belonging to the District, who are under the stationing authority of the conference; and of one lay delegate from each circuit and station for each itinerant minister on the circuit, or in the station. Any circuit which may not have an itinerant minister is, notwithstanding, entitled to send a delegate. This conference has the power to regulate the mode of the election of delegates in its own district. It has the authority to elect a president annually; and to do and perform all things necessary to preserve good order, and to secure the official fidelity of its members; to receive suitable persons into the itinerancy; and "to elect to orders those who are eligible and competent to the pastoral office." This conference is intrusted with the delegated authority to decide, after the proper Quarterly Conference has recommended the applicant, whether he is "eligible;" that is "fit to be chosen;" and "competent;" that is, "suitable, or qualified." The Annual Conferences are also authorized, "to make such special rules and regulations as the peculiarities of the district may require;" subject, however, to the supervision of the General Conference; "to regulate the mode of stationing the ministers and preachers within the district; and each conference has exclusive power to make its own rules and regulations for the admission and government of the colored members within its district." That portion of this article which authorizes the several Annual Conferences "to make such special rules and regulations as the peculiarities of the district may require," is worthy of notice. And first. How far does this power extend? Does it, or does it not impart power to these conferences to make any other conditions of membership than those laid down in the constitution? Or is it only contemplated that they may make such rules and regulations as the conference shall believe necessary for the government of its own members, and the regulation of its own particular business, arising from some peculiar uncontrolable circumstances? It seems to me, from a view of the whole ground the latter is all that can be included. J. H.

Sketches by Rev. A. McGuire.

NO. IV.

BR. BASSETT: I did think that I would have been able to send a sketch of my travels and labors, as a Missionary in the cause of Reform every week; but my absence from home a great part of my time has prevented. But as you have seen proper to publish the three first numbers, it would not be proper to break off now. I shall endeavor to select such portions as may be interesting; and will proceed by stating that after visiting Ridgeville, Centreville, Fairfield, Deerfield, and other places, with a fair prospect of organizing on the second visit: All failed by thus giving time for our opponents, to tell their flocks that we never could prosper, that none had ever prospered that left the Methodist Episcopal Church, that we would all soon come to nothing, &c.—Thus I met with great opposition, and persecution. But in the fear, and trusting in the protection of my heavenly Father, I was determined to press on, believing that our principles must be successful in raising up a church consistent with the word of God; I freely gave all my time, except a visit to my family now and then, who were working hard to support themselves, and me, for it was very trifling that I received from the brethren, while I faced the cold storms of winter and the blazing heats of summer, sometimes labored for weeks with severe colds settled on my lungs, but thanks be to my heavenly Father, he still supported and comforted me.

I pass on now to the 28th of March, 1829.—Scarcely able to ride, I went on to Springfield, and preached there next day, Sunday, in the court house to a goodly number, and again at night, to a large assembly. The word had a good effect, many tears were shed.

Tues. 31st.—Rode six miles, preached in a brick meeting-house, called Pleasant Hill, built principally by the Henkle family, and now belongs to us: I met the little class of ten members, and three more joined.

On Thursday, April 2d.—Rode on to brother Joshua Inskip's, yet very unwell. Friday 3d, preached in the meeting-house. It was filled—great attention, a precious melting, good time.—I then gave an hour's talk on government. On Sunday 5th, brother Inskip rode with me to Mecanicksburgh. The trustees of the M. E. C. met us in the street, and informed us that they had held a council, and concluded to let us preach in their church, provided I would say nothing on church government. I told them I did not like to be restricted on that or any other subject connected with the religious rights of men and the safety and prosperity of the church of Christ. But, as you say, there is not a private house in town, that will hold one-half of the people, I will consent to your proposition. So we went to the church, and I preached with great liberty, and was listened to with attention, and there was much weeping and good feeling, but here we also failed to organize, by the leading Reformer, Dr. ——— being promised a circuit, &c.. he turned against us. On Monday 6th, rode to Asbury Chapel, and preached to a number of my old friends, and many were filled with joy, and shouted, glory to God. A great number in this place were about to leave, but their preachers pursuaded them to wait until after our General Convention, and see what kind of a constitution and discipline we would have, &c. I rode into Springfield in the evening and was so unwell that I could not go on to my next appointment, and by the advice of Dr. T. and others, I rested until Saturday, then rode to Xenia. Sunday 12th, met the class at 9 o'clock and preached in the court-house at 11 o'clock, to a large and attentive audience. Many of them were my oldest and best friends in the old church. On Monday 13th, rode eighteen miles home, having been absent near three weeks, and thanks be to God, found all well, and in good spirits.—Thursday 15th, set out to reach my regular appointments, got to Xenia, and had a good time in a little prayer meeting, next day brother Towler rode ten miles with me to brother Joel Dalbey's, sen., there a glorious revival is begun. Several souls have been converted, and while preaching to-day, the good Lord sent his arrows to the hearts of a number, and we had a glorious time. In class at the close I hoisted the banner of Mutual Rights, and called for volunteers, and nine came forward—six from the world, two from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a Baptist brother.—Brother Towler preached at night, from, 'Rejoice evermore.' It was a good talk. I gave an exhortation, and invited all who wanted religion to come forward, and we would pray for them,—seven came, and in a few minutes they were crying aloud for mercy. We continued until midnight, and two professed to find peace with God. I will now pass over several days, and state that on the 21st of April, I went to Sharon meeting-house, eight miles from home, and preached, and gave a talk on church government, and organized a class of seven members, including a local preacher, and the class leader. On Monday 26th, preached at Lockport, at night, and God attended the word with power. One sinner came forward before I was done preaching, fell on his knees, praying for mercy,—I prayed with him, but he found no relief that night,—I visited him next morning,—talked and prayed with him until he got the witness of pardoning love shed abroad in his heart.

AID SOCIETY.

NO. III.

BR. BASSETT: My last closed with the one dollar plan. In the two former articles, I have been trying to show what might and ought to be done. In the present I shall speak in part of what I have been and intend doing should life and health permit. In the first place, in order to comply with the resolution of the Annual Conference, which makes it obligatory upon each superintendent to take up contributions for the following objects, to-wit: Rev. A. Shinn, the Aid Society, and to make conference collections. I made myself a book, ruled it off into three columns. The first I marked, A. Shinn; second, Aid Society,—third, Conference Collections. My course of procedure was this—after trying to preach, I would call the attention of the congregation to the above named objects, after presenting their claims upon the church and the benevolent part of the community. I would call upon some one of the brethren to pass round among the males, while I attended upon the females, in order to take their names together with amounts that each one was willing to contribute. That any sum would be thankfully received if it was only 6¼ cents. I will here say for the credit of the sisters: I have at every appointment found them as much or more liberal than the brethren.

At Rinehart's school-house, I called upon br. A. Rinehart, to wait upon the males, while I attended to our side of the house. After we both got round, we returned to the stand. I had obtained three times as much as he did. I then stated the matter to the congregation, saying that I was more than ever convinced, that the females possessed more of the true spirit than the males. In them was found the true spirit of benevolence. Could we but get them enlisted in the good cause, the Aid Society would have nothing to fear.—The brethren became ashamed of themselves, and to my surprise walked up to the stand, pulling out their 25 cents, enquiring how much they were yet behind the sisters. Not enough yet; others stepped up, paying their quarters, saying will not this bring us up? Not yet. Poor fellows they went away 37½ cents behind at last, saying however, that they would pay the last cent. I am satisfied the subscription plan is the best. At one appointment where I took up a Conference collection last year of only 50 cents, this year I got upwards of $9,00 subscribed,—part in hand, the balance to be paid against the sitting of the Annual Conference. Had not affliction overtaken me before I got round, I would have obtained some thirty or forty dollars for the Aid Society and father Shinn. Should I be able to make another round upon the circuit before Conference, I think $20,00 can yet be made. The largest sum that I have received is $1,00, the smallest 12½ cents. You may think this quite a small business, nevertheless it runs up to dollars,—and it counts,—and it is money. Glad if I had a plenty of this to do. I am convinced that this is the only certain way of ever making any thing out of our Aid Society. I am aware that some of our ministers object to making any effort, because they say that they cannot get their own disciplinary allowance upon their field of labor. Poor excuse this, I think, it must have its origin in selfishness. It will not cut the preacher short one cent. The fact, that a circuit or station does not pay its preachers, is no argument to prove that it has not ability. Many persons determine in their own minds how much quarterage they will pay annually. Beyond this they will not go. Circumstances with them never alter cases. No difference, whether they have one or two preachers. A married or a single one. No difference what the condition of the preacher may be, rich or poor, sick or well. All alike to them. They are like a brother I once knew, who said he would not give more than $3,00 a year to support the ministry if the church went down. Present any other benevolent object before him and he would do something. Thus it is with many others. Hold up before them the widow and the orphan, and you will squeeze out another quarter or fifty cents from them, perhaps a dollar.—There is not a circuit or station within the Pittsburgh District, but upon which there might be from ten to fifty dollars collected annually, independent of what the travelling preacher or preachers may get.

There are within the Pittsburgh District thirty-six circuits and stations: suppose each one of these should average $20,00, this would amount to $720,00 in one year—continue this effort, say for seven years and you have $5040,00,—this would yield annually upwards of three hundred dollars. I will here make a proposition to the members of the Pittsburgh Annual Conference.—It is this: I will enter into an obligation to be one of thirty or forty to make up the above named sum; allowing $20,00 to each one annually, (this sum is to go into the Aid Society,) you may include the present year, although I do not expect to receive much more than half of my disciplinary allowance, or you may commence at Conference. The deficiency in financial matters among us, has its origin in the want of efficient men to act as stewards, and not in the unwillingness or inability of our members and those who attend our preaching. We have many liberal souls among us, who never refuse in time of need. Could we but get our stewards to discharge their duty, we should hear but few complaints from our travelling ministers. Many of our members and friends have not a knowledge of the condition and wants of the preacher and his family. I have found some who said they thought the preachers were paid by the general government, others thought money was made up in England to pay preachers of the gospel in these United States. Few individuals will hand out their money without being asked directly or indirectly. I never find much difficulty in making up the President's claim upon the different fields upon which I have labored. I feel this to be my duty. I cannot beg for myself, and I suppose this to be the feeling of the brethren generally.

Brethren, let us hear from you, my proposition is before you, what say you? each one of you is as much interested as myself, do you say you are poor? so am I: do you say you have a family? so have I: do you say you are afflicted? so am I. What must become of our old and worn-out brethren if the church makes no provision for them? Yours,

W. A. PORTER.

WILLIAM BUSHFIELD.

BR. BASSETT: It becomes my painful duty to record the sudden and unexpected death of our aged and much esteemed brother WILLIAM BUSHFIELD, who departed this life June 22d, 1847, at his residence near Washington, Pennsylvania, in the 74th year of his age. The subject of this notice was born in Ireland, but emigrated to this country in 1792, and settled in Lancaster county, Pa., where he married Elizabeth, daughter of George and Jane Nelson, in 1796. In 1804, he removed to Western Pa., where he spent the remainder of his days, with the exception of a few years spent in the State of Indiana. In 1816, Elizabeth who is said to have been an excellent woman, was removed from him by death.

In 1818 he was married again to Mary Donly, with whom he lived at her former residence in peace and harmony, until separated (for a season) by death. Brother Bushfield is said to have been religiously inclined from his youth. At the age of 20 years he attached himself to the M. E. Church, of which he remained a worthy member until 1832, when being a lover of mutual rights, he left and attached himself to the Methodist Protestant Church, in which he ended his days. During the latter part of winter and early in the spring, brother Bushfield's health was very delicate, which caused him to think his days almost ended, and the time of his departure nigh at hand. But death was no terror to him. Often did he speak of his departure with pleasure and delight, for he felt assured that his home was in heaven, having Christ formed within the hope of glory. For some weeks before his death his health had improved considerably. On Sabbath before his departure, he occupied his seat in the house of worship. On Monday, engaged in his business with unusual activity. But on Tuesday morning was found (by his companion who had slept by his side) with his hands across his breast, and his eyes closed in death. In all probability he died without a struggle. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, yea saith the spirit they shall rest from their labors and their works follow them."

Sister Bushfield is left in advanced life to mourn the loss of an affectionate husband. Several sons and daughters are left to lament the loss of a kind parent, and the church is left to lament the loss of an aged and worthy member. But as the issues of life and death are in the hands of the Lord, who is too good to be unkind, and too wise to err, all who are concerned should be resigned, and with Job say, "The Lord hath given and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord." And also seek that preparation necessary to meet the deceased in the kingdom of glory.

PROSPECTUS OF THE

OHIO HARMONIST.

The HARMONIST will contain a choice selection of about 150 pages of Psalm and Hymn tunes, compiled with much care from the best authors in the United States, to which is added a supplement of Temperance songs, designed for the use of congregations, singing schools, temperance meetings, and musical associations.

It will be arranged in three parts,—parts first and third contain the seven syllables in the patent notes; the seven sounds being represented by SEVEN DIFFERENT CHARACTERS to wit:—do, ra, mi, fa, sal, la. si.

Part second contains the four syllables in the old patent notes.

It will also contain the rudiments of music on a plain and concise plan.

The object of the publishers in getting up this work, is to assist the public in singing the do, ra, mi system with much ease and accuracy, without being compelled to go through a long and tedious study of the round note system.

It also contains a Hindoo piece, accompanied with both the Hindoo and English languages.

The entire work will be executed on good paper and in a neat and substantial manner, and bound in good style, by J. A. & U. P. James, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

The work will be completed about the first of June next.

TERMS.—The OHIO HARMONIST will be delivered to subscribers at seventy-five cents per single copy, to be paid on delivery. A reasonable discount will be made to wholesale purchasers. All orders addressed to the undersigned at Washington, Guernsey county, Ohio, or Deersville, Harrison county, Ohio, or J. A. & U. P. Secret Confederations Contrary to Divine Laws.

A Secrect Confederation, is the union of ra-al beings bound together for mutual advan by secret oaths, pledge or promises, to con- l from the notice or knowledge of all other sons who are not of the fraternity, the secrets ll doings of the confederated party. Such are societies now to be very briefly reviewed.

Such confederations were always in opposition d contrariety to Divine Laws. Because, they imperium in imperio—governments within government. Such combinations in Israel uld have been rebellion against right, and au-rity, and law, and precept. The Law of God, doctrines or precepts of God, are his *reveal-*will for the government of men—of all man-d to whom this word is revealed. The cove-it that the Divine lawgiver made with the ws, including all the constitution of worship reto belonging, was open revelations, and to openly manifested; nothing to be concealed, secrets to be kept. The laws of Israel were N laws. The Almighty God was ther Sover-n. Did any among the Jews form secret con-erations, separate and independent of the Di-e authority, for any purpose—say for purely levolent purposes? This would have been an perium in imperio—not to be tolerated for one ment. To Israel, the laws of God, were per-t. Secret confederations were impossible to hful subjects of the Divine government, who re under the law of God only: He provided benevolent action.

Christianity is likewise the law of God. Chris-ns are under law to Christ. What constitues e Christianity? As manifest as is the sun at clouded mid-day, as evident is it, that Christi-ty hath no secrets in its objects or means.—hristianity is that manifestation of the MIND of d, through the Mediator, by which the Great ler of the universe seeks to win back to His vernment those who have revolted from it."

Of all the absurd contradictions this is the great-: That Christians in order to let their light ne, should walk in darkness! To demonstrate ir allegiance to the King of Kings, "He who the head of principalities and powers, the GHTNESS OF HIS FATHER'S GLORY, and the ex-ss IMAGE OF HIS PERSON, Hebrews, I, 3. The ry of all worlds, and the refulgent LUMINARY the universe, John, I, 9. The inexhaustible ntain of all the treasures of nature, grace and ry, Jer. II. 13. And the matchless, incompar-le Redeemer of all that come to Him, John VI, ."—That Christians, to demonstrate their alle-ance to Christ, their love to the church, and ir universal charity, should band themseves r mutual advantage, by secret oaths, secret dges or promises, to conceal the secrets and e doings of the christian confederated party. hristians have been, and now are, so banded—ver dreaming that they are the pledged sub-cts of an imperium in imperio, in civil govern-ents, and in the church of our Lord and Savior sus Christ.

We pray Brethren to consider these things.—ring the secret oath into the light of revelation. ring the secret doings into the light which makes anifest. Let the Sun of Righteousness—the n of the moral and intellectual universe, the lory of time and eternity, shine forth upon ur entire organizations. Are you not one and l, open professors, open confessors, of the Lord sus, walking, according to His commandment His light, and so being individually and col-ctively, at all times, and everywhere, the lights the world; in these ways, and in no others, titling yourselves to the distinctive character-tics of Christians?

Let us remember these words of our Lord: "He at is not with me, is against me; and he that thereth not with me, scattereth abroad." Is ot OPENNESS, one of the commanding distinc-ons of christianity? Did it ever require any eil to cover its purity? Any mysterious silence o proclaim it all abroad? Can it have any fel-owship with dark dissimulation, or close dis-uise? An "Angel flying through the midst of eaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach them which dwell on the earth, and to every ation, kindred, tongue, and people," is symbol-al of the openness, publicity, and objects, of r divine christianity.

We will now take a glimpse at some of the se-ret societies of heathenism; of the middle ages f Europe; and of modern times: that we may earn in what respects the light of christianity, and the darkness of these societies could have ellowship.

1. The ancient heathen mysteries: "They were celebrated in the darkness and silence of he night, with the utmost secrecy. They were requently conducted under the patronage of the most licentious and sensual deities." "It is a shame," saith the Apostle, "to speak of those things which are done of them in secret." At last they became so infamous in respect both to morality and good order, that it was found necessary to prohibit them." Hear all people! A few years ago, there was a society in the city of Philadelphia, as infamous as those of the ancient heathens. How much better is Owenism—some systems of communitism, or socialism. But mark—in nowise do we attribute aught of the kind to any christian secret society. Nothing of the kind.

2. The secret societies of the middle ages: "To be numbered among the knowing ones; the aspirant had to pass through a very solemn and appalling ceremony. Bareheaded before his inquisitors, they questioned him respecting his qualifications: and if all proved satisfactory, he knelt down, with the thumb and fore finger of his right hand upon a naked sword and halter, pronouncing after the secret court the following adjurations: I promise on the holy marriage that I will henceforth aid, and keep, and conceal the holy Fehms from wife and child, from father and mother, from sister and brother, from fire and wind, from all that the sun shines on and the rain covers, from all that is between sky and ground, especially from the man who knows the law—and will not cease so to do, for love or for fear, for gold or for silver, or for precious stones; and will strengthen this tribunal and jurisdiction with all my five senses and power &c. &c." "Dreadful punishment awaited any one who should forget his vows a nd reveal the secrets of the society."—He was cruelly tortured and murdered by inches, and hung seven feet higher than any other felon. The ostensible object of these terrible societies were to protect the right against despotic kings, feudal lords, and tyrants of all sorts—except those of the society. The English writer from whom we borrow—exclaims—"Let us be grateful to Providence that the period in which such secret societies could be of the slightest service, has forever passed away. It has been well observed that the facilities they afford, and the temptations they present for the pursuit of illegal objects, are so great as to justify all governments in suppressing them. Through the mercy of God another era has arrived. Let us therefore be the children of light, and of the day; not of night nor of darkness. Bad men are as likely to combine in the dark for their objects, as good men for theirs." Perhaps, this last remark is as applicable to these United States, as to any other country.

3. About the year 1831, there was an extraordinary proposal made, publicly, for a new religious secret society, in England, to suppress Neologism. Some one proposed that the society should be public and open, and consist of such christians as might find it to be their duty to join it. This imprudent zeal was checked by the information that "a too general invitation to join in the proposed work would defeat its object"—which if the work were good and would bear the light, seemed an extraordinary objection. For why not openly enlist as many persons a possible on the side of truth.

4. Secret orders—their absurdities: I object to secret orders, says one, because of the childish buffoonery of their appearance. He immediately asks, "How do the members appear before the public? "He seems to be well informed, and answers his own questions:" In the most antic position and ridiculous dresses.—If the reader proceed he will learn how these matters are conducted in England. "Leading the van, you see a couple of men dressed in bear skins, with drawn swords in hand, whose ferocious and warlike aspect might inspire terror; but when you notice how strongly their appearance contrasts with the sheepishness of their countenances, you are provoked to laughter. One man, sweating beneath his load, carries a large flag which is waving in the breeze; another with due gravity carries a trowel, as if about to do some mason's work; another bears a woodman's axe, as if about to fell some trees; another on whose shoulders a white surplice is thrown, carries an open Bible before him—as if the openness of the Book enjoined secret orders, and the sacredness of the Book sanctioned such absurdities. Some ride on horses, and carry bows and arrows at arms length; others bear green branches, and images in green bowers. In general, all are curiously decked in ribbons of many colors, and haberdashery of different descriptions, so that to a sober mind their appearance is in the highest degree grotesque." As it can offend no one to read the above discriptions, of some occurrences in England, neither will a reflection of the writer be unpleasant. We can afford to laugh at absurdities in the mother country—indeed it is rather a duty, than otherwise, to laugh for the good of others, though they may never hear of our good intentions. The reflection alluded to is this: "Now a child or a Merry Andrew, may dress himself up in many colors; and thus dressed, exhibit himself to public gaze, but a man of reading, and reflection, and religion, cannot act in this manner; therefore, the members of Secret Orders, who occasionally parade our streets, cannot be men of reading, reflection, and of religion, but large children or Merry Andrews." Granting the premise conclusion seems to be natural—as natural as the question: "When will men be ashamed of such childish exhibitions?"

Our Englishman has another objection to the secret orders in his country. "Because this mode of conducting benefit societies, is in the highest degree expensive." And then proceeds to speak of pounds and shillings. Our currency is in dollars and cents. "An individual must spend several shillings, in some cases pounds, in fitting himself up with the necessary trappings for the public exhibition of the secret order. The white leather aprons, ribbons, scarfs, red coats, bear skins, green jackets, bows, arrows, swords, gloves, masks, claymores, transparencies, flags, and other gewgaw toys and childish fooleries, too numerous to mention, must cost a very considerable sum, and all this is a superfluous expense." Better would it be to bestow these expenses on the poor who do not belong to the order—and this the order could well afford to do, as its own members do not need the funds by as much as these expenses are!

We are very glad that we have met with this English writer, as it is of great advantage, sometimes, to have distant views—even though they reach far ahead even to children's children for whom every father and mother should feel no little concern.

Well, our Englishman, whom we take to be a Methodist of the New Connexion, objects to these secret orders, "because of the absurdities of their initiatory rites." Is he a traitor? He is a plain spoken man. "What is the ultimate object of a benefit society? To assist each other in time of need, i. e. in times of sickness, and in cases of interments. To become a member of such society, one would think it enough to give in one's name, age, residence, and pay the entrance fee; but, No—to become a member of a secret—order—benefit society, you must go through the most degrading, childish, and silly, ceremonies. Perhaps the process of initiation may vary a little in the several lodges, but something like the following is the practice in all. Before the candidate for brotherhood is led into the room, a cloth is tied over his eyes, he is hoodwinked. If he could see what was before him, the symbolical character of the doings would not appear, and the farce would be utterly spoiled. Now, I ask any rational being, is not this a bad omen to begin with—this darkness? And is it not a degradation for a free-born Englishman, whose ancestors scorned with their eyes open, to have their free-born toes dragooned even into a wooden shoe? One would naturally suppose that the use of a free-born Englishman's eyes ought never to be dispensed with in any intercourse with his fellow creatures, by day, or by night. I have no objection to hoodwinking a sheep, or an ox, when you intend to lead it to the slaughter house; but to hoodwink a being formed in the image of God when you have not any wicked or silly design upon him, seems to be a work of supererogation and folly. Narrative.

An Interesting Narrative.

Two young men, the children of pious and wealthy parents, felt themselves exceedingly displeased at being constantly refused the family carriage on the Lord's day. It was in vain they urged their confinement during the week, as a sufficient reason why they should be thus indulged on the Sunday. It was the father's settled rule, that the authority which commanded him to rest, included also his servants and cattle; he therefore turned a deaf ear to their entreaties and remonstrances. In their madness or in their folly, they determined to resent this refusal, by leaving their situations and going to sea. Intelligence of this step was transmitted to the Rev. John Griffin, of Portsea, and he was requested to make diligent inquiry, and on finding them, to use every possible means to induce them to return home. After some search he found them in a rendezvous house, and introducing himself, he stated his business and urged their return. He however, urged in vain; for bent upon the fulfillment of their design, they thanked him for his advice, but determined to reject it. Among other reasons for their return, he urged the feelings of their parents, and especially those of their mother. "Think," said the good man, "what must your mother's situation be, after years of anxious watching and fervent prayer; after looking forward to this time, when in your society and in your welfare she hoped to meet a rich reward for all that she has suffered on your account: yet in one moment, and by one imprudent step, she finds you plunged into misery, the depths of which you cannot conceive of, and herself the subject of a wretchedness she has never deserved at your hands." In the heart of the youngest, there was a sense of gratitude, which answered to this appeal; and bursting into tears, he expressed his sorrow for his conduct, and his willingness to return. Still, the eldest remained obdurate. Neither arguments persuaded him, nor warnings alarmed him. The carriage had been repeatedly refused; he had made up his mind to go to sea, and to sea he would go. "Then," said Mr. Griffin, "come with me to my house; I will get you a ship, and you shall go out as a man and a gentleman." This he declined, assigning as a reason, that it would make his parents feel, to have it said their son was gone as a common sailor; as a common sailor, therefore, he would go. "Is that your disposition?" was the reply. "Then, young man, go," said Mr. Griffin, "and while I say, God go with you, be sure your sin will find you out, and for it God will bring you into judgment." With reluctance, they left him; the younger son was restored to his parent, while all traces of the elder one were lost, and he was mourned for, as one dead.

After the lapse of a considerable time, a loud knocking was heard at Mr. Griffin's door. This was early in the morning. On the servant's going down to open the door, she found a waterman, who wished immediately to see her master. Mr. Griffin soon appeared, and was informed that a young man under sentence of death, and about to be executed on board one of the ships in the harbor, had expressed an earnest desire to see him, urging, among other reasons, that he could not die happy unless he did. A short time found the minister of religion on board the ship, when the prisoner, manacled and guarded, was introduced to him, to whom he said, "My poor friend, I feel for your condition, but as I am a stranger to you, may I ask why you have sent for me? it may be that you have heard me preach at Portsea." "Never, sir. Do you not know me?" "I do not." "Do you not remember the two young men whom you, some years since, urged to return to their parents, and to their duty?" "I do! I do remember it; and remember that you were one of them." "I have sent, then, for you to take my last farewell of you in this world, and to bless you for your efforts to restore me to a sense of my duty. Would to God that I had taken your advice; but it is now too late. My sin has found me out, and for it God has brought me into judgment. One, and but one consolation remains; I refused the offer of going to your house until I could be provided for, assigning as a reason, that it would make my parents feel to have it said their son was a common sailor. A little reflection showed me the cruelty of this determination; I assumed another name, under which, I entered myself; and my chief consolation is, that I shall die unpitied and unknown."

What the feelings of Mr. Griffin were, at this sad discovery, may be more easily conceived than described. He spent some time with him in prayer, and offered him that advice which was best suited to his unhappy case. The prisoner was again placed in confinement, and Mr. Griffin remained with the officer who was then on duty. "Can nothing be done for this poor young man?" was one of the first inquiries made after the prisoner was widrawn. "I fear not," replied the officer; "the lords of the admiralty have determined to make an example of the first offender in this particular crime. He, unfortunately is that offender; and we hourly expect the warrant for his execution." Mr. Griffin determined immediately to go up to London, and, in humble dependence upon the Lord, to make every effort to save the criminal's life, or to obtain a commutation of the sentence. It was his lot, on the day of his arrival in the metropolis, to obtain an interview with one of the lords of the admiralty, to whom he stated the respectability of the young man's connexions, his bitter and unfeigned regret for the crime which had forfeited his life; and, with that earnestness which the value of life is calculated to excite, ventured to ask, if it was possible to spare him. To his regret, he was informed that the warrant for his execution had been that morning signed, and was on its way to the officer, whose melancholy duty it was to see it executed. With compassion the nobleman said, "Go back, sir, and prepare him for the worst. I cannot tell what is to be done; but we are shortly to meet his Majesty in council, and all that you have urged shall be then stated; may it prove successful." Mr. Griffin returned, but discovered that the morning of his reaching home was the time appointed for the young man's execution. Joy, and fear, and anxiety by turns, possessed his mind, as, within a few minutes after his arrival, came a pardon, accompanied with the most earnest request to go immediately on board, lest the sentence of the law should be executed before he should reach the ship.

Upon the issues of a moment now rested the life of a fellow-creature, and perhaps the salvation of an immortal soul. The minister reached the harbor, and saw the yellow flag, the signal of death, flying, the rigging manned, and, for aught he knew to the contrary, the object of his solicitude at the last moment of his mortal existence. He reached the ship's side, and saw an aged man leaving it, whose sighs, and groans, and tears, proclaimed a heart bursting with grief, and a soul deeper in misery than the waters he was upon.—It was the prisoner's father! Under the assumed name, he had discovered his wretched son, and had been to take his last farewell of him.—Yes, it was his father who had brought him up in the fear of the Lord; who in his earliest days had led him to the house of God; and who, when lost, had often inquired in prayer, "Lord, where is my child?" Fearfully was he answered; he had found him, but it was to part, never to meet in this world again. Such, at least, must have been his conclusion in that moment, when, having torn himself from the embrace of his son, he was leaving the ship. The rest is told in a few words: with Mr. Griffin he re-entered the vessel at the moment when the prisoner, pinioned for execution, was advancing toward the fatal spot, when he was to be summoned into the presence of God. A moment found him in the embrace, not of death, but of his father; his immediate liberation followed the knowledge of his pardon; and a few days restored the wanderer to the bosom of his family.—James' Young Man from Home.

Educational.

Written for the Western Recorder.

CIRCULAR,

To the Friends of Popular Education in the United States.

You have already been apprized, through the public press, of the existence of an association in the State of Ohio, for the promotion of Popular Education, and of the acceptance by the undersigned, of an invitation to act as its agent. Having been engaged in that service for the last six months, he deems it appropriate to lay before you the results, thus far, of his labors, together with an account of the origin, purpose and present condition of the enterprize in which he is engaged.

About two years ago, six gentlemen—five of them residents of Cincinnati, Ohio,—associated together by the name of "The Central Committee for promoting National Education." The great destitution of many parts of the country, in regard to popular education,—fearfully increasing with the unprecedented increase of population, especially in the new settlements—was the motive of the movement. The supplying, as far as practicable, the destitute children of the nation with intellectual and moral training, through competent and well qualified teachers, was its object.

The enterprise embraces two branches of labor. They are, 1st, To explore the more destitute portions of the country, ascertain their wants in regard to well qualified teachers, and secure appropriate arrangements for their reception and employment. 2d., To find competent teachers, and obtain, through the liberality of the friends of education, the means of preparing, and sending them to places which may be provided, and sustaining the agencies necessary to carry forward the whole movement.

The undersigned has been engaged, for the last six months, in both these fields of labor, commencing with the last, by visiting some of the cities at the East, for the purpose of explaining the character and objects of the enterprise, and raising funds to commence its operations, and thence proceeding to the West, where, for obvious reasons, arising from the rapidity of its increase, and the comparative sparseness of its population, the necessity for special efforts in regard to education, is the most urgent and pressing.

In the Eastern field of his labor, the undersigned was greatly encouraged by the appreciation, everywhere manifested, of the importance of the movement, and unequivocal indications—of which substantial earnests were given, of a disposition to contribute liberally to its support, when the fields of want should have been explored, and the extent of the required aid should be better understood.

In the Western field there has been found equal encouragement in the manifested conviction of men of intelligence, in every part of which the undesigned has traversed, of the want of special efforts to extend to the masses the benefits of education, and of the adaptedness of the organization in question, to render important aid in accomplishing that object.

In his progress through the West—or more properly, the North West, the undersiged has been indulged the privilege of addressing assemblies, on the subject of his mission, in Columbus and Cleveland, Ohio,—Indianapolis and Tarre Haute, Indiana,—Springfield and Chicago, Illinois,—Burlington, Iowa,—Milwaukie in Wisconsin, and Kalamazoo and Detroit, in Michigan—in four of which places he had opportunies of meeting the legislatures of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Iowa, and gaining, to some extent, the ears of the constituted guardians of the interests of education in those States. For the uniform courtesy and kindness with which he has been received by men of all political parties, and all religious denomiuations, the undersigned cannot refrain from expressing his most grateful acknowlments.

The "Central Committee" upon whose invitation the undersigned entered on his agency, was an informal association, unsuited, from the smallness of its number, and its want of accustomed organization under a Constitution, to inspire the necessary public confidence. Of this, none were more sensible than the Committee themselves; and accordingly a re-organization, under a more appropriate name, and with an increased number, has been effected, upon the basis of the Constitution which is hereunto annexed;--to which are appended the names of the members of the Board, and of the officers elected under its Constitution.

It will be perceived that the members of the Board are all citizens of the State of Ohio, and that the Executive Committee are residents of Cleveland, in that State, where it is contemplated that the operations of the Board will, for the present, be centralized. The continued location of the Board in the State of Ohio, where it originated, will, it is not doubted appropriate—standing, as that State does, in a position to understand and appreciate the wants of the GREAT VALLEY—of which she forms a part—and to inspire, therefore, the greater confidence that an enterprise under the supervision of some of her most distinguished citizens, will be conducted with a wide adaptation to those wants.

In the constitution of the Board, there are associated, it will be perceived by those acquainted with their characters, gentlemen of several religious denominations—an association deemed important, as well for its happy influence in cherishing the growing spirit of Christian Union, as to secure the movement from all suspicion that it will be made an instrument of proselyting to the creed of any particular sect. Instead of directing it to this end, the Board will, besides selecting teachers of various, though not essentially conflicting denominations, endeavor, in the instructions which shall be given them, to carry out the 6th article of the Constitution, in its true spirit; making the Bible and nothing but the Bible, the basis of the moral training which it regards as an indispensable part of a true and proper education.

The re-organization of the Board was effected on the 7th of April. Since that time the undersigned has visited Michigan, Northern Illinois, and Wisconsin, and in pursuance of the 5th article of the Constitution, has aided in forming associations auxiliary to the Board, in the cities of Detroit, Chicago, and Milwaukie. He is happy to say that the character of the Executive Committees of these associations is such, as to give assurance that the purpose, as declared in their constitutions, "co-operate with the Board in advancing the cause of popular education" in the States where they are respectively formed will be faithfully executed. The hope is entertained that the associations will, through their Executive Committees, become efficient anxiliaries to the Board, by taking measures, in accordance with the purpose expressed in their constitutions, to "ascertain the extent of the want of competent teachers of schools of various grades" in their respective States, "and securing the necessary arrangements for the reception and employment of such teachers as may be selected for employment under the patronage of the Board." It is intended to effect the formation of a similar auxiliary association for the State of Ohio.

Previous to the re-organization of the Board, the undersigned had effected temporary organizations for a purpose similar to the above, at Indianapolis, in Indiana, and Burlington, Iowa, with the expectation that they would be succeeded, as they probably will be, by associations of a more permanent character.—At Springfield, Illinois, during the session of the Legislature at that place, a special meeting of the State Education Society was held, for the purpose of co-operation with the Board, and a resolution was adopted to that effect, followed by an instruction to the Executive Committee of the Society to take measures to ascertain the want of teachers in the State of Illinois, and supply that want as far as practicable, through the agency of the Board.

In the re-organization of the Board, and the establishment of the auxiliary associations referred to, a foundation, it is believed, has been laid for the accomplishment of some good—how much, will depend upon the energy with which the future operations of the Board, and of the auxiliary associations shall be conducted. Patient, persevering labor, is the indispensible condition to the accomplishment of this, as it is of every other good.

For the purpose of beginning to supply the demand for teachers, nearly forty ladies have been assembled at Albany, N. Y., where they are in a course of a month's preparatory training, embracing the following particulars.

1. Visiting the Normal School, and its model or experimental school, daily, to witness the methods of instruction there.

2. A course of lectures by MR. PAGE, the Principal of Normal School—given gratuituously—on the details of teaching the primary branches.

3. A course of lectures on History, with reference to its influence on the present character and condition of mankind.

4. A course of instruction on Physiology, with special reference to the preservation of the health of teachers.

5. A course of instruction in Calisthenics.

6. Instructions on the best mode of teaching composition with exercises.

7. Lectures by Miss Beecher, in reference to the peculiarities of Western Society and modes of organizing and conducting different schools in different places; and embracing various other topics of advice and information.

Three other ladies are associated with Miss Beecher in the preparatory training.

The advantage of daily visiting the Normal school, and of the course of lectures by its Principal, can be appreciated by those only who have witnessed the excellent arrangement of that school, and the eminent ability with which every department of it is conducted.

So important do the Board consider the course of preparatory training referred to, that it is their intention to make arrangements to secure such a preparation, gratuitously, to every woman who shall be sent out as a teacher under their patronage.

The constitution of the Board, it will be perceived, does not limit it to one sex in the selection of teachers;—nor will it, in the practical execution of its trust, be thus limited. Yet it is fully persuaded that, in the peculiar qualifications needed for the successful instruction and government of children of both sexes, up to a very advanced period, if not throughout the entire course of common school instruction, women are decidedly superior to men—especially in the moral training, besides its importance in the matter of school government, constitutes an essential and indispensible part of a proper education. The comparative abundance of female teachers, and the economy of employing them, furnishes a strong additional reason for looking, as the Board does, mainly to that source for a supply of the teachers to be employed under its patronage.

It is intended to secure, as far as practicable, in the teachers to be employed, the qualifications of competent knowledge, aptnesss to teach, patience, good sense, and Christian benevolence.

Most of the women who shall be employed will, probably, be in a condition to require pecuniary aid to enable them to reach their places of teaching. This aid it is intended to furnish when necessary; and for this purpose, an appeal is made to the liberality of the friends of education throughout the country. The gifts which that liberality may prompt—and it is hoped they will be neither few nor small—may be transmitted either to the undersigned, or to THOMAS W. OLCOTT. ESQ., of Albany, N. Y., Treasurer of the Board.

Should the persons to whom aid may be thus extended, become able to refund the amount—of which ability they will be left to be the sole judges—it will be received, without interest, to be again used in extending like aid to others.

One hundred dollars, it has been estimated, would be sufficient to defray the expense of the short preparatory training, and the sending to her place of destination of each teacher, including the expense of the agencies necessary to give vitality and energy to the general movement. Should a large number of teachers be sent, the expense of agencies might not be, thereby, proportionally increased, a sum less than the above would probably secure the preparation and location of a teacher.

Applications of ladies desiring to be employed as teachers, and applications for female teachers, may be made, until otherwise directed, to Miss CATHARINE E. BEECHER, at Albany, N. Y., until the first of June next, and after that time at Bratleboro, Vermont.

It is the intention of the Board to furnish female teachers for all grades of schools that may be desired.

Applications from ladies desiring to teach, should state the age, residence, and religious denomination of the applicant, and be accompanied by a statement from some reliable source, in reference to the qualifications stated above as intended to be secured in teachers, together with the amount of education, and past history of the applicant.

Applications for female teachers should state the township and county where the teacher is wanted—the branches in which, and the number of months in the year during which, instruction will be expected—the rate of compensation; the family to which the teacher may resort on reaching the place of her destination, with the expectation of finding a temporary home; and the denomination, or denominations of Christians having an organized church or churches in the immediate vicinity. The teachers will be expected to engage in the instruction of Sabbath Schools where they are organized, and to form them where they are not.

Applications from gentlemen who may wish to find employment in Academies or High Schools, and applications for such teachers, will be received. They may be addressed to the undersigned at Middlebury, Vermont, until the first of October next, and after that time, at Cleveland, in the State of Ohio. They should, respectively, embrace the particulars above referred to, as necessary to accompany applications, for, and from, female teachers.

As the greatest difficulty involved in this enterprise, is that of making the necessary arrangements for getting up and sustaining schools, and as the Rev. Clergy—everywhere the friends of education—are in a condition to see and feel the educational wants around them, they are respectfully, but earnestly invited to endeavor to ascertain whether school instructors are not needed in their respective neighborhoods, and to take measeres to effect such arrangements as shall justify them in making application for teachers to the Board, in the manner above suggested. If their peculiar duties will not permit them to devote the necessary attention to the details of such a service, they will be able, doubtless, to enlist the efforts of energetic laymen in the work. Will they not, everywhere, be up and doing in this acceptable and very important service?

The primary purpose of the Board is to transfer teachers from those parts of the country where they are most abundant, and where educational improvements have elevated the standard of teaching, to places where they are most needed. But those who see in this movement nothing but the mere sending of a few teachers, or even hundreds of teachers, to occupy as many schools, will form but a very inadequate conception of its real scope and bearing. The influence of such a movement on the general interests of education, is a consequence which cannot escape the attention of the intelligent and observing. The great want in those portions of the country which the undersigned has visited, is that of a just appreciation among the masses, of the value and importance of education. Every well qualified teacher sent to a destitute place will exert more influence in favor of the cause of education, by the practical illustration of the effects of good teaching, than could be done by the most eloquent lecturer, without such illustration. Every such teacher, devoted to the employment, in the true spirit of it, will become a centre of invaluable influence. Every really good school will be like a city set upon a hill; its light will be seen and its influence felt, in every direction. This influence the friends of education in the West need to aid them in their laudable labors to advance the cause—labors which will be unavailing without the strong public sentiment which the well directed efforts of the Board and the teachers it may supply, will, it is hoped, aid in creating and sustaining.

The Board of National Popular Education do not stand in the position of attempting to make one portion of the country the instructors of another; but while it hopes to give, directly, to thousands of children and youth the benefits of an education they would not otherwise receive, it expands its views to the great purpose of aiding to transfer, through good instructors, the educational improvements of every part of the country to every other part that may be destitute of them, to the end that the friends of education, who are struggling under the embarrassments incident to new and sparsely settled States and Territories, may be aided in their efforts at educational improvement. One of the greatest wants of the West, in regard to education, is that of well qualified instructors. There are, indeed, portions of it where there are good instructors and good schools, and where improvements, in this respect, are in a state of very encouraging progress, through teacher's associations and teacher's institutes. But these portions are small, compared with the great whole. To encourage and extend these efforts at improvement, by furnishing teachers of a high order of talent and acquirement to take charge of Seminaries where, among other things, teachers may be trained to their work, and thus the West be aided in supplying, as it must and finally will supply, its own teachers from among its own people, is a leading and very important object of the Board.

There are many noble minds at the West, intensely anxious for its educational improvement; and the beginnings of a favorable movement there are visible. But there are difficulties to be encountered of no ordinary magnitude—difficulties not to be met with at the East—where, even with all the advantages of a homogeneous and dense population, and well established institutions, improvements in education have advanced but slowly. Who will not rejoice in any opportunity to aid, though it may be but a little, in overcoming these difficulties,—blessing the West, and through it, blessing the whole country, whose destinies it is so soon to control.

In the plan whose origin, purpose and progress, hitherto the undersigned has thus sketched, he hopes the benevolent and patriotic, both at the East and the West, will see enough to inspire their confidence and enlist their hearty co-operation. The proper education of the millions of children in our country, who are rapidly passing beyond the period of instruction, to become men and women and fathers and mothers, is an object whose importance it is scarcely possible to exaggerate. There are in the United States about four millions of children between the ages of 5 and 15, not including the Slaves. They are all in the process of forming their intellectual and moral characters for life—characters in which are involved not only their own individual destinies, but the destiny of the nation whose institutions, civil and religious, are soon to be committed to their hands. It may be safely affirmed, from all the data of the last census, and other means of information, that nearly, if not quite, one half of these children are destitute of school instruction; while of those who have any benefit of schools, a large portion enjoy the benefit but a very small portion of each year.

What is to be done with these alarming destitutions? Do they demand no special effort?—Shall the millions of ignorant children be left ignorant and uninstructed? or shall they be blessed with good schools, where their impressible minds and hearts shall be trained to knowledge and virtue? Greater questions cannot be presented to the mind of the Patriot and Christian than these. The political questions which absorb and distract the minds of men, and periodically rack, as by convulsions, the entire country, sink into insignificance by the side of them. Not that these questions are absolutely unimportant, but only relatively so to this great interest. The political questions which agitate the nation are important; but it will be in vain that, in any given contest they are decided right, unless there is a state of intelligence and moral principle pervading the masses, that shall make them stay right.

That the tendencies in all the political parties are downward, and that the actual progress will be downward, without the united, vigorous and availing efforts of the wise and good of all parties, cannot but be obvious to all. What is to be the character of the next generation, is a question of more importance than what is to be the policy of the next administration,—only as that policy may influence the formation of that character. Without universal education—the education that shall train the intellect to sound, manly, independent thought, and the Conscience and Heart upon the model of the Word of God, the hope of sustaining our free institutions will be like the hope of sustaining a house upon the sand amidst the sweeping deluge of an ocean tempest.

The undersigned ventures to hope that the enterprise in which he is engaged, will command the confidence of the friends of education throughout the entire country. Their counsels, their prayers, their efforts, and their money he trusts will all become ready ministers of good to it, and through it to the millions it is intended to bless.

WILLIAM SLADE,
General Agent, Board of National Popular Education, Middlebury, Vt., May 15, 1847.

P. S.—The conductors of the Religious and Political Press, both East and West, are respectfully requested to publish this address, with the constitution and list of officers which follow.

The Michigan Rail-road Company are building at Detroit a depot, or freight ware-house,—which will be 800 feet long and 400 feet wide—much the largest building in the country. It will store 200,000 bbls. of flour, and 200,000 bushels of wheat. But the great city of New York cannot afford a depot to her only Rail-road.

The Hudson River Rail-road Company having completed the surveys and selected the route as far up as West point, proposed to "break ground at an early day, of which due notice will be given. Various difficulties have been encountered by the company in procuring the route of way along the margin of the river, but these have been overcome and we hope soon to hear of the rapid prosecution of the work.

MUSKINGUM DISTRICT.

M'Connellsville, July 13, 1847.

Dear Br. Bassett: As our labors on this circuit are drawing to a close for the present year, it may not be improper for us to give to our worthy President, and the Church generally a brief and condensed statement of the work of God among us the present year. For notwithstanding our success has not been as great as we desired it to have been, yet we feel to praise the Lord of the harvest for the few ripe sheaves that have been gathered in.

The winter months were principally occupied by us, in holding protracted meetings, at the most of which, souls were hopefully converted, and small accessions made to the Church.

In M'Connellsville we held a meeting of upwards of three weeks' continuance; truly this was a hard fought battle between light and darkness,—the Church and infidelity,—Satan and Immanuel. But victory perched upon the cross, and some 15 or 16 were received on probation, the most of whom, were, subsequently received in full communion.

At Blue Rock Chapel, at the close of a 4 days' meeting 5 gave us their names, and covenanted with us to go to heaven.

At Bethel we were favored with the presence of the Lord and that to bless. We continued our meetings about 10 days, and at the close we received 12 on probation. This was a precious season, backsliders were reclaimed, and the Church was enlarged. There were some few things connected with this season of refreshing which we would be glad to refer to, had we time, and space.

We held meetings of a protracted character in other societies; good was done and souls saved, (we charitably hope) at each.

It will be recollected that, at the last session of the Annual Conference, a society embracing 75 members as reported, was removed from this circuit and attached to Morganville circuit. This action of the Conference was opposed by a majority of the members of the society, and they not being pleased with the new arrangement, remonstrated against it to the preacher in charge, and the whole matter was, by him, subsequently laid before the Quarterly Conference of Morganville circuit, and upon considerations by them adopted, the society was dropt.

This society made application to the Pisgah circuit Quarterly Conference for reception, and was received back into the circuit, and they have received preaching from us since that time.

When the society was received by us, we deemed it important to reorganize, as the society appeared in a disorganized state. This having been done, it was ascertained that 23 out of 75 considered themselves members of the Church. Since the new organization we have added a number of others who never held any connection with our societies previously, and so far as we are able to judge, the society is in a healthy, and prosperous condition.

We have received between 50 and 60 into our communion this year, and nevertheless doubt whether we shall be able to return as many as were reported the last year.

Death has been actively at work, and some of our best members have fallen by his stroke, while others for immoral and unchristian conduct have been expelled from the communion of the Church. We have had pleasure and sorrow mingled together. Deep anxiety and heavenly consolation have been ours the present year. Sickness, with health has fallen to our lot. But these are of God and designed for our good, and when we consider that the Savior wore a crown of thorns that we might wear a crown of glory, we would not rebel, but cheerfully submit to his rod, saying "not my will, but thy will, O God, be done."

Upon the whole, this year has been in many respects truly pleasant to me, having been, (and this I regard as no mean blessing) associated with a good and dear brother in labor and suffering, with whom to part it will give me no small degree of pain. An agreeable companion is desirable in every situation in life, but in no relation is opposition, more unwelcome, than from a gospel laborer. I shall long cherish in my recollection, the cheerful, faithful, and untiring labors of my present colleague, while I shall never forget the man whose amiable temper, cheerful disposition, and manly and christian deportment has won the affection of all who know him.

This circuit embraces in her membership some of the precious of the earth, brothers and sisters beloved, who are willing to labor, and make any reasonable sacrifice for the prosperity and advancement of the cause of God. May the Divinely GOOD and GREAT prosper them in every good word, and work. And may God hasten the time when swords shall be beaten into ploughshares, and spears into pruning hooks, and the nations of the earth shall learn war no more.

O when will Christ's word be heeded, "He that taketh the sword shall perish with the sword."—Ride on in thy greatness thou conquering Savior, and hasten the time when the "earth shall be filled with thy glory and thy praise," and when "all shall know Thee from the least to the greatest."

JAMES M. PIPER.

NORTH ILLINOIS DISTRICT.

Princeton, Ill., June 29th, 1847.

Br. Bassett: Having to write to you on business I embrace the opportunity of saying a few words about my Master and His cause in this region, which if you please you may give a place in the Recorder. This Conference year (commencing about the first of October, 1846,) Br. Jacob Fowler and myself have been laboring on Bureau and Lafayette Cts. When we commenced, prospects were gloomy. We now have reason to be encouraged. The Good Being has visited us graciously. We have organised two new societies: One of twelve—the other upwards of twenty members. Important accessions have been made to three other classes. Hence we have reason to thank God and take courage. In short, believers have become more spiritual, backsliders have come home, and sinners have been convicted, humbled, and converted. To God be all the glory. There is yet a great work to be done. We need more devoted, spiritual ministers in the field. Brethren pray for us.

Yours, &c., DANIEL BAGLEY.

From the Watchman of the Valley.

The Sixth Street Congregational Church, (Cincinnati,)

Have purchased a lot, we understand, for a new church edifice, near the corner of Ninth and Vine streets, fronting on Vine. The location is a beautiful one; the lot is seventy-five feet front and ninety-three deep. If such are to be the dimensions of the house, and its style of architecture correspond with the magnitude, (as it is expected it will,) the architectural glory of the latter house will greatly exceed that of the former. Church-worship is a besetting sin with city Christians, against which we hope our brethren of the Sixth church will guard their hearts. There is more true glory in getting out and polishing lively stones for God's temple above, than in adorning an earthly temple. Here is a race for our churches—if they desire to outvie each other in glory—to see who will finish, out of materials here prepared, the most splendid temple in heaven.—The Sixth church have contributed liberally to this object, in days past, though they have not been repaid with earthly aggrandizement for it. If the latter is the reward that churches seek for, they may have it, with due care and effort.—But how much better to build a glorious temple in heaven, and be instrumental in gathering a large congregation there!—a temple never to be demolished, and a congregation never to break up. It is natural, and too common, we fear, to desire revivals of religion, that we may thus add to the strength and numerical aggrandizement of our churches. O how unworthy an object! how displeasing to Christ! how unlike him! Desire then rather that God may be glorified, and that His house may be filled, whether our own is left full or empty. Be patient, brethren, work for God rather than yourselves, and what you reap not now of glorious fruits, you will find stored up in heaven for you—a crown of glory that fadeth not away. We say again, be ambitious to see who will build the most splendid temple of polished stones in that upper world.

WESTERN REGORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, JULY 22, 1847.

☞ Postscript.—As our paper was about going to press, we received intelligence through the Courier, (by telegraph from New York) that the steamship Britannia had arrived at Boston, bringing information of a still further decline in flour and meal at Liverpool, caused by the scarcity of money, the promise of abundant harvest, and the immense arrivals. No other news worth Telegraphing.

Zanesville Courier.—Our enterprising neighbor, has determined to commence a daily issue, so soon as his arrangements can be effected, after the completion of the Telegraph. The terms of the Daily Courier will be $5 per annum in advance. We wish it success. Mr. Lyman is a most industrious and throughgoing man, and should have his reward. Of course we speak without reference to the political positions of the Courier, as ours is a neutral one.—Zanesville should have a daily paper.

Pittsburgh Conference, M. E. Church.—This large ecclesiastical body lately held its session in Wellsburgh, Va. The P. C. Advocate of last week gives the appointments, and proceedings in part, Bishop Janes presided. The funeral sermon of the late Rev. Thornton Fleming, 'the patriarch of the Conference,' was preached by Rev. Joshua Monroe, after which the Conference partook of the Lord's Supper. Br. Hunter states that the session was one of the most pleasant, he ever attended. The body was nearly unanimous in declining the proposition to divide at present, thinking it not necessary. It is stated as matter of thankfulness, that there have been a few hundred increase the past year. The Delegates elected to attend the General Conference, are, R. Hopkins, S. Elliott, W. Kenney, J. J. Swayze, C. Cooke, J. Drummond, J. Spencer, J. Monroe. Reserve Delegates, W. Hunter, S. E. Babcock. Next session of the Conference, will be held at Wheeling, Va. We transfer to our columns the list of appointments.

The Ohio Conference, at Cincinnati, O., Sept. 15, 1847.

The Indiana Conference, at Johnson's Meeting House, 7 miles west of Shelbyville c. h., Indiana, Sept. 29, 1847.

The Wabash Conference, in Frankfort Circuit, Clinton co., Ia., Oct. 13, 1847.

The Michigan and North Illinois Conferences, have not announced the time and place of their next sessions. Wish we had this information, and other statistics of those Conferences.

Grand Sons of Temperance.—This is the name assumed by a band of Youth in Zanesville, who are united in a pledge, which reads as follows:

"No Tobacco—no profanity—no gambling—no alcohol—and no conduct that would be unbecoming a gentleman."

The Order was instituted on the fourth of July, one year ago. Mr. N. A. Gray, one of the teachers of the Zanesville High School, originated this association. By donations of ladies, the 'Grand Sons' have been enabled to furnish themselves with regalia. It is said they have no secret, save a pass word which is changed monthly, to avoid imposition by bad boys.

The association, having reached the number of Three Hundred, celebrated its first anniversary on Saturday, 3d inst. Nearly that number of boys, from the ages of six to fourteen years, neatly uniformed, furnished with badges and regalia, met on the morning of the 3d, on the green before the Academy, where three banners were presented by as many young misses, with pertinent remarks, which were responded to by the 'Grand Chief.' After this a procession was formed, which marched down Main Street, to the Court House, preceded by a band of music. They formed around the public fountain, and received from it a refreshing drink, singing one of the Songs of their Order. Then marching through several streets, the procession repaired to a grove, where refreshments were furnished, and suitable exercises were had. Rev. Messrs. Wood and Miley addressed the assembly. The occasion was most interesting, and a great number of spectators attended.

We are gratified to learn that the formation of this interesting and noble band of boys, has done much good, in reforming many who had already become addicted to the use of tobacco, or profane language, and in not a few instances, to the use of alcohol.

Correspondents.—Several articles are on hand respecting secret societies. But if the controversy is to be all on one side, we think it ought to close, when we have disposed of what we have. Our corresponpent W. S. S. says he is done.

The Chicago Convention.—The great River and Harbor Convention, assembled under a large pavilion prepared for the occasion, at 12 o'clock on the 5th inst. Eighteen of the States were there represented by some ten thousand of their Citizens. Edward Bates of Missouri was chosen President. Sixteen vice Presidents were appointed from as many different states. The meeting is said to have been very large and enthusiastic, hotels, private houses, and even Steamboats crowded with boarders. Full thirty editors of newspapers were present, amongst whom, Boston, N. Y., Albany Buffalo, Cleveland, St. Louis, and Cincinnati were represented. Gov. Bebb of Ohio was one of the Vice Presidents, and Senator Corwin was one of the chief speakers. Hereafter, we will give some account of the action of this Convention.

American Pulpit.—No. 2, of this excellent work is received. It contains a sermon delivered on a recent day of Humiliation in London, by Rev. Baptist W. Noel, M. A., and a sermon delived before an Association of Clergymen at Oxford, Mass., by Rev. A. A. Cook, of the M. E. Church. Also a useful ministerial miscellany. Our readers know that we have again and again spoken in commendation of this work. Send for it, to Samuel Chism, publisher, Worcester, Mass. Only $1 per year in advance.

Detestable.—The body of Mr. D. A. Fulson, of Erie, Pa. who perished when the Chesepake went down, was afterwards recovered, and his friends were present to take charge of it. But the Coroner interposed, and claimed a legal right to make money out of the poor bereaved family, by holding an inquest over the body, to ascertain how a man drowned in a sinking steamboat came to his death! He did so, and charged a fee of $35,62, and paid himself $35 out of the pocket of the drowned man, every cent found on his person, the balance being paid by his friends. So says the Cincinnati Protestant. This case of extortion is aggravated by the fact that the family were entirely destitute, having lost their property on the boat. That Coroner ought to lose his office, and never have another.

Rev. Orange Scott.—The last number of the True Wesleyan, which is just received, contains the valedictory of this brother, addressed to the Wesleyan Methodist Connection in America, under the caption, "A voice from the Dying." The editor says it is probably the last that will ever come from his pen, for he is still sinking and cannot live long. The following extract from the communication of Br. Scott, will be read with interest.

Dear Brethren:—"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand!" These words express my present state. Already the spray of the rolling billows falls upon me—there is but a step between me and death! Before this will reach many of you, I shall undoubtedly be numbered with the dead. I have been purposing to address you before I go hence—have been waiting for more strength, but it comes not. I have waited too long already. My body is perfect weakness, but my heart is full. O, that I had strength to speak fully of my views and feelings in this trying hour. I say trying, because I am not without conflict. The thought of leaving our young but growing Church, of being laid aside in the midst of my years, to act no more in my Master's Vineyard, touches me to the very quick, yet I know my Master can do his work without the aid of such a feeble worm as I am. Yes, he can and will carry forward the glorious work of Salvation, whoever of his ministers may die. My confidence, brethren, in the truthfulness of our principles, and propriety of our organization remains undiminished. This I am happy to proclaim, even with my dying breath. Let all our ministers and people keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of perfectness, and there is nothing to fear.

You will all, brethren, concede to me a deep interest in all our concerns. When our Church was organized, I threw myself and all that I had upon her altar, not then thinking I should so soon be consumed; but so it is. The embarrassed state of our Book Concern, over which you called me to preside, has literally worn me out. Yes, brethren, it has worn me out; and in the midst of my years I must go down to the dead. I would not cast a reflection upon any of you—some of you have done nobly, others, perhaps, might have done more, and so have released the Concern from its embarrassment long before this, and have saved the Agent from a premature grave.

From Mexico.

Those who are anxious for news, can have a morsel by perusing the following laconic statement from the last number of the National Era, published at Washington, D. C.

According to the latest dates, General Scott was still at Puebla. Santa Anna had not been elected Dictator. A Mexican army of thirty thousand had not assembled. A project of attacking General Scott had not been entertained. The American army was not in danger. The city of Mexico was not in a high state of defence. The newspaper at the capital did not seem to be in favor of peace. The rumored difficulty between General Scott and Mr. Trist had not taken place.

As to General Taylor, he had not returned to the United States; he had not set out for San Luis Potosi; he had not caught Urrea; he had not stopped writing letters.

The conclusion of the whole matter is, that peace is not yet conquered, and it is not known when it will be.

This, we believe, embraces all the news up to this date.

The Telegraph.—On Thursday last the Telegraphic wire, reached Zanesville, and on Friday was extended through the place, along Main street, and across the upper bridge over the Muskingum river. It is in progress westwards along the National Road towards Columbus, The wires for the connection, at the office in Zanesville were adjusted, and the Courier informs us that the instrument only is now wanted to give us "instantaneous connection with the shores of of the Atlantic." The apparatus is daily expected.

Western Presbyterian and Congregational Convention.—This was held at Chicago, Illinois, commencing, June 17th, and was numerouly attended by ministers and laymen from New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, &c. Rev. A. Kent presided. Spirited resolutions were adopted, with great unanimity, in reference to the evils of Intemperance, War, Slavery, and Divorces, from other than scriptural grounds. Also in behalf of Domestic and Foreign Missions.—Interesting statements were made by some of the speakers, in reference to the colonies of Norwegians, in Northern Illinois and Wisconsin, and it was urged that prompt attention be paid to their religious instruction, and that they be furnished liberally with the bible, and other means of enlightenment. It was stated that between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi river, already more than 20,000 of those people had settled themselves, and that the emigration from Norway was still large, and constantly increasing. They are represented as an interesting people, and favorably disposed towards Protestantism.

Literary.—The Pittsburgh Dispatch, in procuring a new and beautiful head, has ventured upon a Phonographic innovation, in omitting the final h in Pittsburgh. The Pittsburgh Commercial Journal seconds the movement, and says, "We are glad to see an example set, which will reduce the number of letters one has to make in writing. We do not perceve that the last h is necessary."

A One Wheel Carriage!—The last number of Alexander's Messenger contains an engraving and description of a one wheel Sulky, which has lately come into use about London. It professes safety and swiftness. Speed is given by its having but half the amount of resistance from wheels. A curious contrivance, that. And what next?

CORRESPONDENCE.

Written for the Western Recorder.

A TRIP TO THE QUEEN CITY.

Business calling our attention to the great commercial emporium of the West, we have thought that it might not be uninteresting to your readers to present them with a few brief notes of travel.—Our locale is in a recently settled portion of the State; and however rich in soil and beautiful in woodland scenery, presents very few of the admirable features of an advanced and well cultivated country, or its activity and enterprise. It was consequently, with no small degree of pleasure that we surveyed large and highly cultivated farms,—houses erected with taste and elegance and the various et ceteras connected with an older settled region. But still there was one sentiment that would insinuate itself into our mind which is, that happiness and virtue abide as cheerfully in the log-cabin as the most resplendent mansion.

On the third of July, a day commemorated in many places as the immortal Fourth, we found ourself in a small village on the banks of the Scioto, where a large concourse of people had assembled to celebrate the Declaration of Independence. Disappointed in their chaplain, who were called upon to officiate, a duty which was discharged with embarrassment. The exercises consisted of singing, reading the Declaration, and an address on education: containing a little more of the beautiful, than the useful and comprehensive. The citizens had prepared a collation in an apple-tree grove, and in proof of its good taste and excellence, there were but few fragments left. It would have been better for some individuals if they had declared their independence of the Alcoholic King, before coming to celebrate the Declaration of the Independence of the United Colonies, of the English Monarch, George the III.

By the time the celebration was over, the day was fast declining; and having to ride some eighteen miles to assist at a protracted meeting on the Darby Mission, we had to make great haste to get there in order to enjoy the evening's services. Here we spent the Sabbath,—had a joyful lovefeast in the morning, and a pleasant meeting during the day. Brother R. K. Davis has had a laborious year, but his labors have been blessed and the Mission is prospering under his kind care. A small society was organised. Not far from this place an unfortunate accident occurred, two or three days previous to the Fourth. In preparing and charging a cannon, by accident, or carelessness, it was prematurely discharged. One individual lost a hand, and another an arm, very seriously endangering their lives. When will men learn by example?

Leaving Milford, we proceeded to Springfield the present terminus of the Little Miami Railroad, and were kindly entertained by our good Brother, O. P. Stephens. Springfield is one of the most beautiful, enterprising, and healthy locations in the State of Ohio, with an intelligent and business community. There are no less than nine different churces: Presbyterian, Lutheran, Associate Reformed, Methodist Protestant, African, Episcopalian, Baptist, Methodist Episcopal and Universalist. There is also one College, under the patronage of the Lutherans, and a High School, under that of the Episcopal Methodist. By the way, writing of Springfield, the grey and antiquated rocks of Buck creek, manifest no visible signs of having been disturbed by the great commotion of the last Annual Conference. The M. P. Church is erected at the north-east part of the town. The town has receded from the church and is progressing steadily. Extreme, and almost isolated in its position, the congregation is but medium. They have had one or two offers to sell, but unfortunately have not done so.—"There is a time in the affairs" of churches, as well as men, which, taken at the flood, leads on to victory; and vice versa.

At Springfield we took passage on the cars for Cincinnati. Railroad travelling is one of the most comfortable and expeditious modes of journeying. Leaving Springfield at 4½ o'clock, A. M., we arrived in the city about 10½ o'clock, making the distance eighty-four miles, in five hours and thirty minutes. The increase of travel has been immense. In one train I was informed three hundred passengers left Cincinnati; and from Springfield, from eight to fourteen coaches leave daily for Bellefontaine and Columbus, not including the regular mails.

We arrived at the city in good season, and soon found ourselves comfortably situated at the house of a kind friend and brother.

How rapid the growth of this wonderful city! Well does she deserve her proud title of "Queen City." What a mighty change has been effected in a few years! What a rise of property in a short a period! As an instance, one lot, situated on one of the most popular streets, a few years ago could have been exchanged for a wagon and horses. Now it cannot be purchased for one hundred dollars per foot. The writer, two years ago, could have purchased lots in a retired spot exterior of the corporation, for ten dollars per foot: now they command twenty-five dollars per foot! Six years ago you might have stood on the Northern hills, and cast your eye over a large space in the Western part of the city, without having your vision obstructed, save by a few solitary buildings. Now well laid out streets meet your view, and well built dwellings, &c., have sprung up on every hand. The time is coming in the history of Cincinnati, when the hills that surround it will be incorporated as parts of the city; and when vessels of burden will float from docks yet to be constructed, down the Ohio, and convey to other climes the various products of this prosperous and powerful State.

In comparison, no markets in the world are better or more abundantly furnished with the substantial necessaries of life than the Cincinnati markets. What a crowd of wagons, what an abundance of the good things of life. An epicure may riot in prospect here, to his heart's con-

Is there no law to punish such disturbers of the public peace? Yes: there is one but it is too fearful to think of. But we rejoice to see the dawning of another: soon the law of public sentiment will condemn such creatures to infamy and disgrace here; whom the law of God condemns to be shut up in utter darkness hereafter.

This doggery stands on the north side of the pike, in the centre of a village, not twenty miles west of Muskingum and claims (what it merits not) the appellation of being a respectable tavern.

Western Sketches.

Highest Peak of the Rocky Mountains.

Captain Fremont in the report of his expedition to the Rocky mountains, thus narrates his ascent of the highest peak:—

"Putting hands and feet in the crevices between the blocks, I succeeded in getting over it, and when I reached the top, found my companions in a small valley below. Descending to them, we continued climbing and in a short time reached the crest. I sprang upon the summit, and another step would have precipitated me into an immense snow field five hundred feet below. To the edge of this field was a sheer icy precipice and then, with a gradual fall, the field sloped off for about a mile, until it struck the foot of another lower ridge. I stood on a narrow crest, about three feet in width, with an inclination of about 20° N. E. As soon as I had gratified the first feelings of curiosity, I descended, & each man ascended in his turn; for I would only allow one at a time to mount the unsuitable and precarious slab, which it seemed a breath would hurl into the abyss below. We mounted the barometer in the snow of the summit, and, fixing a ramrod into the crevice, unfurled the National flag to wave in the breeze where never flag waved before. During our morning's ascent, we had met no signs of animal life, except the small sparrow-like bird already mentioned. A stillness the most profound and a terrible solitude forced themselves constantly on the mind as the great features of the place. Here, on the summit, where the stillness was absolute, unbroken by any sound, and the solitude complete, we thought ourseves beyond the region of animated life; but while we were seated on the rock, a solitary bee (bromus, the humble bee,) came winging his flight from the eastern valley, and lit on the knee of one of the men.

It was a strange place, the icy rock and the highest peak of the Rocky Mountains, for a lover of of warm sunshine and flowers; and we pleased ourselves with the idea that he was the first of his species to cross the mountain barrier, a solitary pioneer to foretell the advance of civilization. I believe a moment's thought would have made us let him continued his way unharmed; but we carried out the law of this country, where all animated nature seems at war; and seizing him immediately, put him in at least a fit place, in the leaves of a large book among the flowers we had gathered on our way. The barometer stood at 18.293, the attached thermometer at 44°; giving for the elevation of this summit 13,570 feet above the Gulf of Mexico, which may be called the highest flight of the bee. It is certainly the highest known flight of that insect.

The summit rock was gneiss, succeeded by sienitic gneiss. Sienite and feldspar succeeded in our descent to the snow line, where we found a feldspatic granite. I had remarked that the noise produced by the explosion of our pistols had the usual degree of loudness, but was not in the least prolonged, expiring almost instantaneously.—Having now made what observations our means afforded we proceeded to descend. We had accomplished an object of laudable ambition, and beyond the strict order of our instructions. We had climbed the highest peak of the Rocky Mountains, and looked down upon the snow a thousand feet below, and standing where never human foot had stood before, felt the exultation of first explorers. It was about 2 o'clock when we left the summit; and when we reached the bottom, the sun had already sunk behind the wall, and the day was drawing to a close. It would have been pleasant to have lingered here and on the summit longer; but we hurried away as rapidly as the ground would permit, for it was an object to regain our party as soon as possible, not knowing what accident the next hour might bring forth.

We reached our deposit of provisions, at nightfall. Here was not the inn which awaits the tired travellers on their return from Mount Blanc, or the orange groves of South America, with their refreshing juices and soft fragrant air; but we found our little cache of dried meat and coffee undisturbed. Though the moon was bright, the road was full of precipices, and the fatigue of the day had been great. We theretore abandoned the idea of rejoining our friends, and lay down on the rock, and, in spite of the cold slept soundly.

The Latest Curiosity.

A Chinese Junk, 300 days from Canton, has arrived at New York, and is an object of great curiosity. The Mirror says she looks as much like a huge morocco shoe turned up at the toe, as any thing it can compare her to. She is to be exhibited for the benefit of some Yankee speculators, and several very beautiful Chinese women, with the smallest feet imaginable, are to be included in the exhibition. The Journal of Commerce describes her in a more nautical manner, as follows:

"The China Junk is built in the shape of a whale boat, 150 feet long, breadth of beam 25 feet, and 12 feet hold. Her stern has a rise from the deck of about 30 feet. She is built entirely of teak wood, and is very strong. Her masts, three in number, are of teak wood. She has latine sails. Her cables are of bamboo, and anchors of wood. Her cabin is 30 feet long, 23 feet wide, and 9½ high, painted with designs of birds, beasts, &c. In the after part of the cabin is a large case, containing one of their principal godesses, having thirty arms and hands stretched out. She is decorated with watches, flowers and other offerings. The vessel contains a large number of other curiosities. She has three windlasses—one amidships, very large, to get up the anchor; one on the bows to heave the heel of the rudder to the stern post; one astern to heave the rudder out of the water. She is painted outside white, black beads from her stern to her fore rigging; and from her fore rigging to her stern red. Has nine ports on a side, painted white with black streaks, and has two eyes, one on each side the rudder. Her rudder is so constructed as to ship and unship at will in a short time. Captain Kellett states that she is a very fine sea vessel.—She has been perfectly tight on her passage. Her cost was $75,000. Her crew consists of 40 China men and 20 Europeans.—Philadelphia Dollar Newspaper.

THE CHURCH AND THE MEXICAN WAR.—Agreeably to the recommendation of the Presbyterian General assembly, at its last session, the war existing with Mexico was, on Sunday, (the second Sunday in July) the special subject of discourse in all the churches of that denomination in the city of New York, & we presume, in the Presbyterian churches generally throughout the Union.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

To the Public.

A letter has been received by the Post Master at this place, under date of July 4th, from Madison Ia., stating that a young man named Colwell who had probably been down the river on a raft or flatboat to New Orleans, recently died on board the steamboat Cincinnati on her trip from New Orleans to Louisville. He said he lived at Zanesville Ohio. His trunk and money are in possession of the clerk of the boat.

LATER FROM OREGON.

The Governor's Message, &c.—By the ship Sterling, at Boston, from California, we have received a file of the Oregon City Spectator to the 10th of December. These papers, though new to us, and coming from a part of our own national territory, are six times as old as those we have received from Europe. A scanning of the Spectator affords much interesting information.—Balt. Sun.

A letter from J. Quinn Thornton, is published in the Spectator of December 10th, dated "Settlement of the Rickreall, November 30th," and giving a sad account of the "emigrants by the Southern route," whom Mr. Thornton had left in the Umpqua mountains—suffering beyond any thing known. They must perish of hunger, he says, unless supplies were taken to them immediately. The editor had learned that a sufficient number of horses had been dispatched from Champoeg county to bring them in.

The Spectator does battle in behalf of the Columbia river and its good name for safety of navigation, insisting that its channel is amply wide and deep, and that only ignorance or bad management can account for disasters to vessels coming in or going out.

The Legislature convened on the 1st of December, and organized by the election of A. L. Lovejoy, as Speaker. The Governor's message was received.

As a community, the people of Oregon have taken a high stand in the cause of temperance, and among the other subjects referred to in the message is this. A remodeling of the present law is recommended, as, during the past year, persons taking advantage of the defect in the law, which "prohibits the introduction, sale or distillation of ardent spirits," have both manufactured and sold it. It is held that the power to prohibit the introduction, manufacture or sale, is not granted by the organic law, as it only provides that the Legislature shall have "power to pass laws to regulate," &c. The Governor recommends that only a sufficient quantity to supply the wants of the community for medicinal purposes be allowed.

A bill creating the office of "Territorial Recorder" was passed, and Mr. Theophilus McGruder was elected to perform the duties of that office.

The Spectator calls upon the Legislature to make haste and adjourn, observing that its cost is $50 a day to the territory, and that the public debt is already $5,000, and increasing.

The project for a railroad to the Pacific seems to excite some interest in Oregon. The Spectator urges the Legislature to take some action upon the premises, by memorial to Congress, or approving resolutions. It suggests also that Congress be asked for a steam tug to operate at the mouth of the Columbia.

A Mr. Lippincott, from the city of New York, one of those "emigrants by the Southern route," had been badly wounded in the knee, in a skirmish with the Klamet Indians. Two others, one from Iowa and the other from Mississippi, were killed in the same affair.

Distressing Occurrence.

BETHLEHEM, July 10, 1847.

Gentlemen—It is with the deepest regret that I am obliged to record the painful disaster that has befallen one of our most worthy citizens, Henry G. Guetter. He left Bethlehem on Monday last, in company with his wife and eldest daughter, whom he intended to place at a boarding school at Litiz, Lancaster county. After a sojourn there of several days, he took his family on a pleasure ride to Lancaster, and on the return, his horses, which, by the way, are a very spirited pair, ran off, and in running, his daughter fell out and got entangled in the wheel, and it was a miracle that the poor girl was not mashed to a jelly; though considerably bruised, there are some hopes of her recovery. Not so, however, with Mr. Guetter, who had his shoulder blade as well as several of his ribs broken, and otherwise seriously injured in the spine, which caused his death on Friday evening. His wife escaped unhurt, as well as another lady, who was in company with them from Litiz. His corpse was brought to Bethlehem on Saturday evening, which was a circumstance that cast a gloom over the whole borough. Mr. Guetter was extensively known throughout the country as an importer of musical instruments, &c., and also was the owner of a very extensive coal and lumber yard in Bethlehem. He has left a widow and four daughters, the eldest of which is the one so seriously injured. Our friend will be buried on Sunday afternoon, in the Bethlehem grave-yard. In truth we can say, "In the midst of life we are in death."

COMPARATIVE ECONOMY OF FREE AND SLAVE LABOR.—A South Carolina journal congratulates its readers upon the recognition by a northern paper of the alleged facts, that Slave labor is more expensive to the capitalist than free labor. Our Southern contemporary believes that slaves clothed, fed, lodged, doctored, and nursed at the expense of their owners, enjoy a larger share of the fruits of their industry than falls to the lot of the free working men of America, Europe or Asia—that the African slave of our Southern States is better cared for, more abundantly supplied with the necessaries of life in health and luxuries of life in sickness—more comfortable in old age and happier through life, than the free laborer. From alleged facts of this character he draws conclusions favorable to African slavery as established in our Southern States. Here then, is an admission that slave labor is the most expensive, and this very admission seals the fate of slavery; for the moment the planter sees his account in patronizing industrious freemen, his interests become identified with the emancipation and colonization of the African.

No matter what others may think of the degree of happiness enjoyed by the free laborer, as compared with the slave, he thinks himself the happiest. His liberty of body and mind, and the birthright of a freeman to rise to the highest stations in our country, are far more abundant sources of happiness than those enjoyed by the slave. If happiness consists merely in an unfailing supply of food, shelter and clothing, with good medical attendance and nursing in sickness and old age, then our boasted freedom is a delution, and the slaves of South Carolina are the happiest of the human family.—*N. The following acknowledgment from this truly amiable man, addressed to Messrs. Starr and Storer of this city, Committee of the Sons of Temperance, will be read with interest.—Watch. of the Valley.

CORK, May 8th, 1847.

GENTLEMEN—To you and my beloved brethren the Sons of Temperance, I return my heart felt thanks, in associating me with the admirable committee of the Society of Friends, in the distributions of your generous contributions for the relief of the afflicted people of Ireland.

I hail this compliment as the best proof of your esteem and approbation.

You may rest assured, my dear friends, that your supply of bread stuffs shall be disposed of amongst the destitute, without distinction, of politics, country or creed.

In these instructions I fully sympathize, and my conduct towards my brother man has been invariably guided by them.

No one can charge me with having, during the three and thirty years I have been before the public, ever violated the charities of nature or the Gospel, because the individual was of a different country, or knelt at a different altar.

It will edify your society to learn that the poor Teetotallers of Ireland, in the midst of famine and pestilence, have proved faithful.

Our sacred cause has proved the salvation of our unhappy country at this awful crisis.

Instead of having recourse to the intoxicating cup, to drown their sorrows and inflame every evil passion, they have laid hold of the horns on the altar, seeking for consolation from the God of all consolation, who consoles us in all our tribulations.

Much has been done by the high minded citizens of your glorious Repulic to feed and save us.

Thousands, notwithstanding, have perished miserably, thousands are hourly perishing; for God alone, who fills every creature with blessings, can supply the wants of a whole nation without food or money.

We are in fear and trembling for the coming harvest. May the holy will of God be done.

Again expressing my gratitude, and presenting kindest remembrance to all the Sons of Temperance, believe me with high respect, Dear Gentlemen, Your affectionate friend.

THEOBOLD MATTHEW.

RESCUED FROM DROWNING—COMMENDABLE ACT. Frederick Waters, a boy about 8 years of age, the son of an English family who recently arrived in this port, while standing on the wharf, opposite the Bath Hotel, above Walnut street, about five o'clock on Thursday afternoon, accidentally fell overboard, and would have been drowned, but for the aid of Michael H. Fagan, a drayman, who happened to be in the vicinity. On witnessing the accident he gallantly plunged into the water, and the next moment he was clambering into a boat belonging to a vessel lying at the adjacent wharf, with the rescued boy in his arms. So promptly was this humane act performed, that the lad recovered his conciousness in a few minutes, and shortly afterwards was able to walk home. Mr. Fagan afterwards astonished the bystanders by declaring that he could not swim in the least, and it was not till the impulse of the moment had induced him to leap into the water, that he remembered his failing in this respect.—Dollar Newspaper.

THE FRENCH STEAMSHIPS.—The French steamship Union, at New York, is described as a beautiful vessel, built in the very best style of naval architecture, and commanded by a thorough seaman. She has a crew of fifty-four seamen and boys, and eighteen firemen; there are also four machinists, with carpenters, bakers, cooks, servants, &c., a well chosen suite. Her cabins are admirably adapted for the convenience and comfort of passengers; the dining room occupies the whole width of the ship, and the fare is abundant and of the best. There is also a second price or cheaper cabin, this will be found very agreeable for those who do not choose or cannot afford to pay the highest rate. In the first cabin there are eighty-four beds—five rooms have four beds each, one has six, the rest have two. All the furniture is mahogany, finely carved, and the berths are pleasant and airy. The length of the Union is 196 feet, her breadth of beam 42; she sails for Europe on the 24th instant. The Philadelphia is the next steamer to arrive of the new line of four packets.—Dol. News.

The Law of Newspapers.

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered wishing to continue their subscriptions.

2. If the subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publishers may continue to send them till all cash charges are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their papers from the offices to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled their bill, and order their paper discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the paper is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The Courts have decided that refusing to take a paper or periodical from the office, or removing and leaving it uncalled for, is "prima facie" evidence of intentional fraud.

Liabilities of those who take Periodicals.

Thes law declare that any person, to whom a periodical is sent, is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. If papers are sent to a Post Office, Store, or any other place of deposite, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the Postmaster, Storekeeper, &c., are responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or informs the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

POETRY.

Written for the Western Recorder.

EVENING.

BY EDWIN C. GALLOWAY.

Oh! what a draught from Heaven's refreshing fount,
The Earth receives at this the evening hour;
Reason, pause, thy blessings to recount,
And sing the praise of every tree and flower.
'Tis thine to sip the sweets of Earth,
And blend with them its silent lays,
That thou again may'st utter forth
Nature's evening song of praise.

'Tis thine to note the softer shades,
That tremble on an evening sky;
And when the golden vapor fades,
The shadow to thyself apply:
There's wisdom in the evening clouds
The stream, the storm, the flower,
That may be turned to good account,
In life's eventful hour.

There's many a gem on nature's brow,
That's fraught with rich design,
That might be ours, would we but bow
Before the pleasing shrine:
Would we upon the mind imprint
Evening's calm and peaceful form,
And fix the rainbow's cheerful tints
Amid the mental world of storm.

Would we the deep design improve,
That sleeps amid each tender fold;
How sweetly might we onward move,
'Mid nature's radiant beams of gold:
Then when night's shades should o'er us steal,
As darkness 'round the earth,
Hope would its precious boon reveal,
Faith's pledge of endless birth.

Cambridge, July 5th, 1847.

Campbell's lines upon the Rainbow have always been considered one of his most beautiful productions, yet if the following lines upon the same subject are not more beautiful, we are no judges of poetry.

THE RAINBOW.

BY MRS. AMELIA WELBY.

I sometimes have thought in my loneliest hours,
That lie on my heart like the dew on the flowers,
Of a ramble I took one bright afternoon,
When my heart was as light as a blossom in June:
The green earth was moist with the late fallen showers,
The breeze fluttered down and blew open the flowers,
While a single white cloud to its haven of rest,
On the white wing of peace floated off in the West.

As I threw back my tresses to catch the cool breeze,
That scattered the rain-drops and dimpled the seas;
Far up the blue sky a fair rainbow unrolled
Its soft-tinted pinions of purple and gold!
'Twas born in a moment, yet quick as its birth,
It was stretched to the utter most ends of the earth;
And, fair as an angel, it floated all free,
With a wing on the earth, and a wing on the sea.

How calm was the ocean! how gentle its swell!
Like a woman's soft bosom, it rose and it fell;
While its light sparkling waves stealing laughingly o'er,
When they saw the fair rainbow knelt down to the shore;
No sweet hymn ascended, no murmur of prayer,
Yet I felt that the spirit of worship was there,
And bent my young head in devotion and love,
'Neath the form of the angel that floated above.

How wide was the sweep of its beautiful wings!
How boundless its circle! how radiant its rings!
If I looked on the sky, 'twas suspended in air,
If I looked on the ocean, the rainbow was there;
Thus forming a girdle as brilliant and whole,
As the thoughts of the rainbow that circled my soul!
Like the wings of the Deity, calmly unfurl'd,
It bent from the cloud and encircled the world.

There are moments, I think, when the spirit receives
Whole volumes of thought on its unwritten leaves,
When the folds of the heart in a moment unclose,
Like the innermost leaves from the heart of a rose;
And thus, when the rainbow had passed from the sky,
And thoughts it awoke were too deep to pass by
It left my full soul like the wing of a dove,
All fluttering with pleasure, and fluttering with love.

I know that each moment of rapture or pain,
But shortens the links in life's mystical chain;
I know that my form, like that bow from the wave,
May pass from the earth, and lie cold in the grave;
Yet, oh! when death's shadows my bosom uncloud,
When I shrink from the thought of the coffin and shroud,
May hope, like the rainbow, my spirit unfold,
In her beautiful pinions of purple and gold.

FLOWERS.

Ye are the Scriptures of the Earth,
Sweet flowers, fair and frail;
A sermon speaks in every bud
That wooes the summer gale.

Ye lift your heads at early morn,
To greet the sunny ray,
And cast your fragrance forth to praise
That Lord of night and day.

Low in the damp and cheerless earth,
Ye slumber for a while,
Then waken unto glorious life,
And bid creation smile.

Thus when within the darksome tomb
Our mortal frame shall lie;
The soul, freed from the bonds of sin,
Shall join the choir on high.

Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church.

NO. IV.

MR. EDITOR: If the framers of the Constitution intended that the several Annual Conferences should do more than make special rules and regulations for the government of themselves, as a Conference, it ought to have been explicitly so stated; which, so far as I am competent to decide, is far from being the true state of the case. It is true, the several Annual Conferences have the exclusive power to make, each, its own rules and regulations for the admission and government of the COLORED members within its district. Any Conference may refuse their admission into the church upon any conditions; or it may elevate them to membership, and give them all the rights of suffrage which the white members enjoy; but to suppose that any Annual Conference, in making regulations for the accommodation of the colored population, can so arrange them, that the white membership shall, in any way, be effected by these rules, to my mind is preposterous. No man who will take the trouble to examine the Constitution with any attention, can but see at once, that the white membership are not even alluded to by the convention, in the arrangement here made, for the exclusive benefit of the colored population. To return to the first, viz: the making such rules, &c., as the peculiarity of the district may require, I remark. The only tests of membership are contained in the second article of the Constitution; but these are enlarged upon in other parts. This second article is made unalterable, only by a convention, the call for which, is to be made by two-thirds of the Annual Conferences of the Methodist Protestant Church. Since slavery has greatly agitated, not only the Methodist Protestant Church, but various other branches of Christ's Church, it will be a suitable subject to select to illustrate my position. I remark. Slavery was known by the convention of the associated Methodist Protestant Churches to exist, when the second article was adopted.—Though legislative bodies, after they have adjourned, are not considered the expounders of their own enactments, but the judiciary; yet the design of the legislators so far as can be ascertained with certainty, should be carried into practical operation. What, then, was the object of the convention, when it passed this second article of the constitution, with a full knowledge of the existence of slavery? Can it be supposed, will any man contend that the members contemplated in another portion of this instrument, to give the power to each Annual Conference to adopt terms of membership at its pleasure? If not, how can any Annual Conference erect any other standard than that erected by the convention? This power, I believe, they do not possess. If any Annual Conference take the liberty to decide upon the moral quality of actions, undecided by the common consent of christians, as being opposed to the explicit declarations of the bible; or decide that the holding of slaves under all circumstances, is a violation of the moral law, sufficient to exclude a person from the kingdom of grace and glory; and claim this right from the constitutional enactments of the Methodist Protestant Church, then all must, as it seems to me, under our present organization, so far as one Annual Conference is in fellowship with another, either voluntarily consent to live in church fellowship with known violaters, or admit the necessity of the dissolution of the compact between the associated Methodist churches and a separation between themselves and all slaveholders. And if it is contended that this seventh article confers the power to decide on the moral quality of actions; then, it must be admitted that the framers of our Constitution involved in it the certain means of the dissolution of the union between the associated Methodist P. Churches.—For upon this supposition, the convention has imparted the power to any Annual Conference of this church, to decide the others are sinners against God; and to the others, equal authority, to condemn those who first acted in the premises, as sinners that ought, of right, to be expelled the church forthwith. There is no determining at what point in ethics, men will stop their course of condemning their fellows, if the foregoing principle of the right to decide on the moral quality of actions is once adopted; hence, the necessity of every department of the church to be exceedingly cautious, that it does not transcend its legal authority. These remarks are not, in the slightest degree, intended as an apology for slavery; though, I deeply regret, that the portion of the constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church, which was obviously designed more firmly to unite the associated churches, should be used by any, to disunite the several parts of this church.

Article eighth, treats of the "Composition of the General Conference." There is to be, in May, a quadrenial General Conference; to be composed of an equal number of ministerial and lay representatives, from the several Annual Conferences associated under the name of the Methodist Protestant Church. The representatives are to be elected by an Electoral College, at the time and place of holding each Annual Conference in every district, next preceding the assembling of the General Conference, by the ministers and delegates belonging to the Annual Conference; and one minister, not under the stationing authority, from each circuit and station; who is to be elected by his ministerial brethren on the unstationed list of his circuit or station, at the Quarterly Conference next before the Annual Conference, at which, the Electoral College is to be organized.—The unstationed ministers thus elected, are to be ADDED; the constitution does not say, to the itinerant ministers, as a component part; though this, heretofore, has been the usage; yet there is nothing in this article, or in any other article of the constitution, which justifies so injurious a usage. This is the only provision made in the whole constitution for the representation of the unstationed ministers of the Methodist Protestant Church, in any legislative body; and he who would knowingly, either by arbitrary power, or by any manœuvreing, deprive them of this only right of representation, must be far more a despot, than any who aided in depriving the local ministers of their rights, in 1784. For these never pretended to believe, much less declare, that the local ministers ought to participate in the enactment of rules; while those come with loud professions of "mutual rights," and while they say, "Are you in health, my brother?" they, with an assumed dagger, smite out the only remnants of representative vitality. But if these Electoral Colleges are organized upon the principles of equity, the unstationed ministers of the church need nothing more, fully to secure their rights and privileges. Provided, however, that the views presented on the seventh article are conceded to be correct; if not, then, if the Annual Conferences have the power to create new terms of membership, obligatory upon the unstationed ministers, these ministers ought, agreeably to the first principles of Methodist Protestantism, to have a representation in these Conferences. Legislation by others, to make laws to govern those who are not represented involves the very grounds of the secession in 1828. Provision is wisely made in this article forever to secure the rights of the laity. Upon the final passage of any question or rule, at the request of any three members, the ministers and laymen vote separately, and there must be a majority of both, disjoined, to carry any measure, either in a General or Annual Conference.

Article ninth, defines the "Powers of the General Conference." This conference, while it continues within constitutional limits, has the legislative authority to enact rules for the government of every department of the church. Any enactments, or resolutions, not based on the constitution, are a perfect nullity, and are not, in the slightest degree, binding. This conference is, at no time, to exceed one hundred members.

Article tenth, presents the "Resolutions on Legislative Assemblies." No rule is to be passed which contravenes any law of God—infringes the right of suffrage—eligibility to office—the rights and privileges of ministers and members to trial by committee, and of an appeal—infringing the liberty of speech or of the press; but all to be liable to answer for any abuse of this privilege; no rule is to be passed, except it be founded on the holy Scriptures, to expel any minister, preacher or member—no rule to authorize the appropriation of the church funds to other purposes than those in this article enumerated—no higher order of ministers to be authorized than that of elder—no rule to be passed to abolish an efficient itinerant ministry—no circuit minister to be stationed more than three years on a circuit, or two years in succession in a station—neither General nor Annual Conferences can be changed in their component parts. Will not every candid, impartial person say, that the rights and privileges of every minister, preacher and member of this church, are well guarded? and that while these restrictions and the powers of legislative bodies are well understood, and carefully observed, there can be no danger of injustice being done to the pious. Though, it must be admitted, with the best possible rules and regulations for the government of any church, designing and ambitious men, if not early checked will grasp power; and they will always, pertinaciously, hold on to any they may have, in any way, acquired. J. H.

Sketches by Rev. A. McGuire.

NO. V.

On Friday, 30th April, 1829, Brother and Sister Towler came to my house to go in company with me to our Agent's meeting, to be held in Cincinnati, Saturday, 1st May; we reached the city, and with heart-felt gratitude to God, we heard that the large and commodious church, the first in the west, was finished, and was to be dedicated next day. By eleven o'clock it was full, and many who came could not get in. It was believed there were fifteen hundred in it, to whom Br. A. Shinn preached the dedication sermon, from Isaiah 55: 10, 11. Never did I hear a better sermon,—never did I see a more attentive audience. At three o'clock we administered the Lord's supper, and Jesus did attend with us, and gave us living bread. O! it was a heavenly feast, not to be forgotten soon by many; I tried to preach in the evening, and we had a weeping time. Monday and Tuesday, attended to our business and fixed on our first Annual Conference to be held in this city on the first Thursday in October. Passing over several days,—on the 13, rode to Brother Inskip's,* and on the next day, preached in the old meeting house and formed a class of eight members. On the 23d, preached in Xenia, to a very attentive congregation, rode home on Monday to see my family, and rested until Friday. Brother Goldsbury having come on, he took my appointments and I went to Dayton to meet Brother Shinn, at a two day's meeting previously appointed. On Sunday morning at 9 o'clock, I organized a class of eleven members, we had the use of the Presbyterian church, and large and attentive audiences, and if we had been blessed with only two or three active leading men we might have had a good church here. The year I was stationed here, we rose to forty in number, and I had got about eight hundred dollars toward building a church; but when it was thrown into the circuit, it dwindled away. I rested until the 5th of June, then set out with three of my children for Xenia, to attend our second quarterly meeting; we met Brother Shinn there according to promise. Our old brethren were asked for the use of their church, but they refused, and we held our meeting in the court house. We had a precious love-feast in one of the jury rooms, several of our old brethren were in with us, and enjoyed themselves well. Brother Shinn preached twice for us. His sermon on Sunday to a crowded house, was one of the greatest I ever heard: a very liberal collection was taken for the support of the preachers. In our Quarterly Conference, we thought it best to divide the circuit, and did so,—made two four weeks' circuits, as we now had more ministers willing to travel.—I will just state here that our Presbyterian brethren were very friendly with us, and gave us the use of their churches, and invited us to commune with them, when opportunity offered. May the God of heaven bless and prosper them.

On the 19th, I started in company with my wife to attend a two day's meeting in the neighborhood where I had organized the first two classes, numbering thirty-four members,—they now amounted to sixty: I here had the pleasure of meeting my beloved fellow-laborers in the good cause, Brothers Flood, Dobbins, and Jones. Br. Dobbins preached on Sunday in a barn to a large congregation, and God blessed the word to many. We then administered the Lord's supper, and the Master was with us in power, and we were truly glad to see a number of our Episcopal brethren come forward and feast with us. At this meeting we added five more, four from the Methodist E. Church, and one from the world. I here met with Brother Joel Dalby jr. I took him into the woods and after he had expressed his satisfaction with our principles, as far as he had opportunity of knowing, I prevailed on him to take Xenia circuit with Brother Goldsbury, provided I could furnish him with a horse. Well, I recollected that our Cincinnati brethren had subscribed money to buy a horse for any young preacher that would travel, and labor with us. So according to agreement, he come to my house on Tuesday the 23d, in order to take my appointments. I went with him to several of them, and on Monday the 29th, I set off for the city, having previously obtained a certificate from Brothers Flood, Dobbins and Jones, of Brother Joel's character, and abilities, and in two days got a horse. Since that time the brethren know something of Brother Dalby.

At the called meeting of the brethren in Cincinnati, about getting the horse, Br. Shinn brought into view the society he had organized on the previous Sabbath, in Madison, Indiana, and wanted to know what could be done to supply them immediately with a preacher. There were 36 members, all from the Methodist Episcopal Ch., and no preacher. All seemed deeply concerned, but knew not what to do; I began to reflect on it, and a severe struggle took place in my mind, whether I ought to leave my beloved family, upwards of one hundred miles, or labor nearer home. As I was now at liberty to comply with the request of my Cincinnati brethren, made some months ago, to-wit: to form a circuit around the city; I viewed the brethren in Madison, in a desolate condition, and I proposed to the brethren if they would give me up a few weeks, I would go home and see my family, and deliver the horse to Brother Dalbey, and set out the next week for Madison. They all seemed much pleased with the offer, and on Friday the 3d of July, rode home thirty-six miles, and the 4th, went to Dayton, 22 miles, delivered the beast, saddle and bridle. Sunday preached twice, and joined 2 more in the church. On Monday the 6th, went home.

FOURTH OF JULY ACCIDENTS AND INCIDENTS.—For the next two or three weeks the papers will teem with fourth of July accidents. Hundreds of lives are lost every year on this day, from the careless use of fire-arms and other mishaps:—Balt. Sun.

At New Haven, Conn., just after the evening salute had been commenced, a young man by the name of William Shepard, of Branford, was struck by a wad from the cannon, on his thigh—the wad passing through the limb between the bone and the femoral artery, tearing the flesh badly, but not so that amputation was deemed advisable at the time.

At the Brookline crossing (near Boston) of the western railroad, on Monday afternoon, a carriage containing four gentlemen, was run over by the locomotive, the driver was fatally injured, three of the gentlemen very badly hurt, both the horses killed, and the carriage broken to pieces.

On the Delaware river, the steamer Balloon ran over a small boat near the Point House, on Monday afternoon. There were five persons in the boat, one of whom—a colored boy—was drowned.

The Boston Evening Traveller of the 6th instant, says:

There were probably twenty thousand persons who left Boston on Monday night, after the fireworks, in the railroad trains. So carefully and discreetly were the crowded trains managed, however, that, as far as we have been able to learn, not an accident occurred which may be considered as incident to these extraordinary arrangements. On the Fitchburg road, a train of 72 cars, heavily laden with passengers, had worked its way about 10 miles at about 1 o'clock, and probably did not reach its destination till nearly daylight—producing a general disarrangement of the trains on Tuesday. As usual on independence day, there were some narrow escapes from death. A boy, while the salute was being fired in Boston Common, in the morning, ran before the cannon, just as the match was being applied. The explosion spoilt his clothes, but he himself escaped unharmed. Just before the large trains with the passengers from the Worcester railroad, a man, who had gone ahead to see that all was right, discovered a well-dressed countryman, dead drunk, lying across the track near the Tremont road crossing. In a few moments, if he had not been discovered, thirty or forty cars, loaded down with passengers, would have passed over his body. At Newton, Lower Falls, early in the morning, a cannon with which the inhabitants were celebrating the approach of the day, exploded into an hundred fragments, the largest of which that could be found weighed but six pounds, and was thrown over six hundred feet, to within a short distance of the railroad depot. At the time of the explosion the gun was surrounded with people, but no one was in the slightest degree injured.

A man was found lying dead on the track of the Fall River Railroad, on Tuesday morning, a short distance from South Braintree. His head was entirely severed from his body, his wrists broken, and his body considerably mangled.—There can be no doubt that he was lying across the track, and was run over by the late train of the previous night. His name was Harris.

A Mr. Willey, of East Boston, while in a state of intoxication, on Monday, fell upon the track of the Eastern Railroad, near Ipswick, his right arm extending over the rail. He was not observed in season to prevent the train of cars passing over his arm, which was consequently severed, about half way between the shoulder and elbow.

A SAD ACCIDENT happened at the inclined plane No.7, near Port Colden, on the Morris Canal, on Tuesday last. The Belvidere Apollo states that while a boat was descending the plane the chain broke, when the boat was precipitated into the water with such violence as to dash the cabin to pieces. In the cabin was a family of German emigrants, who had been living a year or two in Patterson. Of these unfortunate people, the father, mother, and three of the children were drowned at the time of the accident, or have died of their injuries since.—Newark Advertiser.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—The persistence of a drunken driver, on the 4th inst., to cross the Boston and Worcester rails against the most strenuous efforts to prevent it on the part of the keeper of the crossing, caused injuries that are expected to result in death, to Daniel Murphy, a boy of 10, and to John Kyte, an Englishman. Two or three others in the carriage were bruised, and the horses killed outright.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—Miss Caroline Munyen, of Medway, Mass., was seriously injured at Chelsea Ferry, Boston, on Tuesday evening. As the boat neared the drop, Miss Munyen attemped to jump off, but being restrained by her friends, fell between the boat and the drop and was crushed between them.

CONVENTION OF THE FREE NEGROES OF KENTUCKY.—We learn from the Louisville Courier, that in order to induce a more full immigration of the free negroes of the State of Kentucky to Liberia, the Colonization Society, at the suggestion of several prominent gentlemen of the state, has determined to send out in their expedition in November next, several free colored men from different sections of the state, chosen by the free negroes in their respective neighborhoods, to go to the Colony, and make a full examination of its condition and prospects, (remaining there twelve months for that purpose,) and return and make a report to their constituents. The free negroes of Lexington, Maysville, Danville and Richmond, have chosen in each place one of their number, and the citizens of these places have raised the money to defray the expenses of the person chosen to go to the Colony—while there—and back again to the State. The free negroes of Louisville have approved of this plan, and will send out one of their number.

ACCIDENT AND NARROW ESCAPE.—The people at Saratoga Springs have been in a state of excitement, by an occurrence on the Schenectady and Saratoga railroad, which came near being a fatal accident. The cars were coming up from Albany with their usual speed, when suddenly a snake-head shot up over the wheel into the car, passing directly through every thickness of a lady's dress, and bending just above the heads of several gentlemen. It is almost a miracle that no one was killed. The lady escaped without any serious injury, though considerably bruised by the iron rail, from the ankle to the thigh.

STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.—Two sons of Mr. Wilson, who lives a short distance from Centreville, Washington county, Pa., were out with a one horse wagon hauling hay, on Monday, during the storm. One of the boys, about 15 years of age, was killed by a flash of lightning, and the other considerably stunned and burned about the head, but it is thought he will recover.

STATISTICS OF PROVIDENCE, R. I.—Among the manufactures of this enterprising city, are calico and calandering works, bleaching 108 tons of cotton cloth, and printing 390,000 yards of calico weekly; cotton mills of 34,000 spindles—woolen mills, which weave 375,000 yards of jeans and satinets yearly—these employ 1,800 hands. There are also wood-screw factories, using annually 700 tons of iron, 14 furnaces, using 5,000 tons of pig-iron for machinery, and also making 5,000 plows and 14,000 stoves; 3 steam-engine building shops: a rolling mill, making 10,000 tons of rail road iron and wire each year; 3 india-rubber shoe factories; 1 shoe-tie and 1 stay-lacing do; 1 edge-tool do; and eight engraving shops. These employ 1,647 hands, Cotton and woolen machinery-making shops employ 1,208 men. $100,000 are paid yearly for labor alone, in manufacturing jewelry.

PROTEST AGAINST SLAVERY.—The last number of the Morning Star, published at Dover, N. H., contains a protest and declaration of sentiment upon the subject of slavery, signed by three hundred and ninety-six ministers of the Free-will Baptist persuasion. The following is an extract from this protest:

"We, therefore, by refusing to support slavery, its principles, or its advocates, and by withholding Christian and Church fellowship from all guilty of the sin of slavery, and by remembering those in bonds as bound with them, would wish to wash our hands from the guilt of this iniquity."

DEATH OF HON. RICHARD BIDDLE.—We learned last night that the Hon. Richard Biddle expired at his residence, in this city, about six o'clock, P. M. There could be no event of a similar character which we might be called on to record that would cause us deeper anguish than the death of Mr. Biddle. We defer to another opportunity the expression due to the occasion, if indeed we be not anticipated by the tribute due to his eminent public character, great private excellence, and worth from some fitter source of eulogy upon the man who but yesterday stood amongst us foremost of our foremost men.—Pittsburgh Com., June 10th.

The Bostonians have purchased the Portsmouth and Roanoke Rail Road, in Virginia.—The town of Portsmouth purchased it first for the sum of $50,000, upon a credit of six years and they have sold it to Messrs, Henshaw & Co., of Boston, who intend to extend the road thirteen miles further, in order to connect with the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad.

LOCOMOTION.—The immense amount of travel now in every direction, is swelling the profits of steamboat and railroad companies enormously. Almost every mode of conveyance into or out of Philadelphia, the Ledger says, exhibits the same throng of travelers. We learn, from a New York paper, that the earnings of the Harlem road, for the 4 days preceeding the 8th inst., exceeded $6,000. They would have been much larger had there been cars enough to transport the passengers offering themselves. The earnings of the Long Island road were also very large on Saurday and Monday. The receipts of the Macon and Western road, for June, were $8,148,11.—Baltimore Sun

ATTEMPTED RISING OF THE CONVICTS.—It appears from the National, that on Tuesday evening last one of the guards of the Baton Rogue Penitentiary handed a convict a candle, telling him to light it. The convict was obliged to approach a table, on which stood a light, & on doing so perceived a loaded pistol. Seizing it he presented its muzzle to the head of the guard, and with a terrible oath, said "You are now in my power." At the same instant some twenty convicts appeared, all intent upon some hostile purpose. The guard, nothing daunted, took his hanger, a heavy Roman sword, and cut down the conspirator with the pistol, almost severing his arm from his body, cutting open his head and otherwise injuring him. The rest of the convicts seeing this fled to their cells, and the muiny ended.—N. Orleans Delta.

I. The dispensation of the Gospel the subject of prophetic anticipation.
II. The evangelic announcement of the Savior's nativity.
III. The divine mandate at the incarnation of the Son of God.
IV. The introduction of the Mediatorial economy the subject of rejoicing in heaven.
V. The work of grace on the day of Pentecost the model for religious revivals.
VI. The primitive Evanglisits the patterns of all succeeding preachers.

VIII. The moral revolutions which the triumphs of the Gospel accomplish.
IX. The religious excitement produced by the successful preaching of the Gospel, defended.

XI. The penitent sinner on earth the delight of the Angels in heaven.
XII. The final consummation of the dispensation of grace in the solemnitics of the day of judgment.

The views embodied in these discourses are such as are held in common by all evangelical denominations. The author eschews all controversy. The style is didactic. Nothing sectarian has a place in these sermons, which are simply devoted to popular impression and instruction

It is proposed to put to the Press these Sermons as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers have been secured to justify their publication. If the author meet with adequate encouragement in the sale of this first Volume, it will be succeeded by a second, and so on.

[The contents of the second, third, fourth and fifth volumes are also given in the prospectus which has been furnished us, but as the first volume is to be published separately, the above will sufficiently for the present, indicate the nature and plan of the work. ED.]

The whole of these discourses were prepared and delivered during a not unsuccessful ministry of upwards of twenty years, partly in this country and partly in Great Britain; and are already committed to writing.

Each Volume will be sold at the moderate charge of One Dollar, to be paid for on delivery.

The Volumes will be neatly bound,—octavo size,—and printed on good paper, in a clear type. Each Volume will contain upwards of three hundred pages. Subscriptions will be received for the first Volume alone; or for the first and second; or the whole series may be subscribed for at once.

MR. LEVI PETIT is authorized to receive subscriptions for these contemplated publications; or a letter addressed to the author, Mount Vernon, Knox county, Ohio, with request over the writer's signature, to become a subscriber, will insure the insertion of his name on the subscription list. [May 20.] THOMAS POTTER.

POETRY.

STRIVE ON.

Strive on—the ocean ne'er was crossed,
Repining on the shore;
A Nation's Freedom ne'er was won
When Sloth the banner bore.

Strive on—'tis cowardly to shrink
When dangers rise around;
'Tis sweeter far, though linked with pain,
To gain the vantage ground.

Bright names are on the roll of Fame,
Like stars they shine on high;
They may be hid with brighter rays,
But never, never die!

And these were lighted 'mid the gloom,
Of low obscurity;
Struggling thro' years of pain and toil,
And joyless poverty.

But strive—this world's not all a waste,
A wilderness of care;
Green spots are on the field of life,
And flowerets blooming fair.

Then strive—but oh! let Virtue be
The guardian of your aim!
Let pure, unclouded love illume
The path that leads to Fame!

Secret Confederations Contrary to Divine Laws.

CONCLUDED.

Solomon says, "The wise man's eyes are in his head"—they are there for use—but if any one permit them to be blindfolded—Solomon says, "The fool walketh in darkness." Now, a question arises here, Whether is it more degrading for me to make my brother a fool, or to submit to let him make me one?

"Thus hoodwinked—unmesmerized—he is led round and round, and backward and forward, and forward and backward, until it is evident he knows not where he is. He is then brought before a transparent painting of a skeleton—(whew!) Here he is permitted to use his eyes, though he cannot use them to much purpose. On his right hand, and on his left, stand men in masks and disguised, with battle-axes in hands. The room is dark, but behind the painting stands a man with a candle, and in an affected voice, the candidate is gruffly told that he must die. He is again hoodwinked and led to an altar, at which he kneels, and while a sword is swung before him, he takes an oath that he will never reveal the pass-word, or sign of recognition, or any of the processes through which he has passed, lest the world should laugh at his simplicity, and the tomfoolery of all concerned. Now, just here, there is another immensely important question to ask: Ask any rational christian, what necessity is there for his introduction into the brotherhood of Christian Beneficial Society in the modes and forms described? Of course, every Christian who is so joined, thinks it is necessary to be so joined, to a society not christian.

But our English Methodist, who seems to understand so much of these matters, asserts that, "The establishing of a brotherhood in Secret Orders, is not mentioned, nor even hinted at, as being allowable, in the Scriptures." "I object, then, to Secret-order-brotherhoods, because the Scriptures know nothing of them; and, because, some think them a sufficient brotherhood for that which is so plainly, and every where, required in the Scriptures."

It was only yesterday, (July 2d,) that we met with this knowing Englishman. Much pleased with his information, even though he only describes the English Secret-orders. Sometimes we have to bring our knowledge from afar.

Our English friend would not object to a Christian, Open, Benefit Society. Doubtless, he would see very urgent for them, and exceedingly severe on any christian brother who should oppose them. For human oracles of wisdom may say what they please, christians are commanded to render mutual assistance to each other. And if every christian church adopted the plan of supporting its own poor—or if christians in any place would unite in forming funds for relief in sickness, and for annuities to age past labor, their plans could not be carried out, only by rules and regulations like—and taking them altogether, they would be found to constitute Christian Benefit Societies—open as the sky—and diffusive as open.

Christian Benevolent, mutual assurance, or life assurance Societies, when rightly constituted, properly managed, and comprised of members of integrity and uprightness, may be rendered of immense value and consequence to christian churches and the public.

Mankind—and especially christians—are most happy when they are mutually assisting each other. Are not the New Testament Scriptures full of commands to this duty? In disobeying, there is guilt and consequent unhappiness. Why is a man miserable? because he is selfish. Why is he poor? because he ministers not to his brother. This may seem paradoxical. But in union is strength and riches. Christians should drive poverty from their midst by uniting a portion of their means for their common good.

"Help us to help each other, Lord,
Each other's cross to bear!
Let each his friendly aid afford,
And feel his brother's care."

We have seen it stated that one-fourth of the amount of the funds of Secret Societies is expended on incidentals—formalities, processions, regalia, &c., &c. As these would not be needed by christian organizations, there would be so much saved—so much saved for the use of the poor of Christ's churches. The members of the Body of Christ should be saved from a condition of pauperism; they should not be abandoned to the protection of poor-laws. Alms-houses are wretched homes for sick and aged christians.

There have been several plans suggested on the principle of association for mutual benefit and assistance of Christians. These Societies should adjust their details so as to comprehend at least these five objects:

"1. A provision for the relief of members in sickness, exclusively, during the whole period of life.

"2. A provision for relief in sickness, which shall terminate at a certain age—when

"3. A given permanent allowance or life annuity in old age, commencing at the period when the sick allowance ceases.

"4. A sum of money, payable after the death of members, usually termed, "Funeral Money."

"5. Endowments for children, in the shape either of a loan of money, or of an annuity, payable at some given age, such as 14, or 21. Tables and rules for the insurance of all these benefits may be easily supplied."

Is there any thing in this plan contrary to the laws or the spirit of the Divine Head of the Church? Has he not said, "The poor ye have always with you, and when ye will, ye may do them good." Sickness will come—death will reign—the wailings of orphanage and widowhood in poverty will be heard—call not in the aid of poor-laws, but acknowledge the righteous claims of christian brotherhood, and efficiently meet them. Have the means ready. Those poor christians who object to Secret Confederations, even for avowed benevolent purposes, on the ground of their anti-christian character, could not consent to receive their charities, were they possessed. Where shall they look for aid?

Christianity has no secret distinctions—it imposes no secrets—it glories in publicity—it abhors "the awfulness of ceremonies of initiation" into secret lodges—the pre-promises to keep things unknown—the follies and darkness of all secret orders, ancient, or modern;—and yet the world is informed that in the latter, as now constituted, —in them only, can honor, and true friendship, and disinterested love, and perfect sincerity, be found! Therefore,—but,—"What communion hath light with darkness?" "Or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" It is notorious that the secret orders are composed of both professed believers of the christian revelation, and of the professed disbelievers of the christian religion. These societies are associations of religious and irreligious persons, and they are united by terms, promises, pledges, and awful obligations, in entire contrariety to christianity. If any member of a Secret Society denies these allegations, he cannot be credited without proof derived from character and the secret doings of the Secret Societies.

The churches are greatly at fault. Because of the necessity of securing provision for sickness and age, many pious people have connected themselves with secret orders, all of which are, in part, Benevolent Societies. When remonstrated with for so doing, they have replied—"We admit all you say, as to their dangerous tendency; but what are we to do for our families?—If there were Benefit Societies in the churches, we should, of course, unite with them. What can we do?—it is the duty of all, especially the poor, to make what provision they can against the painful contingencies of this uncertain world; and, no one can deny that the Scriptures warrant such prudential arrangements."

We venture to affirm that the church was designed to be a certain dependence for its poor members. "The poor ye always have with you, and when ye will ye may do them good." The will is wanting—not the means; therefore the duty of obedience is always present—the consequence of disobedience is not far off.

Early English Methodism excelled in benevolence—"The Strangers' Friend Society," for the relief of strangers and the poor, not Methodists, did infinite good—the poor of the Methodist Societies were relieved from another fund. In this country, we have known Methodists and members of other churches to be sent to an Alms-house where they died. Of the members of such churches, it could not be truly said—"No one liveth to himself." Nor could they say—"We are all members one of another." It is the saying of a good man: I consider a generous mind as the noblest work of the creation. A man whose mind is warped by the selfish passions, or contracted by the narrow prejudices of sects or parties, if he does not want honesty, must undoubtedly want understanding. W. S. S.

July 3, 1847.

Death by Lightning.—During a thunder shower on Sunday, a grocery store was struck by lightning, at Fort Edwards, N. Y., and five men therein were instanly killed. Three others were severely injured.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Thoughts on the Existence of God.

The power of thought—the throne of reason—the judgment of man, must teach him that chance could not have created him thus pre-eminently above all other beings of earth. For almost every faculty of his senses conveys to him conclusive evidence of the existence of a divine directing power, from all eternity. His eye can trace back, on a record of five thousand eight hundred and forty-six years and a few months, between this moment and the formation of our globe—and almost an unbroken chain of events of his own species. It can there behold the hanging up in the high heavens the resplendent luminary to light and nourish all creation; of the magnificent vault filled with sparkling worlds, and graced with a lunar orb, to reign Queen of future night. Of the matter which composes our earth, most wisely and beautifully divided into land, water, hill & valley and covered with beings innumerable: Various in their natures, and ever faithful to their special and peculiar provinces. Of a globe distinctly classed into kingdoms of animals, vegetables, and minerals, most exquisitely and perfectly arranged; and adorned with every object that the imagination can fancy or pen portray. Of a division of time into light and darkness. Of the regular succession of seasons adapted to the life and prosperity of the vegetable world. Of the revolving of planets with due precision in each alternate motion, or movement, and of the most perfect harmony through every system. He can listen to the thunder's roar, and see the lightning's flash, "the red artillery of heaven," as if threatning, in a single instant, the destruction of the comparatively small globe on which he lives; causing him to shudder with indiscribable awe at the sublime grandeur of the scene, and raise his eyes and hands to heaven in supplication to the great ruler, to spare his existence. He can hearken to the feathered tribe, as if offering a daily tribute of praises to their Creator. To the howlings of the storm over the "returnless waves of a troubled ocean,"—causing man on his little bark, to look above and exclaim in the humility of his heart with Peter "save me oh God! or I perish." His feet can feel the frightful shock of a volcanic eruption, and endeavor to shun with horror the fatality of an earthquake which sometimes seems to shake all nature to its centre. But, should these united evidences of his senses without the aid of divine revelation still leave him sceptical, let him hearken to the never failing monitor within him, the dictates of his own heart, which frequently evince a moral sense of right & wrong, e'en in the savage, causes self approbation while doing right, and a biting sting for doing wrong. That declares to him how impossible it is for him to explain or comprehend, with all his knowledge, e'en his own structure, the action of mind upon matter, and but comparatively few of the numerous phenomena throughout extended creation. That shames him with the fact of his credulous belief in almost every romanic fable of some human exploit—at once crediting, by preference, the doings and sayings of man, and scanning and denying the word and power of God!! That whispers to him to kneel down and worship the omnipotent Creator of heaven and earth, with the praises of his tongue and humility of his heart. But a question or two if you please, Mr. Atheist, if chance, or accident bro't this world, and all that invests it into being: Why did it not commence sooner?—Why when it did, or why at all? And why is it not still engaged in making more worlds? And why has it not created any single species of new beings since the creation of our world? Which I'm satisfied it has not, nor can I believe it until demonstrably proved. Else why should chance so miraculously inspire ONLY NOAH and his family, to go into an Ark, and so accurately prescribe a pair of every living creature, that they might escape the universal deluge, which swept off every other object? And further, why have not these philosophers, and chymists of chance, been able to create one of those flies that buz about my face while I write, and breathe into it the breath of life,—or continue the existence of any man or creature for one SINGLE hour after vitality had actually ceased? But, granting the existence of a God, which I truly believe, no rational, candid mind can doubt, or deny,—man must of necessity admit the immortality of the soul. Hence his own fallen state—hence a redemption through a saviour.—Hence the authenticity of divine revelation—hence a code of right and wrong—and hence the doctrine of rewards and punishments. For so closely are the Deity and his attributes associated, that to destroy one of them is to disavow him entirely, and we are without faith, without hope and lowered to a common level with the brute and wander forlorn through the deep—dark shades of an awful—eternal gloom.

Disgraceful Swindle.—The captain of a canal boat chartered by an emigrant company at Albany to carry to Buffalo a load of German emigrants, decamped on Thursday with the whole amount of freight money, leaving the boat, with its load, tied to the dock.

Memoriablia.—Sunday, June 11, is remarkable as the aniversary of sundry memorable events. On the 11th of July, 1806, the celebrated duel between Aaron Burr and Alexander Hamilton, which proved fatal to the latter, was fought.—John Quincy Adams was born July 11th, 1767, and was consequently 80 years of age on Sunday. Hon. Timothy Farrar, of Hollis, N. H., and Dr. Ezra Green, of Dover, N. H., both completed their 100th year on the 11th instant, and are both graduates of Harvard University. A striking fact!

Reformatory.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Br. Bassett: This is the first time I have asked the use of your columns although a regular reader of your paper since its commencement; and would not thus intrude upon your readers, but for the desire of suppressing the use of the noxious weed.

It is known to most of your readers that the Pittsburgh Conference holds its next session at the Capital of our little County. It is also known to many members of the Conference that the Methodist Protestant Church in that village is feeble in point of numercial strength, and consequently the Conference will be dependant upon the hospitality of the members of other churches and the citizens generally for their accommodations during the session. Therefore the obvious propriety of the members demeaning themselves so as to make their society agreeable and interesting to those families, in which they may happen to be inmates during the session, & hence the necessity of laying aside those filthy quids, and smoking fire brands that often annoy civil society.

This is proverbially an age of reformation and improvement, and we who are called reformers ought to reform in this particular.

I have no doubt but the citizens of Waynesburgh will take great pleasure in entertaining the Conference in a manner in perfect keeping with their characteristic hospitality; and I hope and pray that the session may come off in a manner that will make a favorable impression upon the place; and shall be very sorry indeed if the most lasting impressions made should be those of holes burnt in their carpets or tobacco spittle on partition walls.

Fancy now, a Baptist or Presbyterian family sends up a call for persons to come and dine. Down goes Superintendent and lusty Delegate and haply on his way takes out his pouch and between his lips that ought be filled with heaven's praises envelopes a piece of pig-tail: No sooner seated in parlor snug, with legs at right angles, and head and chin at counterpoise, begins to eject the surplus liquid at short intervals against window blinds, clock case or other furniture, to the great annoyance of the family, and perhaps the little urchin just beginning to crawl dressed up clean and tidy for the occasion, while the mistress is setting dinner, crawls through the filthy fluids collected in puddles on the floor. Thus the good family believing in the promise of the good book and hoping that by sending for these strangers they might entertain angels unawares, (to use the language of Br. C. Springer) find themselves very badly bored.

And then for the ministerial members, who are commanded to let no filthy communication proceed out of their mouth, to be promenading around with cigars in their lips, like a group of city blacklegs, with the offensive tobacco smoke issuing out at their craters, as if they were so many volcanoes!

And then how ridiculous does it seem, to hear a minister lecturing his audience for not giving up all their luxuries and appropriating the proceeds to the charities of the day. And yet he spends his money almost daily in offering whole burnt offerings to the God of a popular vice!

We throw out these coarse remarks hoping as it comes from this quarter it will be heeded. That circuits will have an eye to this matter in selecting delegates, and ministers take the hint in time. Yours, respectfully,

DECENCY PRUDENCIA.

TOBACCO.

The following views respecting the injurious effects of tobacco, we copy from the Thirteenth Annual Report of that distinguished philanthropist and physician, Dr. Samuel B. Woodward, late superintendent of the State Lunatic Hospital at Worcester.

If men cannot be induced to abandon the use of this vile weed, let children, at least, be saved from contracting a relish for it. The use of tobacco, in whatever form, is injurious to health, incompatible with cleanliness, and offensive to decency. It is equally repulsive to the outward senses and disgusting to the inward tastes. The practice of smoking, or chewing, is never indulged without downright injustice to others. What right has any man to becloud the atmosphere to my eyes by his smoke, to inundate the floor where I stand with his saliva, or to fill the air which I breathe with the particles or the effluvium of his vile powder? It is true, there is a limited space around every man—some two or three inches—which he may rightfully call his own, and use as he pleases. If I thrust my eyes or nose within that circle, and get befouled or bestenched, it is my own fault. But this space is limited. A man has no right to three leagues—the extent of national jurisdiction out to sea. A man has no right to leave a track of poisoned air, a mile long, behind him. A man has no right to defile his mouth, and begrime his teeth, and then take them on a journey with him in a puplic conveyance. If a man will use his nose as a depos-it for snuff, common politeness requires that he should encase it in parchment, and tie it tightly with a string, so as not to offend decent people. Had Nature designed the nose for a snuff-hole, she would have put it on the other end up, or at least have furnished it with a constrictory muscle, as a sphincter, by which it could be closed.

Above all ought school teachers to abstain from the filthy habit of using tobacco in any form. They cannot teach physiology and use tobacco at the same time, without undoing by their example what they enjoin by their precepts. Let them improve all occasions to excite a disgust for it, and hold it up to the odium and contempt of their pupils. In this way they will help forward civilization quite as much as by teaching grammar and geography.

At a late school convention in the State of N. York, a resolution was introduced, declaring that any man who habitually uses tobacco is disqualified from being a school teacher.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

From the Missionary Herald.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The General Letter of this mission has at length been received. This document shows that the whole number of persons admitted to the churches from the beginning is 33,198; of whom 5,485 have died; while about the same number are under censure; making the present number of communicants in regular standing nearly 23,000. The number reported as being admitted to the church during the year which preceded the annual meeting, was 1,789.

Letters have also been received from Messrs. Alexander and Hunt, who have charge of the seminary at Lahainaluna. They state that God has graciously smiled upon that institution. Mr. Alexander says, under date of November 12, "Many of our pupils have manifested deep concern for their souls' salvation; and several give pleasing evidence that they have found the pearl of great price. Among the latter are some of the most promising young men in the nation."—He also writes, "Our theological class has eight members, three of whom I hope will be licensed to preach next spring."

From a letter of Mr. Lowel Smith, dated Honolulu, November 28, the following extract is taken:

The last two or three years have been a time to try men's souls in Honolulu. Still a goodly number of professed followers of Christ have stood firm, and evinced an attachment to his cause which the political revolutions have not been able to undermine. As soldiers of the cross they have not deserted their posts, but have attended regularly to the duties of the sanctuary, the weekly prayer meetings, church meetings, and the monthly concert, and and have been ready unto every good work. But this cannot be said of all. Some have been unstable as the wind, and have gone after the Beast and False Prophet. Some have returned to a species of idolatry; others have become atheistical, and have forsaken even the form of godliness.

Sin and death have made large inroads into this Second Church of Honolulu, within the last two years. The epidemic influenza prevailed throughout the Island in the spring and summer of 1845. During that year one hundred and thirteen members of this church were removed by death; and forty have died the present year.—Fifty-six were excommunicated in 1845, and thirty have been cut off from the privileges of the church since the commencement of 1846. In the mean time about one hundred persons have been received to Christian fellowship on profession of their faith, and some thirty-five or forty on certificate. The whole number of communicants in regular standing at the present time is a little less than twelve hundred.

During the year 1845, this church contributed two hundred dollars for the support of the preached gospel, and fourteen dollars to aid in repairing the meeting house at Waialua. They have also rethached their own house of worship, a job considered worth one hundred and fifty dollars.

A letter has been received from Mr. Baldwin, dated Lahaina, December 15, which furnishes the following extract:

In July we commenced the rebuilding of our house of worship. At first we merely intended to tear down the leaning, tottering steeple, (which was erected after, and independent of, the main building,) shingle the roof and put on a cupola for the bell, &c., all at an expense of two thousand dollars, in addition to much labor to be performed by the people. We began the work, tore off the thatch, and four men mounted the steeple to throw down the stone work. We now, for the first time, saw what mischief the heavy stone steeple had done to the whole building, drawing after it the gable end and all of the roof. Still we went on. The four men kept at work, till all at once the steeple and heavy gable end started with them. A chain through the building, strained and ready to break before, brought all up and saved their lives. I told the natives not to go up again. But after I had left, they consulted together, and concluded in their simplicity, that my plan of cutting the chain and letting all go would ruin some of the timbers which were greatly needed for rebuilding; and that, if they went up and prayed on the top of the steeple, the Lord would take care of them. They did so and took all down safely!

We were also obliged to take down one-third of the walls of the church to the foundation.—But the people have not been slothful or dilatory. They went to the mountains for wood and into the ocean for limestone. With no chiefs among them, as in the days when good old Hoapilt built this church, their cheerfulness, activity, zeal and perseverance have far exceeded my highest hopes. They have contributed money too with great delight. I have already paid the head carpenter $2,000, and the mason (a native) $100. The natives did all the stone work, and it is well done. Our whole bills to the carpenter will amount to nearly $4,050. We have sent to New Haven for a clock, which I hope will be a great benefit to the whole of this timeless village.

Educational.

Constitution of the Board of National Popular Education.

Art. I. The object of the board shall be to promote National Popular Education, by such means as may seem suited to that end, and especially by taking measures to supply well qualified teachers to places destitute of them. Its concerns shall be managed by twenty-five Directors, who shall have power to fill vacancies in their own body, and who shall choose a President, two Vice Presidents, a Secretary and a Treasurer. The Board of Directors shall meet semi-annually, and oftener, if requested, in writing, by the Executive Committee. Seven shall constitute a quorum.

Art. II. There shall be an Executive Committee, composed of five members, to be chosen annually by the Board of Directors. In case of a failure to elect, at the proper time, the members of the Committee shall continue in office until the election shall be made. The Executive Committee shall manage the affairs of the Board when it is not in session,—shall report their doings to the Board, at its semi-annual meetings, and oftener if required, and shall at all times be subject to its control. The Committee shall choose its own Chairman and Secretary, and fill vacancies in those offices whenever they may occur. It shall appoint its own meetings, and three of its members shall constitute a quorum.

Art. III. The Executive Committee shall, by themselves, or by such other person or persons as they may designate for the purpose, decide upon the applications which may be made by persons desiring to be employed as teachers, under the patronage of the Board, and direct to what places the persons selected, shall be sent, respectively.

Art. IV. The funds to be raised by the Board shall be appropriated to the support of such agencies as may be necessary to carry out the purposes herein contemplated, and to defray the expense, as far as may be necessary, of the preparation of teachers and of their journies to their respective places of teaching. No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but upon a written order of the Chairman of the Executive Committee, or of such persons as that Committee may authorize to draw for the same—except as hereinafter provided.

Art. V. There shall be a General Agent appointed by the Board of Directors, to be removable at their pleasure; whose duty it shall be to visit different parts of the country, for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of their educational wants; awakening interest in the subject of Popular Education; forming auxilliary associations to aid in finding and preparing places for teachers, and like associations for the purpose of raising funds to effect the objects of this association; and, in general, to labor in promoting the cause of Popular Education, by all the means in his power, as Providence may give him opportunity. He may appoint such subordinate agents as he shall find necessary to aid in carrying out the objects of the association, fix the compensation for their services, and draw orders on the Treasurer therefor;—Provided that such appointments and compensations shall be subject to the approval of the Executive Committee. He shall correspond with the Executive Committee, be subject to its direction, make an annual report to the Board of Directors, and receive from the funds of the association such compensation for his services as shall be determined by the Board.

Art. VI. All teachers to be received under the patronage of the Board shall be of unexceptionable moral & religious character. It expects from them the daily use of the Bible in their several schools, as the basis of that sound Christian education, to the support and extension of which, it is hereby solemnly pledged. Neither the Executive Committee, nor any individual officer or member of this association, as such, shall recommend any other book or publication, for the use of teachers, or schools, or for libraries.

Art. VII. There shall be an annual meeting of the Board, at such time and place as the Executive Committee may designate; of which the Committee shall give notice in writing, to each member of the Board, and also public notice in one or more newspapers, as they may deem proper;—at which meeting the annual report of the General Agent shall be presented, and the annual elections, herein provided for, shall be made.

Art. VIII. This constitution may be altered or amended by a vote of two-thirds of the members of the Board of Directors present at any annual meeting of the Board.

Mode of Suppressing Gambling and Profanity.

The following extracts from a colporteur's letter may give a valuable hint to travellers who are annoyed by profanity and gambling:

"While travelling on a steamboat, I found the crew and most of the passengers very profane. I commenced distributing Tracts, telling those to whom I gave them to change them when they had read them. I think each Tract was read by five or six persons. I remained on the boat twelve hours, and did not hear another oath. I talked with them in groups and privately, and was kindly treated. One man going to the Far West requested all who did not wish to keep their Tracts, to give them to him.

"At P. I took another boat. As soon as I went on board a young man entered into conversation with me, using an oath in every sentence. In all my intercourse with men, I never heard one so profane. I handed him a tract on profane swearing, when he turned pale and trembled before me. He sat down and read it, and I heard no more oaths from him. I soon found a number playing at cards. I went to the table and laid some Tracts on it. Their cards soon disappeared, and they all commenced reading. I laid a number in the window of the bar-room, and told those standing by that I wanted them all to read them. It stopped the drinking, gambling, and swearing, while I was on the boat. I heard them say, 'We must look out, for there is a preacher aboard.'—Would it not be well for every Christian to arm himself with such cheap and useful weapons when travelling? It would save him from being annoyed with profane language, prevent much actual sin, and be the means, in the hands of God, of saving souls from death. It would literally be casting bread on the waters.—American Messenger.

Religious Intelligence.

PITTSBURGH DISTRICT.

Steubenville, July 22, 1847.

Br. Bassett: The toils of the Conference year, with me are past. I have done my best and meant it well. God in mercy brought me home to my family on the 20th instant. I am some little unwell. I need fatherly corrections as I go along. I began the year with a bilious fever, and have closed my labors up north, with chills and fever. My chill is just now over—not a hard one this time.

In this last tour I visited the Legonier, Johnstown, Susquehanna, Clarion, Conneaut, and New Castle appointments. The second and last of these places, have suffered much the past year, for want of preachers, i. e. they have not grown—have been much discouraged. The Conference certainly will do them ample justice in due time. The other places visited, have struggled with some difficulties, but our superintendents have been faithful, and those difficulties have, by the Divine blessing, been surmounted, and they are now in a state of peace, and have some degree of prosperity—some increase.

All things considered, our Conference has much cause for gratitude to God. We now have peace, I think, in all the circuits and stations. This opens the way for prosperity. Our preachers stand well among the people. I think will be found at Conference, to have received a better support than formerly. This they should have, and our people will give it when they understand their duty, and feel their moral obligations as they should. So far as I know, our preachers have been blessed with good health this year, and none have died. The wife of our good Br. Wood, of the Conneaut circuit, has been seriously ill, for more than half the year, and his horse died, and he kept up his appointments on foot. This Brother has struggled on, amid more difficulties this year, than any other Brother in the district, and deserves some sympathy from the church, in a tangible form.

Well, here I sit, half sick, thinking matters over. Will our superintendents bring the numbers in society to Conference? Will they bring a good Conference collection? What will they do for the Aid Society? What for our afflicted Brother Shinn? Brethren, think of these things, and do your best.

This whole Conference, has a good standing with sister churches, and with the public generally. Our principles are better known, and more loved than ever heretofore. Our calling is a noble one. It is our calling, to build up true religion, and religious liberty, both together. Let us promote christian alliance, but never at the expense of our principles.

I am not now able to say more.

I am, &c., GEO. BROWN.

OHIO DISTRICT.

Gilboa, Putnam Co., Ohio, July 14, '47.

Br. Bassett: I wish to inform our brethren through your paper, how we are getting along on this circuit. We held our third quarterly meeting on the 12th and 13th of June, and we had quite a reviving time. We were assisted with the labors of Brother Besse, who labored effectively and satisfactorily to all his hearers. We protracted our effort until Tuesday evening, and the membership were much revived, and some backsliders reclaimed, and four gave us their names, which makes twenty members that we have received this year. May the good Lord prosper the church here more abundantly.

Our last quarterly meeting will be held on the 21st and 22d of August, in the town of Gilboa, and we respectively invite Brothers A. Besse, J. Swaney, L. Ensminger, and G. M. Hunt.—Here I feel like urging the Macedonian cry, Come over and help us, for we are almost beginning to tremble, fearing that we shall not have ministerial aid. May the Lord revive us at that meeting.

Yours in the bonds of christian fellowship,

J. L. BORTON.

Greenville Mission, July 21, 1847.

Br. Bassett: Having to write on business, I desire to communicate, through the Recorder, to the friends of Zion, something of our proceedings on this Mission. We are yet alive and health improving. The symptoms of spiritual death have been somewhat alarming; and indeed, as yet, the eye only shows a favorable appearance, while the heart is still struggling with the dread monster; and although you see him loved and cherished by the gay and giddy throng, while he enfolds them in his cold embrace, infusing his poison through every breath, you will not find him among devils in hell. But unfortunately for the church, he has ever found a hiding place within her walls somewhere, and though often unseen, its poisonous effects are felt through the body.—O, unbelief, thou bane of public peace and domestic happiness, may the Lord rebuke thee and stay the plague from among us! We have held several two days' meetings, and enjoyed the faithful labors of Brother Young our President, and father Flood. We had a very good meeting,—a few accessions to the church, though no great excitement, yet peace and harmony. We intend holding a camp-meeting. By the vote of the Quarterly Conference, it is to be held in conjunction with our last Quarterly Meeting, to be held in the neighborhood of Brother Young, ten miles west of Greenville, in Randolph county, Ia., near the State line, and two miles north of the State Road, commencing on the last Wednesday in August, to which we invite Brothers J. Flood, I. Hunt, T. Thornburg, W. Williams, F. Outcalt, and all other brethren that can make it suit them, will favor us with their help. Now, brethren, come over and help us.

Yours, in love,

S. P. KEZERTA.

Xenia, July 20, 1847.

Br. Bassett: I embrace the opportunity to communicate a few things, concerning our field of labor. Since my last communication, I have visited six circuits, and two missions. Commencing on Portage circuit, May 8th, found Brother Swaney laboring as usual acceptably in his charge. Tried to preach in Perrysburg, also at the Forks of Portage river, thence across the Black Swamp to Freeport, where we held a two days' meeting. Here we enjoyed a pleasant time with our friends, but no special out-pouring of the Spirit. Left for Mt. Blanchard, May 15th,—stept over the Conference line and preached at Rome. Stopped with our old friend J. Guest,—travelled on to the place of destination. Here we commenced a five day's meeting, which resulted in the conversion of fifteen persons. I trust the benefits of this meeting will be seen in great eternity. It is just to say, Brother Besse was in the spirit of the work. On the 20th of May, took my leave of many kind friends, and set out for Richwood circuit; reached the place of meeting in Millville. Received five members,—all things considered, the meeting was a good one. Dr. Howel came over to our help and rendered good service.—Brother Peat is quite successful in preaching the perfect law of liberty: some have gladly received the word. May they be steadfast in the Apostle's doctrine in breaking bread and prayers.—Here Brother Peat presented me a copy of the "Sacred Melodion," for which he has our thanks. Having examined this new production, I recommend it as being well adapted to social and revival meetings. Perhaps it is not excelled by any similar work now in use. On Friday morning, set out for Union circuit. Our meeting being held at Middleburg, I stopped with my old friend J. Inskip, while many thoughts rushed on my mind, concerning one with whom we had taken sweet counsel. I looked, and looked,—but, ah! that noble form, expressive countenance, generous heart, and liberal hand, are palsied in death. She is no more to be seen at the family altar or the house of prayer. Hester is gone to her reward. Our meeting here was attended with the Divine presence. Some professed conversion and joined the church; among others a blind man, who by misfortune lost his sight, came to the altar of prayer, where his spiritual understanding was opened, and his soul made to rejoice in salvation. At this meeting we held a most glorious communion. Many felt the spiritual presence of Christ, whose death we commemorated. Set out for Springfield circuit, reached the meeting held at Harmony, in good time. Met with Br. Rose, Smith and Thornburg, who rendered good service.

The church at this place is small, but steadfast in the faith; not hearers only, but doers of the work. During our meeting all hearts flowed together in holy fellowship, while the Divine Being manifested his spiritual presence; sinners felt the shock, and saints rejoiced. To God be all the glory.

Brother O. P. Stephens is prospering as well as could be expected under the circumstances.—Having closed this meeting, we set out in good spirits for Mad River Mission,—reached the appointment June 10th—found Brother Ensminger doing well on his mission. Stayed two days and enjoyed a glorious time,—received three members, and left for Miami circuit. Here the blessing of God was manifested, sinners were awakened, believers rejoiced, while a few joined the church. May the presence of God be with our kind friends at Logansville. After an absence of ten weeks I reached home, found my family in usual health. During my stay at home, I attended four meetings, received six members. All things considered, Greenville Mission, is doing well under the labors of Brother Kezerta. Hitherto the Lord has been with us—may his presence go with us to the end.

Yours in love,

JOHN M. YOUNG.

INDIANA DISTRICT.

Driftwood Mission, Ia., July 13, 1847.

Br. Bassett: Permit me to say through the Recorder that religion is in a low ebb in this Mission; but we are in a thriving way, though we are but young here. We were organised about two years ago, under the superintendence of Br. B. Wilson. We have become some acquainted with our book of discipline, and we are well satisfied with its present form, and would be glad if all the church was of the same mind. We are somewhat like the young lady that wanted to get married, but her mother told her that those that married did well, but those who did not, did better. The reply of the daughter was, I wish to do well. As our government is good, we are contented with it.

Yours,

ANDREW THOMAS.

WABASH DISTRICT.

Crawfordsville circuit, July 21, 1847.

Br. Jos. Shipp, President Wabash District: I would say through the Recorder, that Crawfordsville circuit bids fair to prosper. Since we bid farewell at Conference, I have passed through scenes dark and drear. Dear Brother, I was near the River of Death: while there I was as the rock in the ocean—lashed by the waves of life's tempestuous sea—with security—like assurance—doubly sure did I repose in the arm of Almighty Benevolence. That arm sustained, it raised me. Brother Shipp, our circuit has had its share of trouble. The winter is now past—the spring has come, no cloud darkens our sky—peace reigns—Brotherly love continues. We found it necessary in order to sustain and perpetuate our "feeble concern" to expel and drop between thirty and forty persons whose names we found on the class papers. Some may say we did wrong. We used as much prudence and caution as we could. I am of the opinion that our strength does not lay in numbers but in character. I love the membership—they have not forgotten me. Crawfordsville circuit contains the elements of greatness, enjoying wealth, mind, and moral character, to a liberal extent. The ct. is Methodist Protestant, and no mistake.

Our fourth quarterly meeting will be held at Brother Bireley's, in Putnam county, Ia., Sept. 25, 26; all of our brethren in adjoining circuits are requested to attend.

Will A. Collins, and J. K. Dawson attend at Brother Vice's, September 12th, at 11 o'clock, and Brother Ellis' same day, at 4?

T. S. FALKINBURGE.

God Everywhere.

Lord Craven lived in London when the last great plague raged. His house was in that part of the town called Craven Buildings. To avoid the threatened danger, his lordship resolved to retire to the country. His coach and six were accordingly at the door, the luggage put up, and all things ready for the journey. As he was walking through his hall, with his hat on, his cane under his arm, and putting on his gloves, in order to step into his carriage, he overheard his negro, (who served him as a postillion,) saying to another servant, "I suppose by my lord's quitting London to avoid the plague, that his God lives in the country, and not in town." The poor negro said this in the simplicity of his heart, as really believing in a plurality of gods. The speech, however, forcibly struck Lord C. and made him pause. "My God," thought he, "lives everywhere, and can preserve me in the town as well as in the country; I'll stay where I am. The ignorance of that poor fellow has preached a useful sermon to me. Lord, pardon that unbelief, and that distrust of thy providence, which made me think of running away from thy hand." Immediately he ordered the horses to be taken off from the coach, and the luggage to be brought in. He continued in London, and was remarkably useful among his neighbors, and never caught the infection.—Bicknell's Reporter.

Caution to Ice-Creamers.—The Nantucket Inquirer of the 9th instant, says: "A quantity of lemon ice-cream had been put into a tin freezer, on Tuesday morning, & allowed to remain there, in a liquid state, until Wednesday noon, when it was frozen, and about thirty gentlemen and ladies ate pretty freely of the cream. The consequence was, that they were all made sick, a few of them so severely, that for an hour or two during the night, it was feared they would not recover.—All, however, are now convalescent. The action of the acid in the mixture on the tin lining of the freezer, for more than twenty-four hours, produced an active poison, and the sufferers may congratulate themselves that they escaped with only being made sick. A tin vessel of vanilla cream stood unfrozen in the same way, from Tuesday till Wednesday, but those who ate of that were not at all injured by it."

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, JULY 29, 1847.

To Correspondents.—It is strange that some writers do not save themselves the trouble of sending articles for publication, without entrusting with us their proper names. They need not expect their articles to appear in the columns of our paper unless this is done. This is a universal rule with editors.

We regret to say to our friend who writes 'The Church of Divine Origin,' we do not think that his article would do either him or us credit.

Several correspondents will have to exercise patience, as we have much on hand. And those who subject us to the trouble of preparing their articles for the press, ought to wait longest.

Information Wanted—Statistics of Conferences.—We are about publishing the Annual Register of the M. P. Church, for the year 1848, and are anxious to obtain, in view of this publication, the statistics of those Annual Conferences which have not published their Minutes in full. We desire to have the name of the President of each Conference, the number of Stations, Circuits, Missions, Itinerant ministers and preachers, Unstationed ministers and preachers, Members, and houses of worship in each District. Also, the time and place of the next session of each Annual Conference. If the secretaries, or any other having the information, will communicate it to us without delay, we shall be greatly obliged, and will be pleased to reciprocate the favor in any possible way.

Death of an Editor.—Our Philadelphia papers come to us this week in mourning for the death of Joseph C. Neal, Esq., Editor of Neal's Saturday Gazette. He fell by an attack of congestion of the brain, on Saturday, 17th inst, aged 40 years. Bicknell's Reporter says he has not left an enemy behind, for he was all gentleness, truth and honor. The Saturday Gleaner speaks of him as kind-hearted, and full of noble qualities. So say all his brethren of the Philadelpia press.

Lost, or Stolen.—Br. A. Crooks, a worthy travelling minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection has lost a very desirable travelling animal, a black mare, about fourteen hands high. She disappeared from a pasture in the vicinity of West Zanesville, a few nights ago. From circumstances it is feared she was stolen. She had no particular mark, save one on the right side, caused by the saddle. Br. C. offers to reward any one who will return the animal or give information that she may be obtained. He can be addressed at Zanesville.

Sad Case.—Brother J. S. Hudson, writes us under date Columbus, July 17th: "On Saturday, P. M., I called on a dear brother, William Cook, formerly of Oberlin—found him cheerful and happy,—said he would call around and take me to meeting, at half past ten, next morning. I waited till all bells had done tolling—went alone. One of the first announcements of the minister was that the eldest son of Brother William Cook, aged fifteen, and a member of the congregation, (2d Presbyterian Church,) was drowned last evening, whilst bathing, and would be buried at half-past four. What a shock!"

The Ohio Statesman says that the youth was not missed till the company of bathers were prepared to leave for home, when his clothes were seen on the shore. Search was made continually through the night by the afflicted father, and by Messrs. Bateham and Eaton, and a few other active friends. Next morning a large number of people assembled, and dragged the river with a seine. At 9 o'clock, the body was recovered.

The State Journal represents the deceased as a lad of more than ordinary promise. He was amiable and pious, had sometime since experienced converting grace, and had been for eighteen months a consistent member of the Church of Christ.

Slip-slide-i-fi-ca-tion.—The Protestant Monitor, Greenville, Ill., made that word. He applies it to one J. W. Beshor, heretofore known as a preacher in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, and elsewhere. The Monitor says he has been an Episcopal Methodist, a Protestant Methodist, a Campbellite, a Presbyterian, and now he has joined the Holy Mother Church. He says he has found the truth at last. It is said that Mr. B. is still young, and that he has performed all this amount of slip-slide-i-fi-ca-tion, in a very short time. This being the case, he may "slip" and "slide" yet more, if the Holy Mother does not support him well.

Mortality.—The Zanesville Gazette states that within a few months, the Recorder, Treasurer, and one of the Associate Judges of Clarke county have died. Wish the names of those gentlemen had been given.

Fire At Gallipolis.—On the 15th inst. a fire broke out at Gallipolis, by which the Gallia Academy, and the store building of Mr. J. W. Smith were entirely consumed.

Correction.—Br. J. C. Hazlet desires us to correct an error or two which appeared in an obituary of Mr. Bushfield which we published two weeks ago. "In 1836, (not 1816) Elizabeth was removed from him by death. In 1838, (not 1818) he was married again, to Mary Donley."

John Carnes.—The Zanesville Courier states that a letter has been received by Mr. Hoge, the P. M. of that place, representing that a young man named John Carnes was so badly burned on the steamer, Wheel of Fortune, which was consumed by fire on the 11th inst, in the Ohio river, below Rockport, Ia., that he died in 12 hours. He stated before he died that he had formerly lived in or near Zanesville, that he had since been in two or three battles in Mexico. Should the friends of the deceased observe this notice, they can obtain information from Mr. Hoge.

Rail Road Disaster.—We learn by the Urbana Gazette that the freight train on the Mad River Rail Road, lately ran upon a large stick of timber. The shock was so great that the engineer was thrown forward on the locomotive, and almost instantly killed. This took place ten miles north of Kenton. The name of the engineer is not given.

Bethany College, Va.—The annual commencement of this institution recently took place, as we learn by the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate. An invitation was communicated, for the Methodist Episcopal Conference, in session at Wellsburgh, Va., to visit the Institution, and to supply ministers to officiate on the Sabbath. Br. Hunter, of the Advocate informs us that it fell to his lot in connection with another brother, to perform that service. He gives an interesting account in his last paper, of his Sabbath at Bethany. This place is well known as the residence of the Rev. Alexander Campbell, who is now absent in Europe. The College, we believe is of his getting up, and is under the control we presume, of the denomination calling themselves 'Disciples.' It is said to be in prosperous condition, with over one hundred students. Friend Hunter enjoyed a very pleasant sojourn with the families of Mr. Campbell, and Professor Pendleton, son-in-law of Mr. C. and speaks in the highest terms of their friendliness and hospitality. But especially did he enjoy the religious devotions of the Sabbath, and he particularly refers to the circumstance that in the celebration of the Lord's Supper after preaching, the officiating brethren, quite to his surprise, waited upon himself and his other Methodist companion, with both the bread and the wine, though they had not been baptised by immersion. He expresses gratification that this improvement has taken place in the views and feelings of the Disciples of late. Bethany is about seven miles east of Wellsburg, and not far from the Pennsylvania line.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Ministers of the Methodist Protestant Church.

Dear Brethren: The Methodist Protestant Church has existed long enough, and has a membership sufficiently extensive, to require a religious literature of its own, of every description. Especially is it desirable, that, when our membership seek religious improvement, by the perusal of a sermon, they should not be necessitated to repair to the publications of authors in other Churches, to procure the kind of reading matter they require. Such a necessity for the help of others continued on, would naturally, in process of time, though it might be, insensibly, beget a feeling of disparagement, and suggest an idea of inferiority in our Churches, impairing their confidence in the worthy system of government they have espoused. It has seemed therefore to me, that as far as may be, our members should be furnished, by ministers of their own Church, with sermons, in different styles of address, and upon the varied topics of religious knowledge, suited to different tastes and attainments. The expediency of this measure does not however commend it so much, as does its promise of usefulness. How many of our members hear one sermon only preached in a month; and how desirable is it, that during the three remaining Sabbaths of the month, when without a meeting, and at home in their families, a volume of useful and interesting sermons should be at hand, by the profitable reading of which, they may supply the lack of sanctuary services, and fill up with advantage to themselves the vacant hours of the sacred Sabbath? The children of our membership too,—many of them better educated than were their parents, and most of them of an inquisitive turn, have, in common with the youth in general of the present day, acquired a taste for reading; and if not furnished with literature more solid and profitable, will indulge their reading propensities, by devouring that literary trash, under the name of novels, which is ruinous alike to mind and morals:—and how worthy of an effort it is, to supercede, and to drive out of the families of our friends, these wretched publications, by a book of sermons, which, with all the interest of romance, and all the tenderness of fiction, may also have all the reality of essential truth. In this particular department of religious literature, however,—sermons, in subject and style, interesting, affecting, or impressive, we as a religious denomination, are deficient. Williams has given us an interesting history:—in polemic Divinity, Shinn has done a great work:—Whiteheads' Wesleys fills well the biographical department:—Snethens' sermons will never fail to be read with great zest by those persons who have logical minds and a classic taste; but he is too profound, and requires too continuous attention, for common readers. To these there needs to be added,—to meet the tastes of all,—a series of discourses, suited to a large class of readers among us,—who are tired, or never had a love of controversy, who seek to be pleased at the same time that they are benefitted,—and who, because they do not incline to the labor of hard thinking, must have every idea advanced, as it were, embossed,—sticking out,—raised up,—so as almost to force itself upon their attention. This disideratum I am now attempting to supply.—Ere you read this address, my Brethren in the ministry, all you whose post office address I have ascertained, will have received a printed sermon in pamphlet form. This has been sent to you for a specimen of my style and composition; although, on account of only having two days for its preparation, at the close of a long protracted meeting, it is by no means equal to some of my efforts. My object in sending this specimen would, in part, be explained by a prospectus enclosed.—From this you learn that I contemplate publishing a series of volumes of sermons, beginning with one volume. In this attempt to supply a lack of the Church,—in whose communion I have spent my happiest and best days, and to which, in this attempt, I wish to make an expression of my gratitude and attachment,—I have counted largely, dear Brothers, on your countenance and aid. Without your influence and agency on its behalf, the attempt will prove abortive for the Church, and a pecuniary embarrassment to myself. With the view of enlisting your services for the sale of the first volume described in the prospectus, I have ventured to address you in this formal manner. Will each of you sell for me at least five copies?—the sixth will be your own without charge.—I have also two or three hundred of the pamphlet sermon for sale, at ten for one dollar, to you, to be retailed at a shilling.—A letter by mail will always be acceptable, to, your fellow laborer in the Gospel.

To Cure Founder.

Mr. Editor: Having noticed in your paper, Rev. Mr. Clancy's statement of the serious trouble he has suffered, from having his horse badly foundered, whilst absent from home, on a tour of visitation, I feel disposed to lay before your readers a prescription, which that gentleman and others, will find of infallible benefit in such cases hereafter.

For a foundered horse, take half a pint of whiskey, half a pint of weak lye, half an ounce of tobacco, cut very fine, and a table spoon full of salt. Drench him with this mixture. I have used this with success, in repeated instances, and gone on my journey without detainure. The animal must be kept moving, after taking the dose, and he will soon be relieved.

DIED—On the 16th instant, at his residence in Cross Creek Township, Washington county, Pa., MR. HENRY VIRTUE, in the midst of his days.

The manner in which this gentleman came to his end, was tragic and melancholy. He had taken down his rifle, intending to shoot a fowl for a harvest dinner. The gun had been loaded without the knowledge of the deceased; who, supposing it unloaded, had placed his foot on the hammer, and was in the act of blowing in at the muzzle, when his foot slipped from off the hammer, discharging the gun, the ball passing between his teeth, came out at the back of the head, causing instant death. He has left a wife, and one or two children, to mourn his untimely end. He was an esteemed citizen, modest and retiring in his deportment, industrious in his habits, and honest in his business transactions. His hold on the sympathies of the community was seen in the large concourse that attended in solemn silence at his funeral. Though not a professor of faith in Christ, he was a friend of the Church, and contributed to her support. How true it is, that there is but a step between us and death.—The lamented subject of this notice anticipated many years of blessings and privileges as his portion, because of excellent health, and of almost unequalled strength and vigor. How unexpectedly were his expectations cut off. His death occurred in harvest. And as the grass falls before the scythe of the mower, so did he fall before the finger of God. Let his bereaved friends seek for consolation in the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ, and give all diligence to make their calling and election sure.

To push us to the tomb;
And fierce diseases wait around,
To hurry mortals home."

Railroad Accident.—We regret to learn that Mr. Daniel Depford, a young man in the 20th year of his age, had one of his ankles crushed, while attempting to get on one of the burden trains, which caused his death on the following day. The accident occurred near the tank, about seven miles from this place.—York (Pa.) Press.

Iron and castings; 2,784 do. merchandise. There were 524 steamboat arrivals, 5,300 cabin 7,800 deck passengers.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

CHICAGO CONVENTION.

DECLARATION OF SENTIMENTS, UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED.

The Committee submit to their fellow-citizens and the Federal Government the following propositions, as expressing their own sentiments and those of their constituents:

1. That the Constitution of the United States was formed by practical men, for practical purposes, declared in its preamble—"To provide for the common defence, to promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty;" and was mainly designed to create a government whose functions should and would be adequate to the protection of the common interests of all the States, or of two or more of them, which could not be maintained by the action of the separated States. That in strict accordance with this object, the revenues derived from commerce were surrendered to the General Government, with the express understanding that they should be applied to the promotion of these common interests.

2. That among these common interests and objects were—1st. Foreign commerce, to the regulation of which the powers of the States severally were confessedly inadequate; and 2. Internal trade and navigation, wherever the concurrence of two or more States was necessary to its preservation, or where the expense of its maintainance should be equitably borne by two or more States, and where, of course, those States must necessarily have a voice in its regulation; and hence resulted the constitutional grant of power to Congress—"to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States."

3. That being thus possessed both of the means and of the power which were denied to the States respectively, Congress became obligated, by every consideration of good faith and common justice, to cherish and increase both the kinds of commerce thus committed to its care, by expanding and extending the means of conducting them, and of affording them all those facilities and all that protection which the States individually would have afforded, had the revenues and authority been left to them.

4. That this obligation has ever been recognized from the foundation of the Government, and has been fulfilled partially by erecting light-houses, building piers for harbors, break-waters and sea-walls, removing obstructions in rivers, and providing other facilities for the commerce carried on from the ports of the Atlantic coast; and the same obligations have been fulfilled to a much less extent in providing similar facilities, for "commerce among the States," and the principle has been most emphatically acknowledged to embrace the Western lakes and rivers, by appropriations for numerous light-houses upon them, which appropriations have never been questioned in Congress as wanting constitutional authority.

5. That thus by a series of acts which have received the sanction of the people of the United States, and of every department of the Federal Government, under all administrations, the common understanding of the intent and objects of framers of the Constitution, in granting to Congress the power to regulate commerce, has been manifested and has been confirmed by the people, and this understanding has become as much a part of that instrument as any one of its most explicit provisions.

6. That the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the States, and with the Indian tribes," is on its face so palpably applicable in its whole extent to each of the subjects enumerated, equally and in the same manner, as to render any attempts to make it more explicit, unwarrantable and futile; and those who admit the rightful application of the power to foreign commerce, by facilitating and protecting its operations, by improving harbors and cleaning out navigable rivers, cannot consistently deny that it equally authorizes similar facilities to "commerce among the States."

7. That "foreign commerce" is dependent upon internal trade for the distribution of its freights, and for the means of paying for them, so that whatever improves the one advances the other, and they are so inseparable that they should be regarded as one. That an export from the American shore to a British port in Canada, is as much foreign commerce as if it had been directly to Liverpool, and that an exportation to Liverpool neither gains nor loses any of the characteristics of foreign commerce by the directness or circuity of the route, whether it passes through a custom-house on the British side of the St. Lawrence, or descends through that river and its connecting canals to the ocean, or whether it passes along the artificial communications and natural streams of any of the States to the Atlantic.

8. That the General Government, by extending its jurisdiction over lakes and navigable rivers, subjecting them to the same laws which prevail on the ocean, and on its bays and ports, not only for purposes of revenue, but to give security to life and property, by the regulation of steamboats, has precluded itself from denying that jurisdiction for any other legitimate regulation of commerce. If it has power to control and restrain, it must have the power to protect, assist and facilitate; and if it denies the jurisdiction in the one mode of action, it should renounce it in the other.

9. That in consequence of the peculiar dangers of the navigation of the lakes, arising from the want of harbors for shelter, and of the Western rivers from snags and other obstructions, there are no parts of the United States more emphatically demanding the prompt and continued care of the Government to diminish those dangers, and to protect the property and life exposed to them; and that any one who can regard provisions for those purposes as sectional, local and not national, must be wanting in information of the extent of the commerce carried on upon those lakes and rivers, and of the amount of teeming population occupied or interested in that navigation.

10. That having regard to the relative population or to the extent of commerce, the appropriations heretofore made for the interior rivers and lakes, and the streams connecting them with the ocean, have not been in a just and fair proportion to those made for the benefit of the Atlantic coast; and that the time has arrived when this injustice should be corrected in the only mode in which it can be done, by the united, determined and persevering efforts of those whose rights have been overlooked.

11. That independent of this right of protection of "commerce among the States," the right of "common defence," guarantied by the Constitution, entitles those citizens inhabiting the country bordering upon the interior lakes and rivers, to such safe and convient harbors as may offord shelter to a navy, whenever it shall be rendered necessary by hostilities with our neighbors, and that the construction of such harbors cannot safely be delayed to the time which will demand immediate use.

12. That the argument most commonly urged against appropriations to protect "commerce among the States," and to defend the inhabitants of the frontiers, that they invite sectional combinations, to insure success to many unworthy objects, is founded on a practical distrust of the republican principles of our Government, and of the capacity of the people to select competent and honest representatives. That it may be urged with equal force against legislation upon any other subject, involving various and extensive interests. That a just appreciation of the rights and interests of our fellow-citizens, in every quarter of the Union, disclaiming selfish and local purposes, will lead intelligent representatives to such a distribution of the means in the treasury, upon a system of moderation and ultimate equality, as will in time meet the most urgent wants of all and prevent those jealousies and suspicions which threaten the most serious danger to our confederacy.

13. That we are utterly incapable of perceiving the difference between a harbor for shelter and a harbor for commerce, and suppose a mole or pier which will afford safe anchorage and protection to a vessel against the storm, must necessarily improve such harbor, and adapt it to commercial purposes.

14. That the imports on foreign goods and the public lands being the common heritage of all our citizens, so long as these resources continue, the imposition of any special burden on any portion of the people, to obtain the means of accomplishishing objects equally within the duty and competency of the General Government, would be unjust and oppressive.

15. That we disavow all and every attempt to connect the cause of internal trade and "commerce among the States" with the fortunes of any political party; but that we mean to place that cause upon such immutable principles of truth, justice and constitutional duty, as shall command the respect of all parties, and the deference of all candidates for public favor.

Extensive Fire and Terrible Explosion.

Early on Thursday morning, a fire was discovered breaking out in the grocery store at the northeast corner of Callowhill and Sixth streets, occupied by Messrs. Hoiz and Kirkbride. An opening was effected in the door of the building on Sixth street, and with a hose a quantity of water was injected, and the fire was thought to have been subdued; but a short time afterwards it again broke out, and on putting the water on, an explosion of gunpowder took place on the floor, and the window on Callowhill street was blown out. The fire then, it is thought, rapidly ascended the stairway, and a large portion of the house appeared to be in a blaze. The main building is three-storied, and connected with it, on Sixth street, is a smaller one, used by the same occupants for the accommodation of the heavy part of their stock. The medium of communication of the fire appeared to be between the two. Several fire apparatus were at this time on the ground, and the firemen were making vigorous efforts, when a terrific explosion of gunpowder, supposed to have been contained in a keg in the garret, near the centre of the floor, occurred, and at the same instant the walls of the upper part were overturned, and the roof fell into the building, broken into burning fragments. The contents of the store were entirely destroyed, and the building ruined beyond reparation. The latter was owned by Mr. Thomas Smith, and we believe that upon it there was no insurance. The stock, of Messrs. H. & K., we learn, was fully insured. The second story of the premises was occupied by a gentleman, named Milligan, and his family, the members of which had to be taken out of the windows by means of ladders. The third story front room was used by Mr. Fayette Pierson as a job printing office. The furniture of the former and materials of the latter were considerably damaged.

The gable wall of the adjoining three-story brick, on Callowhill street, occupied by Mr. John E. Murray, as a hosiery and trimmings store, and dwelling, was blown down, and the garret totally demolished. Into this building a very large quantity of water was thrown, which proved to be very destructive to the furniture and the stock of goods. The real property belongs to Mrs. Hawkins who resides in the Western part of the state. An insurance will cover the entire loss.

The next house in Callowhill street, occupied by Mr. James Hill, hatter, was much injured in the roof, the end of which was partially raised off, under which the fire became secreted, and for a long time baffled the efforts of the firemen to extinguish it.

On Sixth street, the four brick houses extending from the store house at the corner up to Willow street, were very greatly injured, particularly the two nearest to Callowhill street. These buildings were owned by Mr. Edward Buckingham and Mr. William Early. They were all occupied by families, who not being aware of the danger from powder, did not deem it necessary to remove their goods and chattels, and in consequence, each inmate became a severe sufferer. At the time of the explosion the roofs of the buildings were lifted from the walls and fell with a crash into the garrets. This property is amply insured.

The explosion was of a deafening character, and was heard for a very great distance. The force of the concussion was so great that the window glass of the stores and dwellings in the immediate neighborhood was broken into pieces. The very large panes in the bulk windows of the tea store on the opposite corner were demolished, and a sash over the door of the tobacconist shop, a door or two above, blown in.—Phil. Dol. Newspaper.

Letting out of Water.

Solomon's illustration of the beginning of strife is receiving some new enforcements now-a-days, both the illustration and the thing illustrated.—Mr. Shepherd, at Phillips, Maine, built himself a fine stone grist mill, house, blacksmith shop, &c., on a small stream, which proved insufficient in its volume of water to carry his wheels. He therefore repaired to a pond of some eighty acres, lying on a hill above him, and cut a trench by which the water was turned from the pond into his brook.—No sooner had the water commenced running in the new cut, than it began to wash the cut deeper, and the deeper it went the faster it gullied, until in a very short time an awful chasm let out the whole pond upon the little brook, and, swelling into a torrent, swept away Mr. Shepherd's mill, house, shop, and all, and did vast mischief besides; after which all became quiet, and the little brook ran along as peaceably as before, but it had no wheels to turn.

As to the beginning of strife, look at our Mexican war. It has well nigh emptied the big pond. When shall we see the little brook running peacefully along the valley again?—Journal of Commerce.

ANTI-CELIBACY.—Dr. Baird, in his lecture on Thursday evening, mentioned a singular fact concerning the Greek Church, viz: that the priests are required to be married men, and whenever a wife dies the priestly office ceases until he is married again. They claim authority for this in the Scriptures, which reads, "A bishop must be blameless, the husband of one wife." In the Armenian Church this rule is extended, so as to require that a priest shall also be the father of one child.—Springfield Gazette.

From the New Orleans Delta.

"Lo! the Poor" Immigrant.

On board an immigrant ship, a few days since, extended on a large box, on the upper deck, his feet and head uncovered, lay a robust man in the agonies of death; gurgling sounds issued at intervals from his throat—his mouth was open to its utmost tension—froth oozed from his nostrils and occasionally a slight quivering of the chest was perceptible. A female whose tears streamed abundantly over her face, and whose deep sighs came from the heart, was seated by his side; at his head stood a little girl, absorbed in the bitterest grief. The former was his wife—an English woman, a stranger in the land; "unknowing and unknown." A few feet removed from her, propped against the mizzen mast, were two or three human beings—if human they could properly be pronounced—who, were it not that their eyes opened and glared glassily on me, I should have thought had been dead and were disinterred to astound the living—so wan, so cadaverous, so ghost-like were they.

In the hold, lying on a rude berth, near the opened hatchway, and exposed to the gaze of all, was an individual, nearly denuded, and apparently dead. He lay uncared for—the living, eager to leave the ship, as though it were a pest house, and still fated to re-echo the last expiring gasp of more of them, (forty-six were reported to have died on the passage,) bustled hastily by him, with boxes and luggage, without even a passing, parting glance. His wife, too, seemed be bereft of reason, stolid idiotic. No tears trickled down her cheeks, nor did a moan escape her. She was busily engaged (in deep abstraction) packing up her clothes or vacantly gazing on her children. The odor emitted from the hold was offensive and suffocating, but perceiving the neglected man move, with a few others, I was soon by his side; when he perceived us, he made an effort to rise, partially succeeded, and spoke incoherently. Clothes were placed on him, and he was raised and carried to a large uncovered furniture cart, which stood on the levee—nearly filled with the ailing, (his fellow voyagers)—and which awaited to receive him; thence he was taken to the Charity Hospital, exposed, with the other unfortunate wretches from and unfortunate land, to the fiery rays of a noonday sun.

His wife and four infant little ones were huddled together, at the moment of his departure, on the levee, seeking a partial shade, by means of heaped-up boxes, from the scorching sun. The dying father recognized them not—nor did they, so wo-begone were they, cast even a parting glance at him whom they were fated never to look on in life. There the bewildered family lingered, hour after hour—the children flushed and feverish—the mother, her head sunk on her knees, unable to shed a tear, for the source they were wont to flow, was long dried up, and all feeling apparently blunted or fled, from having become too familiar with death in her ill-ventilated and confined prison-house. A noble-hearted young man, who had previously spoken somewhat harshly to her for her seeming indifference to and neglect of her husband, perceiving her condition, and rightly judging that it was not lack of affection that influenced her conduct, kindly inquired if she had no place to go to—knew no one, or needed aid.

She had some trivial means, was a complete stranger, but she simply queried, "Can we not stay where we are?" She appeared in good health, as did her children; she and they remarkably clean and neatly apparelled; the children pretty, interesting and innocent. On being apprised that she could not remain where she then was, she inquired what would be the rent of a small tenement. When told four or five dollars, or sixteen or twenty shillings a month, she opened her eyes unbelievingly, seemed struck with surprise, but acquiesced, after some explanation, to any arrangement that would be made for her. The young man, with a friend, proceeded in search of a suitable location; he examined two or three places, but still remained undecided, his primary object being to procure a cheap residence for her. At length he obtained a small, airy room for one half the rent named above, and thither removed the hapless family and their limited luggage.

He called the next day, when the somewhat reconciled wife requested him (she herself being totally ignorant of every place in, to her, so immense a city) to call and ascertain, wherever her husband was taken to, how he was. He did so, and was answered, on applying at the Charity Hospital, that Edward Murray had died on the evening of the day of his removal from the ship Lapland. And thus, when the goal of his ambition was attained, and his eyes rested on the new world, where, in fancy, he was to be happy, poor Murray breathed his last. His grave—if he had one—has been made in a far-off land from his own, and his wife and children know it not. His remains were not followed by either relative or friend to their last resting-place—no tear saturated the clay that enwraps his corse—nor was prayer aspirated for him. How appropriate in his case the heart-touching wish—"May you die among your kindred."

To apprise the bereaved wife of the death of her husband was no trivial task, but it was requisite that she should be informed of it. On repairing to her residence "the messenger of sad tidings" was surprised on not finding her with her children. He learned from the eldest of the alarmed and crying little ones that her mother had left the room early in the day to procure some necessary article, but failed to return to them—it was then evening. No doubt she had strayed far away from her dwelling, and was unable to discover it, not knowing street or number. At night he again repaired there, but she was still absent—her children extended on the floor, lying on some heaped up clothing; the youngest, boy, sobbing bitterly. He knelt by the child's side, fondly called him by name, which he had learned from his mother, and thus caressed him to sleep. He left them sunk in repose, quiet and peaceful as doves. On the succeeding day, thanks to the aid and interference of a lady, whose nature is benevolence itself, the children were removed to that laudable and truly valuable institute—that refuge for the destitute and unhappy stranger—the Irish Immigrant Institute, Duplantier street.

EXTRAORDINARY TIDE OF EMIGRATION.—The steamer Lady of the Lake, on her upward passage, had upwards of 400 emigrants, mostly German, on board. During the last four days the average on the steamboats have been about the same. Seventeen hundred have passed up the lake since Wednesday. They come by the way of Quebec and the St. Lawrence.—Rochester Eve. Gaz.

A little daughter of Mr. Otis Lawrence, of Lyndon, Vt., in returning from school, called at a house for the purpose of ascertaining the time of day, when finding the people absent, she placed her hands on the window sill, raised herself from the ground, and put her head through the window, that she might look at the clock, when the window fell upon her neck, causing her death before she could be discovered.—Bicknell's Reporter.

Death of Joseph C. Neal, Esq.

Joseph C. Neal, Esq., died very suddenly on Saturday evening last, of congestion of the brain, in the 40th year of his age. Mr. Neal has long been known as a fine writer, and his contributions to literature under the title of "Charcoal Sketches," are celebrated for genuine humor of a peculiar character. He has been connected for a number of years with the newspaper press of Philadelphia, As a political editor, when he presided over the Pennsylvanian, he was remarkable for the mild, urbane, and gentlemanly course he pursued towards political opponents, meeting them with argument, or turning aside their shafts with pleasant irony or sallies of grotesque humor, which never failed in their effect. For a year or two past he has been conducting the "Gazette," a weekly literary paper, more congenial to his taste, and allowing a freer scope to the peculiar qualities of his mind. He was united in marriage some months ago to a young and talented lady, who is left to mourn the early loss of her husband. Mr. Neal has many friends in Philadelphia, all of whom will hear of his death with regret.—Philadelphia Dollar Newspaper.

Vegetable Diet.

The Indians of South America are represented as very strong limbed and capable of enduring great fatigue. Their every day pedestrian feats are truly astonishing. Guides perform a long journey at the rate of twenty-five leagues a day. Their usual pace is a jog-trot. They take short steps and carry their feet close to the ground. They go up and down mountain sides quicker than a mule, and horsemen whom they accompany as guides have frequently occasion to call after them, to request them to slacken their pace. A battalion, eight hundred strong, has been known to march thirteen or fourteen leagues in one day, without leaving ten or a dozen stragglers on the road. The Indian subsists on a very small quantity of the simplest food, a leathern pouch containing cocoa, suspended from his neck, is worn next to his breast. A handful or two of roasted maize is tied up in one corner of his pouch, and and in general, these are the only provisions for a very long day's journey.—Phil. Dol. Newspaper.

MELANCHOLY SUICIDE OF A YOUNG LADY.—It is our melancholy task to announce the death, by drowning, of the eldest daughter of Mr. James English, formerly of Alexandria. We learn from the Washington American that the young lady left Washington, in company with her father, on Sunday afternoon last, in the Alexandria boat. She arrived in the latter place, and in the course of the night was missing. Much anxiety was felt, and immediate search was made; at length one of her shoes was found upon the wharf which led to the painful apprehension that she had put an end to her existence by springing into the Potomac. Immediate examination was made of the river, and the fears of the bereaved friends were confirmed by the discovery of the body about 1 o'clock on Monday morning. A circumstance connected with the death of Miss English, says the American, renders the catastrophe doubly distressing. We learn that she was engaged to be married, about two years ago, to a young man in Alexandria by the name of Masterson.—Mr. Masterson, shortly after their engagement, died; and the mind of the young lady has since been so deeply affected from the event, as to have led her, as is supposed, to sacrifice her life in the manner above related. She was about 20 years of age.

PEA-BUG.

Every body has seen peas with weevils in them. While the pea is growing and the pod is soft, the parent insect punctures the pod exactly opposite the young pea and deposits an egg. From this egg a maggot soon proceeds, which works its way directly into the pea, and feeds on its substance. The larva reaches its full size, and passes into the pupa state in the fall, and the succeeding spring emerges from the pea a winged beetle or weevil. The maggot may sometimes be detected in green peas, and Dr. Harris observes that few persons, while indulging in this luxury, are "aware how many insects they unconsciously swallow." By close examination, a small dark spot may be seen on the pea, and on opening it the maggot may be discovered. The germ of the pea is not always (perhaps not generally,) destroyed by the insect, but the pea is rendered unfit for culinary purposes. This is a serious injury, as all will acknowledge who are acquainted with the value of dry peas used in soups, and other forms on the table.

In this country, the insect is much less common than in Canada, and the more northern portion of the United States, than further south. In Maine and Vermont for example, they occasion but little damage, peas being there raised which are perfectly sound, free from bugs, and meet with ready sale in our large cities. The attack of the insect may, however, be in some degree obviated in any section. It is ascertained that its operations are only continued through a portion of the season, and by later sowing it may be avoided. But there is one objection to late sowing. In districts subject to long droughts, a good crop of peas can only be obtained by early sowing, as the crop will not bear excessive heat. In planting peas infested with bugs, it is always advisable to kill the insects in some way. This may be effectually done by pouring boiling water on the peas, and stirring them well for a few minutes. It will not effect the vegetating powers of the pea. In some cases, where the germ has been laid bare by the gnawings of the insects, it may be killed, but we have often practiced the mode, and found no particular objection to it.

But we lately noticed a recommendation of Dr. J. Plummer, in the Indiana Farmer Gardener, which is worthy of trial, as it will not only destroy the bug in its incipient stage, but may also render the pea fit for the table. His mode is to scald them immediately after they are gathered, keeping them in water, turned on boiling, for one minute. Dr. P. states further, that placing peas as soon as gathered in jugs or bottles, hermetically sealed, will keep them well, and that nothing can be seen the next year but the speck in which the larva died.

THE BRIDGE AT WHEELING.—A late Wheeling paper states that the managers of the bridge company have employed Chas. Elliott, Esq., of Philadelphia, as engineer and superintendent for the erection of the wire suspension bridge over the Ohio at that place, and that from plans at present before the board, it is believed that this will be the largest structure of the kind in the world, being a span of upwards of 1,000 feet, whereas that of the Friburg is but 800.

GREAT LAND SALE.—A body of land, consisting of about seventy-five thousand acres, in the counties of Dickinson, Stewart, Humphries and Warren, situated, most of it, between the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers, about one hundred miles below Nashville, where the rivers are not more than twenty miles apart, is to be sold at auction, in New York, on Friday next. It is offered at 25 cents per acre, is very accessible to market, and rich in fertility and mineral wealth. —Balt. Sun.

Cure for the Hydrophobia.

[Translated from the last number of the "La Litterateur Francoise."] A physician of Paris having been bitten by a little dog, had felt the horrors which foretell and usually precedes the invasion of an attack, which has been described; he resolved to put an end to his life through fear of doing mischief to others; and chose for the instrument of his death a vapor bath, hoping that in it he should suffocate in the soonest possible manner. Some friends entered the bathing room at the very moment when he had become insensible, and satisfied of his fatal resolution, they took him out, wrapped him up in coverlets, and took him to his bed, where he sweat excessively, and experienced, afterwards, great weakness, but finally was restored entirely to health. It was himself who had cried up this remedy, of which several physicians have since made trial, and from which they have uniformly obtained the most favorable results.

A peasant in one of the provinces of France was in his turn bitten by a mad dog; and had already experienced several paroxysms of this disease. In accordance with a barbarous prejudice, which still exists in some one of the departments of France, they imagine there is no possible cure for this disease; and they determined to put an end to it by the frightful means of suffocation.—In order to execute their design they put the wife of the patient out of the chamber, and kept her by force in an adjoining room. They placed the wretched man between two mattrasses, and used all imaginable efforts to obtain success in the frightful tragedy they were enacting. The wife of the sick man, unable to expel from her the idea of this horrible scene, called up within herself extraordinary strength, repulsed all those who opposed her way, succeeded in entering the chamber of the dying man, drove out the mattrass-assassins, and found her wretched husband in a swoon, covered with sweat, as if he had been plunged in a bath—the consequence of those unheard of efforts which he had made to throw off the weight which was suffocating him! She took him, wrapped him up in some coverlets, placed him in his bed, where he perspired still more freely. After a few days he regained his strength and was radically cured.

This fact having came in support of the first mentioned, the French physicians were only the more eager to continue their experiments, and this kind of treatment has always been favorable to those attacked with hydrophobia, especially when it has been used at the first symptoms of its approach.

A LIFE PRESERVER.—The simple apparatus described in the following paragraph is worthy the attention of all who travel on our rivers, and could always be rendered available at the shortest notice:

The recent melancholy loss of lives resulting from the conflagration of the Ben Sherrod steamboat, has suggested a very simple contrivance within the reach of every man, and generally at hand. It is that of tying his hat up in his pocket handkerchief, having the tie under the brim, and when in the water, by holding that part downward, the air contained in the hat would be sufficient to buoy up one unable to swim, at least six hours, and oftentimes double that time, so that assistance might be obtained, and many valuable lives saved from an untimely death. An English paper, to which we are indebted for the above hint, states that it has in several instances been attended with entire success.

REWARD FOR A MURDERER.—Governor Owsley of Kentucky, offers a reward of $500 for the arrest and delivery to the jailer of Jefferson co., of James F. Pendergrast, who murdered William W. Buchanan a few weeks since. Mr. B., it will be recollected, was a school-teacher from Pennsylvania, whom Pendergrast, as one of the owners of the school, was dissatisfied with, tho' all the other owners were quite pleased with his teaching.

CITY STATISTICS.—The number of streets, avenues and places which intersect the city of N. York is 375; of banks they have 33; insurance companies 100; periodicals 50; newspapers 98; miscellaneous schools 110; moral, benevolent and literary associations 116; consuls 41; and churches 227.

ESCAPE OF A FEMALE CONVICT.—A colored woman, named Elizabeth Hunt, effected her escape from the New York State prison on the night of the 17th inst., by getting on top of the building and then letting herself down to the ground by means of blankets torn into strips and tied together.

Br. J. B. D. will see that he is credited a full year for the sum sent.

Our friend S. M. at Coshocton, has had 9 numbers sent him, on a second year, before we received his pay, or notice to discontinue. He should now certainly continue another year.

Br. Armstrong, Tenn. we will send to end of present vol. and then endeavor to fulfil your request. Will you oblige us by seeing that we are furished with the statictics of your next Conference for the purposes of our Annual Register?

Br. Kezerta, we have credited W. B. in full for $2 now sent, and $1, which you had overpaid, before. This is in accordance with your instructions. He has had the paper one year and a half.—R. M. has had it the same length of time—paid $1 through J. M. Y.,—and now owes $2 more, which you will please obtain.

The P. M. at Hanover Licking, O., advises us to stop sending the paper to J. Farnsworth, as he has some time since 'gone to parts unkown.' He owes us $4. We'll try our best to keep from thinking hard of our angent up that way.

The Law of Newspapers.

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered wishing to continue their subscriptions.

2. If the subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publishers may continue to send them till all cash charges are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their papers from the offices to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled their bill, and order their paper discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the paper is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The Courts have decided that refusing to take a paper or periodical from the office, or removing and leaving it uncalled for, is "prima facie" evidence of intentional fraud.

Liabilities of those who take Periodicals.

Thes law declare that any person, to whom a periodical is sent, is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office or persons with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a Post Office, Store, or any other place of deposite,, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the Postmaster, Storekeeper, &c., are responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or informs the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

SANCTIFIED AFFLICTION.

BY L. H. F.

He came, the sweet angel my father assigned,
To watch o'er my path to the sky;
I know not if yet from that path I'd declined,
Or if only temptation was nigh,
He touched me; my flesh how it shrunk from that touch!
But my spirit with ecstasy glow'd—
It long'd to be free, for its prospects were such
As no pains of the body could cloud.

My father, I dreamed thou hadst called me to dwell
In the rest thou hast for me above;
But I find myself still in the flesh;—it is well
If I go—if I stay, it is love:
Love orders the plan: and in love such as thine,
How shall I not calmly confide,
Which spared not, to save me, a ransom divine,
The Lamb who on Calvary died.

Oh welcome the sufferings whenever they come,
That bring with them comforts like these;
Let me always be fill'd with such foretastes of home,
And I wish not for health nor for ease.
That angel's soft touch thus again would I feel,
Though my heart-strings with agony quiver,
The pressure is mercy; it wounds but to heal:
It will end in enjoyment forever.

Ah! when shall I shake off these trammels of flesh,
And reach that eternal abode,
When thy joys I so value shall blossom afresh,
Revived by the smiles of my God!
Though the wave of affliction high over me rolls,
Shall I think the short journey too drear,
When the arms of a Saviour my spirit enfolds,
And the gates of the city appear?

No; welcome the summons that bids me depart,
And welcome that moment to me,
When the clod from my spirit Death strikes with his dart,
And bids it forever be free,
Lord Jesus, I then in thy glory shall share,
And forever be blest with thy sight,
When all will be tranquil, and all will be fair,
And all will be endless delight.

Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church.

NO. V.

Article eleventh, Treats of the "Officers of the Church." The highest offices in the Methodist Protestant Church, are the Presidents of the Annual Conferences. They are to be elected, as herein before stated; and are not eligible more than three years in succession, and are amenable to the Annual Conferences over which they preside. The duties of these officers are, to preside in the Annual Conferences; to travel through the districts; visit the circuits and stations; and as far as practicable, to be present at all the camp meetings and the quarterly meetings; and they are members, though not the chairman, unless duly elected, of the Quarterly Conferences. It is their duty in the recess of the Conference, with the assistance of two or more elders, no difference whether stationed or unstationed, to ordain to orders; to make such changes of preachers as may be necessary; provided the parties consent to be changed. This article makes it obligatory upon all unstationed ministers and preachers to render what pastoral service they consistently can with their other engagements. The minister who has charge of a circuit or station is styled, the "superintendent." It is his duty, agreeably to discipline, to fill the pulpits and administer the ordinances; to receive persons, in accordance with rule, on probation; to visit the classes; to give notice of the approaching Quarterly Conferences; to hold love feasts and watch nights, &c., to detain the society occasionally after preaching; to organize the children into classes; to keep a record of members, marriages, baptisms, &c., to report quarterly, to the president; to give certificates to those who desire to remove, &c. It is the duty of the superintendent to execute discipline; and when a charge is preferred against a member, at the option of the accused, he is to be tried before the society of which he is a member, or before a committee of three or five male members of the class or society of which the accused is a member; but if the number necessary cannot be here obtained, by the consent of the class, the officiating minister may summon members from adjacent societies. The manner in which the committee is to be selected is as follows, to wit: The superintendent, who is to be chairman of the committee, selects two, and the class of which the accused is a member selects two, in full membership and in good standing; these four thus chosen, select a fifth; or each nominates one, and these two a third, as the case may be. The person to be put on trial then has the right of challenge of any number, not exceeding that of the original committee—the accused may appeal; but neither the accusor nor the superintendent has any authority to appeal. Nearly the same process is adopted when a preacher or minister is to be tried; the superintendent calls together three or five ministers, but the accused may object to any member of the committee for good cause shown. The preachers and members have the right of appeal to the ensuing quarterly, and the ministers to the Annual Conference. This article also points out the mode of electing class leaders by the respective classes; and how the superintendent is to proceed when the class refuses or neglects to elect one in conformity with rule. The Methodist Protestant Church does not only make it obligatory upon the members to attend class meetings, but the neglect of the public worship of God, searching the scriptures, partaking of the Lord's supper, love feasts, private or family prayer, equally subjects the delinquent to admonition: and if he refuse when the superintendent, (who is authorized) proposes to him peaceably to withdraw, he is then to be arraigned, tried, and if sufficient grounds exist, finally, expelled. I here remark, all serious, well disposed persons can, as often as they deem proper, enjoy the privileges of class meetings and love feasts, without being requested to become members; but when necessary, the church has the power to close the door against disorderly persons. Neither class meetings nor love feasts are to be held as public meetings, under any circumstances.

Article twelfth, presents the rights of "Suffrage and eligibility to office." This is a highly important article to every Methodist Protestant, for in it is secured the right of every minister and preacher, and of every white lay male member, who has attained the age of twenty-one years to vote in all cases, that is, as defined in other portions of the constitution. Every minister and preacher of the church, and every white lay male member, who has attained the age of twenty-five years, in full fellowship, is eligible as a representative in the General Conference. If any colored man is licensed to preach, or is ordained a minister, and has the requisite age, there is nothing in the constitution, so far as I can discover, to prevent his eligibility to the office of a representative to the General Conference; or to vote in every case where other ministers or preachers in the same relation to the church, have the right to vote.

Article thirteenth, defines the "judiciary principles." The doctrine of the second article is here amplified and explained. All offences condemned by the word of God, as being sufficient to exclude a person from the kingdom of grace and glory, shall subject ministers, preachers and members to expulsion from the Methodist Protestant Church. The neglect of duties enjoined by the scriptures, or the indulgence in sinful words and tempers; or the preaching or disseminating unscriptural doctrines, effecting the essential interests of the christian system, subjects the offender, first, to admonition, and if incorrigible, to expulsion. All officers are removable from office for mal-administration.

Article fourteenth, defines the "privileges of accused ministers and members." This article sets forth the proper tribunals to decide on the quality of the actions of accused ministers, preachers and members. Twenty days previous notice must be given to the accused. By consent, the trial may be entered into at any earlier period. The right of trial by a committee, and of appeal are here secured. The trial of ministers, preachers, or members in the Methodist Protestant Church, is dissimilar to the mode pursued in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In the former church, unless the accused think proper to appeal, the decision of the committee is final, and if an appeal be taken, the higher tribunal, unless at the request of the appellant, only decides on the legality of the proceedings. In the father church, the committee for the trial of ministers and preachers particularly, only, as a grand jury, find a bill, or decide whether there are sufficient grounds for an accusation, and the higher tribunal enters upon the trial, and decides the case, though they may appeal from this tribunal to a still higher, the local ministers, and the itinerant and local preachers to the ensuing annual, and the itinerant ministers to the General Conference. The General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church is only a legislative body; no appeals of accused ministers are ever made to it.

MRS. ELIZABETH BROWN.

Death through the common medium of protracted affliction is an event which may be expected. Under such circumstances a little reflection will allay the bitterness of sorrow, and measurably calm the troubled spirit. But when the "silver cord" is suddenly unloosed, and the transit from time to eternity unexpected, the feelings of the soul arise in their full strength, and a thrill of melancholy interest darts rapidly thro' the sinking spirit, and when self-possession reassumes her throne, doubt, and strange conjecture lurk within, and, finally the wearied spirit yields to silent grief, and learns a painful lesson on the frailty of man. Such a scene ought not soon to be forgotten. Sister Brown died suddenly, and unexpectedly, at her residence near Turnersville, Mercer county, Pa., April 15th, in the 57th year of her age. Thirty-seven years experience in the Christian life, taught her the vanity of earthly things. A few days previous to her departure, the writer of this notice, spoke to her in class meeting. Her confidence in God was strong, and she gave evidence of possessing a spirit that was ripening for the realms of bliss. On the succeeding Wednesday evening she attended to her domestic duties as usual, after the rest of the family had retired to bed. She was heard to sing in a serene, and subdued tone of voice the following verse—

"Then in a nobler sweeter strain,
I'll sing thy power to save;
When this poor lisping stammering tongue,
Lies silent in the grave."

She arose in the morning as usual, and assisted in preparing breakfast, she then went into the bed room for the purpose of making up her bed.—Suddenly an unusual noise was heard. Her husband rushed to the room,—she had fallen upon the floor, and was in the last struggle of expiring nature, and though unable to speak, her expressive countenance gave evidence that she wished those around her to be calm. She was laid upon the bed and shortly after expired. The sun had just arose, and doubtless it was the dawning of a brighter, and happier day to our departed sister and friend. She has left behind an aged companion, and eight children to mourn her loss.—May they, and the society of which she was a member, not forget her pious example, but prepare for the coming trial.

MRS. MARY EVANS.

Mary, daughter of Nancy and Robert Ganes and wife of Rev. George Evans, departed this life, May 26th, 1847, aged 62 years, 11 months, 4 days.

Sister Evans was born in Calvert county, Maryland, on 22d of June, 1784, and was married to George Evans, 29th of July, 1802, in Jefferson county, Virginia. She soon realized the comforts of saving grace and became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which she remained a member until March, 1828, then with her husband, seceded and became a member of the Methodist Protestant Church, and she remained such till her death. In the communion of both churches, she lived without just cause of rebuke until the day of her death. Her exit was in Middletown circuit, at her residence in Henry co., Indiana. As she had made death a matter of reflection and preparation in life, she was not taken by surprise, for the last important act of her life, (oh that all of the minister's wives were worthy as she in that act) which was to urge and press her husband to go to the circuit. Though afflicted as she was with the disease which caused her death, she was found having on the wedding garment, and waiting the coming of her Lord to receive her to himself, and to enter into the supper of the Lamb. Sister Evans possessed a heart of friendship and kindness seldom surpassed, making happy all with whom she associated. Her attachments to her husband and children, were warm and unabating. She was emphatically a dutiful, a sympathising, and affectionate wife and mother, seeking the temporal and spiritual welfare of her family. As a member of the church, to know her was to esteem her highly for Christ's sake; but, oh! her seat in the church and family are vacant, and cannot be filled.—The weary herald of the cross, and the children most dear, will no more hear her inviting voice, or the usual sweet sounds from her lips.

The church where she once delighted to worship, will no more echo back the tones of her praises while she talked of Jesus and glory. No! she has passed away like the shock to the garner, or like the jewel to the store house of heaven for her Master's use. For with the shout of victory, she stepped from her port below to her place in the skies, to stand in her lot till the end of the days. She is dead. Reader, did you ever witness the death of the righteous? Hers was as theirs. You used to have her prayers,—they are turned to praise. Oh! children, you heard her voice ascend the skies for you in prayers; you saw her tears, heard her sighs, that you might meet her in the mansion of bliss. On you she did call that you would prepare for death. Will you meet her in heaven? On you your father still calls—his prayers, tears, exhortations and sermons, his toils, his labors, and his race will soon be ended. She stood with him side by side.—She is gone—he must soon follow—then they will join the anthem anew, and bask in the ocean of love.

Narrative.

RICHARD BAXTER.

The following striking interposition of Providence, is said to have taken place during Mr. Baxter's residence in Coventry.—Several ministers ejected by the act of uniformity, who resided in that city, united with Mr. Baxter in establishing a lecture in a private house on a neighboring common.—The time of worship was generally a very early hour. Mr. Baxter left Coventry in the evening intending to preach the lecture the following morning. The night being dark, he lost his way, and wandering about a considerable time he came to a gentleman's house, where he asked for direction. The gentleman, thinking it would be unsafe for such a person to be wandering on the common at so late an hour, requested the servant to invite him in. Mr. Baxter readily accepted the kind proposal, and met with a very hospitable reception. His conversation was such as to give his host an exalted idea of his good sense and extensive information. The gentleman wishing to know the quality of his guest, said after supper, "As most persons have some employment or profession of employment in life, I have no doubt, sir, that you have yours." "Yes, sir I am a man catcher." "A man catcher; (said the gentleman) are you? I am glad to hear you say so, for you are the very person I want. I am a justice of the peace in this district, and am commissioned to seize the person of Dick Baxter, who is expected to preach at a conventicle in this neighborhood early to-morrow morning; you shall go with me and I doubt not we shall easily apprehend the rogue." Mr. B. agreed to accompany him. Accordingly, the next morning, the gentleman took Mr. Baxter in his carriage to the place where the meeting was to be held. When they arrived at the spot they saw a considerable number of people hovering about; for seeing the carriage of the justice, and suspecting his intentions, they were afraid to enter the house. The justice observing this, said to Mr. Baxter, "I am afraid they have obtained information of my design; Baxter has probably been apprised of it, and will not fulfill his engagement; for you see the people will not enter into the house. I think if we extend our ride a little farther, our departure may encourage them to assemble, and on our return we may fulfill our commission."—When they returned they found their effort useless, for the people still appeared unwilling to assemble. The magistrate thinking he should be disappointed of the object he had in view, observed to his companion—"That as the people were very much disaffected to government, he would be much obliged to him to address them on the subject of good behaviour." Mr. Baxter replied "that perhaps this would not be deemed sufficient; for as the religious service was the object for which they met together, they would not be satisfied with advice of that nature; but if the magistrate would begin with prayer, he would then endeavor to say something to them. The gentleman replied, putting his hand into his pocket, "Indeed, sir, I have not my prayer book with me, or I would readily comply with your proposal. However, I am persuaded that a person of your appearance and respectability, would be able to pray with them as well to talk to them. I beg, therefore that you will be so good as to begin with prayer." This being agreed to, they alighted from the carriage and entered the house, and the people hesitating no longer followed them. —Mr. Baxter then commenced the service by prayer, and prayed with that seriousness and fervor for which he was eminent. The magistrate standing by was soon melted into tears. The good divine then preached in his accustomed, lively, and zealous manner. When he had concluded he turned to the magistrate, and said, "Sir, I am the very Dick Baxter of whom you are in pursuit—I am entirely at your disposal." The justice, however, had felt so much during the services, and saw things in so different a light, that he laid aside entirely all his enmity to the non-conformists, and ever afterwards became their sincere friend and advocate, and it is believed also a decided Christian.

The Reviler Humbled.

A colporteur in Western Pennsylvania met with a man, trifling, profane, and disposed to amusing himself with low and vulgar witticisms upon his books. He gently reproved him and handed him Nelson's Cause and Cure. He read it for some time, became much interested in it, and expressed a desire for it, but said he had no money. He also read a little in Bishop Hopkins on the Commandments. He took the books and promised to pay for them in a week. A minister, who was present, told the colporteur that he would not hear from the books again. He, however, received his pay, and also, some time after, a letter, giving an account of the effect the books produced. He stated that he was nearly a confirmed Atheist, but Nelson had thoroughly convinced him of his error. As the works of Paine, Hume, and Voltaire were common in his neighborhood, he had lent Nelson freely, and the Doctor had routed the enemy wherever he had gone. He had even been more interested in Hopkins than in Nelson. In conclusion, he craved an interest in the prayers of the colporteur, that, as he had been changed in his mind, he might be changed in his heart.

The same colporteur wrote to a student of medicine in relation to his ingratitude to God in neglecting the offered mercies of Christ. He has since heard that he is rejoicing in hope of the glory of God.

An intelligent and pious elder told him that there was a marked difference in his neighborhood since he had distributed books among them. The people were now reading the Tract Society's publications, instead of the light and trashy works as before. He urged the colporteur to visit them soon again.—American Messenger.

VARIETY.

From the Pittsburgh Gazette.

The Country around Pittsburgh.

The more we see of the environs of Pittsburgh, the more charmed we are with the beauty of the country adjacent to the city. The traveller over Europe or the United States, except in some peculiar places like Niagara or the Natural Bridge, the Giant's Causeway, or some scenes upon the Highlands, the Danube, or the Rhine, will find no country more beautiful than that within half an hour's ride or walk around the so called 'Smoky City' of the West. There is all the wildness of mountain and ravine scenery, and all the quietness of repose as seen in the plain and the valley. One view, which we saw the other evening in company with some valued friends, reminded us of the forests of Soignies, as seen from the brazen heights erected upon the field of Waterloo, in honor of the victory of Wellington. This upon the borders of our own city, while from the hill sides of the Allegheny appears a scene as tranquil and beautiful as the sweet spot which is known the world over as 'fair Wyoming.'—Nearer to the city again you may survey the three rivers that border upon the town, with all its hum of busy industry, and all the variety and excitement of city life. Nature has been lavish in her gifts to the people of a country like this, and not alone in the boundless wealth of the soil and beneath the soil, but in the beauty and variety of scenery that every where meets the eye. There is a grandeur in the hills that on every side hem us in. There is a beauty in rivers that have rolled on from the dawn of creation, sometimes in the quiet of the primeval wilderness of a new world, sometimes swam by the huntsmen and savage of early times, sometimes freighted with the rich treasures of the marts of business, and sometimes the scene of so many pleasant reunions of public and social life. Of each, like time itself, with Horace we may sing

"Labitur et labeter in omne volubilis ævum."

There is a charm, too, in the fields of verdure, in the valleys, so rich in production, in the forest trees that tower like the hills all around us,—in the cattle seen as upon a thousand hills, and the attraction is almost alike whether seen in the sweet repose of a garden of violets or in the noble water fall, whose every flow to the possessor has the music of gold and silver. Oh for some magic wand to sweep the cobwebs from the skies,—to scatter from such a scene those clouds of smoke that through the live-long day hang like the curtains of night round about us. The sun and moon shines as brightly, and the stars twinkle as glowingly here as over the broad expanse of the great deep, but absorbed in our selfish gains we forget God's beauty and our own comfort, in our devotion to the Mammon of gain.

THE CHINESE JUNK.—This great curiosity from the celestial empire has at length arrived, after a passage of two hundred and twelve days from Canton, touching at St. Helena on the 23'd of April. She is named Keying—Kellett, master, and manned with about 20 Europeans and 40 Chinese.—She is built of Teak, one hundred and fifty feet long, twenty-five feet beam, and twelve feet hold. Her cabin is thirty feet long, twenty-three wide, and ten and a half high, uniquely hung with Chinese images and ornaments. Her rudder, weighing seven tons, is suspended by two bamboo cables, and can be lowered or raised at ease. Her anchors are made of Teak, and are said to answer well. She is altogether the strangest looking craft that ever appeared in our waters. She has three masts, upright, and latteen sails, and is reputed to be a good sailer. Her measurement is 700 tons. Taken altogether she is formed like a whale boat, with two huge eyes in her bow, and a stern 5 feet higher than a 74. In fact, her stern looks like a 5 story temple. She came in ballast, but has a large collection of curiosities, consigned to the master. She is painted white as far as the fore mast with a black waist, and red from thence to the stern, with nine ports on each side, painted black, white and red. The Chinamen are regular copper colored natives, nude above the waist, and they have a large idol on board, representing a woman with ten pair of arms, gaudily ornamented. The Keying will be more than a "nine days wonder," and who knows but this is the prelude to extended commercial enterprize by the rat eating celestials. N. Y. Sun.

'Mr. Clay! Mr. Clay!' said an eccentric genius, who met him one day on a steamboat, 'Mister Clay,' at the same time catching hold of his coat,' 'what's your opinion of the tariff?' 'Why,' said Mr. Clay, composedly, trying to disengage his garment, 'my opinion is that this coat will tear if you don't let it go!'

A RELIC OF THE OLDEN TIME.—In tearing away partitions for the purpose of making some alteration in the house of Mr. Diffenderffer, corner of Baltimore and Fredrick streets, a relic of the olden time was discovered, being a knapsack, perhaps fifty years old, bearing on the inner side the name of William Diffenderffer, No. 90. On the outside was painted in circular form, "1st Co., 2d B., 5. M. R.," with the figures "90" in the centre. Above the circle were the letters "I. B." This being interpreted means; "Independent Blues, First company, Second Battalion, Fifth Maryland Regiment," and the number 90 indicates the number of the holder in the company. This knapsack was probably in the "whiskey insurrection" war. It has been presented to the Blues, and will be preserved in their armory.

Politicians in a Fix.

General Taylor has some way or other become extremely popular with the masses, and there seems a very strong disposition to make him a candidate for the presidency. The Whigs wish to avail themselves of his popularity to help them to power; for the same reason, the Democrats dread his influence—portions of both parties have nominated the old General.

Prominent men have written to him to be the candidate of their party, but as yet little satisfaction is obtained. He only tells them if the people want him for a President, they must take him without pledges. He will run as the candidate of neither Whigs or Democrats. All at once, the old Hunkers of both parties have discovered that Gen. Taylor is no great affair, and seem everywhere disposed to shove him off the track the best way they can. We like this muss—we don't care a pin how these political parties who have quarrelled for the last half century, get used up. As for General Taylor, we have no particular partiality to him. Quite likely he would make as good a President as Clay, Benton, Calhoun, Wright, Webster, or McLean. We will neither help nor harm either, further than to cast quietly a vote for the man among the candidates we may happen to prefer.

What will politicians do? They will if they can kill Taylor's popularity, and then fight it out over the leaders of the great political parties. So we go.—Boston Olive Branch.

WHAT IS DOING ON THE GREAT "FATHER OF RIVERS."—On the first day of the assembling of the Chicago Convention, Thos. Allen, Esq., submitted a report drawn up by him at the request of delegates of St. Louis, relative to the commerce and navigation of the valley of the Mississippi. It is stated in this document that in 1846 the receipts at New Orleans from the upper country amounted to 77 millions of dollars; the steamboats engaged in the trade of St. Louis were 251; and the whole number of millions of dollars, to which are to be added 4000 keel and flat boats. The annual cost of the transportation is 41 millions. The total value of the domestic products put afloat upon the waters of the valley is 260 millions; and the value of the whole commerce afloat is 430 millions, being double the amount of the whole foreign commerce of the United States. The number of steamboats lost in 1842, was 63; in 1846 the number was 36. The annual loss of lives is 160. The snags, it is well known have caused many of these disasters.

MOURNFUL CASUALTY.—Two persons drowned.—We learn from the Harrisburg Telegraph that on Saturday afternoon last Messrs. John Sourbeck, Christian Kendig, John Novinger and Mr. Graham went fishing in the Susquehanna, at Dauphin, in a skift, which was accidentally upset, and Mr. Sourbeck and Mr. Graham were drowned.

INTERESTING HISTORICAL FACTS.—Of the fifty-six signers of the Declaration of Independence, there were six physicians, one sailor, seven merchants, twenty-four lawyers, seven farmers, one shoemaker, one minister, one printer, one surveyor, one soldier, and the remaining six were gentlemen, which term we suppose is intended to designate those of easy fortunes. Of this number one seventh were foreigners, three having been born in Ireland, two in Scotland, two in England, and one in Wales.—Bost. Olive Branch

MISSING VESSEL.—We heard yesterday that there were great apprehensions in relation to the fate of the brig Henry Warfield, Captain Henry Harwood of this port. She is now out ninety-five days from a port in Ireland, and nothing has ever been heard of her. She left here the last winter, with a full cargo, and arrived out safe; but, since her sailing for Baltimore, her fate is shrouded in mystery.

HORRID.—A young man at Belfast, Maine, on Monday the 5th inst., was struck by the rod of a sky rocket upon the top and front part of his head, which passed down and came out under his chin and there struck. He died the next morning.

INDIAN RUBBER, OR GUM ELASTIC.—Indian Rubber is the concrete juice of a tree which grows in South America. In order to produce it the Indians make incisions through the bark of the tree in wet weather, and a milky juice oozes out, when it is spread over moulds of clay; when this dries, a second layer of the liquid is put on it; this operation is repeated till the Indian Rubber is of the thickness required. After this it is placed over smoke of burning vegetables, which hardens and darkens it. The Indians convert it into bottles, boots and flambeaux. The principal uses to which the Indian Rubber is applied here, are for the effacing of black lead marks, for cricket balls, for flexibles, tubes, syringes, and other instruments used by chemists. Cloth of all kinds may be rendered impenetrable to water, if pregnated with the juice of the Indian Rubber tree. Indian Rubber cut very thin, is now also used to sheath the bottom of vessels, and is an effectual preservative against the injuries of the shell-fish.—F. Lyceum.

Items of Methodist Church History.

1. In 1735, Mr. Wesley being unexpectedly called upon one day to preach in London, to a congregation, where the clergyman who was expected, failed to attend, upon the spur of the moment delivered his first extemporaneous sermon, not having a written one with him.

2. Mr. Wesley made his first extemporaneous prayer in 1738. It was over a poor prisoner, who was condemned to be executed, and who, being converted under the prayer, exclaimed at its close, "I am now ready to die."

3. The first literary institution, belonging to the Methodists, was founded in the year 1739, viz: the year the first Methodist society was formed by Mr. Wesley. This is the Kingswood school, near Bristol, which is, after the lapse of more than a century, still in successful operation.

4. The first English, Irish and American Conferences, were held as follows: The first in England, at London, June 25, 1744. The first in Ireland, at Limerick, August 14, 1752. The first in America, at Philadelphia, July 4, 1773. It is an interesting coincidence—1. That precisely ten individuals composed each of these three Conferences. 2. That the first American Conference was held at that place, and on the day of the year viz: July 4th, where the independence of the nation was declared three years after.—N. C. Advocate.

MAGNIFICENT PROJECT IN ENGLAND.—A company with a large capital, are engaged in the erection of 1200 houses for the use of the laboring classes, who are to be conveyed back and forth from home to their daily toil by the railway. It is also in contemplation to erect villages at convenient distances from all large cities and towns, to which the working classes can travel every morning and return at night without costing more than is now expended for badly ventilated and unhealthy-located dwellings for the poor under the present system.

II. The evangelic announcement of the Savior's nativity.

III. The divine mandate at the incarnation of the Son of God.

IV. The introduction of the Mediatorial economy the subject of rejoicing in heaven.

V. The work of grace on the day of Pentecost the model for religious revivals.

The views embodied in these discourses are such as are held in common by all evangelical denominations. The author eschews all controversy. The style is didactic. Nothing sectarian has a place in these sermons, which are simply devoted to popular impression and instruction. It is proposed to put to the Press these Sermons as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers have been secured to justify their publication. If the author meet with adequate encouragement in the sale of this first Volume, it will be succeeded by a second, and so on.

[The contents of the second, third, fourth and fifth volumes are also given in the prospectus which has been furnished us, but as the first volume is to be published separately, the above will sufficiently for the present, indicate the nature and plan of the work. ED.]

The whole of these discourses were prepared and delivered during a not unsuccessful ministry of upwards of twenty years, partly in this country and partly in Great Britain; and are already committed to writing.

Each Volume will be sold at the moderate charge of One Dollar, to be paid for on delivery.

The Volumes will be neatly bound,—octavo size,—and printed on good paper, in a clear type. Each Volume will contain upwards of three hundred pages. Subscriptions will be received for the first Volume alone; or for the first and second; or the whole series may be subscribed for at once.

Mr. LEVI PETIT is authorized to receive subscriptions for these contemplated publications; or a letter addressed to the author, Mount Vernon, Knox county, Ohio, with a request over the writer's signature, to become a subscriber, will insure the insertion of his name on the subscribtion list. [May 29.] THOMAS POTTER.

POETRY.

A PSALM OF LIFE.

BY LONGFELLOW.

Tell me not in mournful numbers,
Life is but an empty dream!
For the soul is dead that slumbers,
And things are not what they seem.

Life is real! Life is earnest!
And the grave is not its goal;
Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
Is our destined end or way;
But to act that each to-morrow
Find us farther than to-day.

Art is long, and time is fleeting,
And our hearts, though stout and brave,
Still, like muffled drums, are beating
Funeral marches to the grave.

In the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of Life,
Be not like dumb, driven cattle!
Be a hero in the strife!

Trust no Future, howe'er pleasant!
Let the dead Past bury its dead!
Act—act in the living Present!
Heart within, and God o'erhead!

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time;

Footprints, that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor, learn to wait.

FREE MASONRY.

Brother Bassett: I propose discussing the subject of Masonry, and not entering into controversy with any man in so doing. I shall endeavor to be as brief and plain as I can, and use as mild language as the nature of the case will admit.

It has been said by Masons that Masonry is of God, that Masonry is the same with Christianity. I contend that Masonry and Christianity are two distinct institutions; the truth of this is so plain that no farther arguments are necessary to prove it, their difference exists in open day-light.—Which is of divine origin? Which embraces a revelation? The answer is, Christianity. Masonry is an institution by itself, and so is Christianity, it is therefore plain that the truths of the Bible do not belong to Masonry, and have not the most distant connection with it. They belong to Christianity. If any of these truths are amalgamated with other things in the Masonic creed they are treated in a manner which God will never justify. Let men detatch what they please from the Bible, in support of a separate system, yet the system will be imperfect; and if it pretends to be of divine origin and to save men it is a fable. Masons may tell us that the most sublime truths belong to their system, but where did they get them? they have mutilated and mangled the Bible, and then say, it is no secret, that Masonry is of divine origin. Masonry is said to have existed in heathen countries; and the priests and philosophers of almost all ancient heathen nations, of Egypt, of Persia, of Greece, of Rome, with the Druids, are said to have been Masons and their mysteries to have been Masonry. Now it is well known that those ancient priests, philosophers and the Druids were base idolaters; and their mysteries the mysteries of pagans, and not the mysteries of the Bible. Masonry as taught by them embraces the heathen mythology; "the ancient philosophers," says Doct. Dwight, "with scarcely an exception, and in view without one, were polytheist, skeptics or atheists."—Theology, conclusion. They may have some knowledge of a Supreme Being; but who among them even of the wisest could give us a correct delineation of his true character, and of the worship due him? Who of them could say, God is infinitely holy? The imperfect ideas which they might have of the true God, were always associated with superstitious ideas which went utterly to overthrow his true character. They were as ignorant of it as they were of the Bible which reveals it, instead of worshipping the true God, they worshipped and taught others to worship false Gods, they were the supporters and propagators of idolatry, their public profession and employ was to change the glory of the incorruptible God into an image, the truth of God into a lie, and to worship and serve the creature more than the Creator. Rom. 1, 23, 25. This is the character of the heathen Masons as given by inspiration. Is it literally marked with "the highest beauties?" Those Masons were pagans—the mysteries they taught were Masonry then in its religious character. It was a system of pagan superstitions: nevertheless we are told by Mr. Town, that Masonry is the same in substance with Christianity, that it even "embraces the whole subject matter of divine economy;" and a true Masonic character is literally marked with the highest beauties. At the same time we are told that pagan priests and philosophers, the mightiest agents ever employed to dishonor God and ruin the world, were Masons and that their mysteries were Masonry. How do these things agree? Is Masonry of divine origin? Does it embrace the whole subject matter of divine economy?

We are farther told that "Masonic principles are the same in every age and nation;" Bradley, page 33; and that no period can be found when "Masonic customs, ceremonies and tenets were not in substance the same as at present." Town, page 146: This is worthy of note; Masonic principles, customs, ceremonies, and tenets, are the same in every age and nation; of course, the principles, customs, ceremonies, and tenets, of pagan priests and philosophers were the same with the principles, customs and tenets of Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and others. In one age and nation, Masons are heathens; in another age and nation, they are christians; yet their principles, customs, ceremonies, and tenets, are the same in substance. If Masonic principles are the same in every age and nation, one of two things is true; either, those ancient men of God were not Masons or those pagan priests and philosophers were not; for the principles of Christ and Belial were never more directly opposed; to say that two men, one a pagan the other a christian, are men of the same sentiments or principles is a great absurdity.

Masonic principles admit Masons to be pagans; being the same in every age and nation; and if all the Masons on the earth should become pagans, they would be good Masons, and could not be disciplined nor excluded from the institution. If one half of a Masonic lodge are pagans, and the other half christians, they meet and unite in Masonic ceremonies in perfect harmony. Hence we read, "the universal principles of the art unite in one indissoluble bond of affection, men of the most opposite tenets, of the most distant countries, and of the most contradictory opinions." Preston, page 30.

If there be a coincidence between Masonry and Christianity, why is it that the hearts of wicked men are so opposed to Christianity, and so charmed with Masonry? that the hearts of wicked unrenewed men, are not pleased with the system of faith and the practical duties of the Bible, is attested by the Bible itself, "the natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned."—"The carnal mind is enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God neither indeed can be," for "the preaching of the cross is foolishness to them that perish." From these and other scriptures, it is evident that there is no object in existence which men so much dislike and oppose as the system of divine truth. They have waged war against it in every age; and such is the enmity of their hearts that nothing short of Almighty power can subdue them and produce in them a relish for the things of God.

That system of morality with which such men are pleased, is far, very far, from being the system of the Bible. That wicked men, and men of the most vicious and abandoned moral sentiments, men who in heart, are hostile to God, and the revelation he has given us; men, who openly disavow and ridicule the doctrines of Christianity, are yet pleased with Masonry, and are its warm advocates, are facts well known to the world. I presume that many of my readers are personally acquainted with men of the most eminent standing in Masonic lodges who are of deistical sentiments, and have an utter aversion to the religion of the Bible. Where then is the agreement between Masonry and Christianity? Why is it that the hearts of such men are so opposed to the one and so charmed with the other? Because Masonry is not of God; it does not require a man to become a new creature, to sustain a new religious character, to renounce the world—to live a self-denying and suffering life for Christ. It has no cross, no Christ crucified, no mortifying of the body, no crucifying the flesh with the affections and lusts. A man may be a Mason and be the same he ever was even a pagan; and sustain the same moral character he ever did, teach others to pursue the worship of the Gods; yet he is told that Masonry will conduct to a sublime and eternal lodge in the heavens. "Masonry does not require persons to believe and support the religion of the Bible; but gives them liberty to believe and support what religion they please; even the religion of heathens, should that be the religion of the country where they reside. We leave every member to choose and support those principles of religion and those forms of government which appear consistent with his views." Bradley, page 8. As a Mason you are to study the moral law as contained in the moral code—the Bible; and in countries where that book is not known, whatever is understood to contain the will or law of God.—Preston, page 51. What kind of religion must that be in a country where the Bible is not known? Base as it may be, Masons are exhorted to study it, and are at liberty to choose and support it. It is a notorious fact, that a man may be a good Mason, pass through life as such, and go down to the grave amidst the cheers and enconiums of the fraternity, without an individual censure from Masonic principles, yet have denied the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and have been a heathen, a papist, or a Mahometan; what agreement, then is there between Masonry and Christianity? No more than there is between the temple of God and idols. Masonry as a professed moral institution, does not acknowledge the true God. It is like the "Pantheon at Rome," which acknowledged all the gods of the heathens; among Mahometans, it acknowledges the god of Mahomet; among Pagans, it acknowledges the multiplied gods of Pagans;—can it at the same time acknowledge the true God? An institution which acknowledges the true God acknowledges no other. Masonry in acknowledging the various gods which its votaries of different nations and religions profess, in reality acknowledges none. A Mahometan or a Pagan, who is a Mason, cannot be excluded from any of the privileges of the order, by those who profess to acknowledge the true God, and merely because he does not acknowledge the same. Men of all nations, of all religions, and with their different gods meet upon this system and hail each other as brethren. Masonry does not acknowledge the law of God as the standard of morality though it may pretend to this. That law teaches all men to love their neighbors as themselves, and to do by all others as they would have all others do by them. The practice of these holy and benevolent precepts by Masons, would be as fatal to the existence of their institution as an exposure of its secrets and ceremonies. They are taught by their own sentiments, to love each other more than any others of the human family: this morality sunders these holy and endearing ties, which ought to unite all creatures as the children of one great family; it is as much in contrast with every duty enjoined by the Divine law-giver as right is with wrong. Those who acknowledge Masonry to be a good moral institution, must acknowledge something else besides the law of God as the standard of morality. Should Masons acknowledge the moral law as the standard of morality among them and should they practice its divine requirements they would overthrow their own system. No man would then be regarded because he is a Mason, the same respect would be paid to those who are not Masons, that there would be to those who are. Hence the grand hailing sign of distress, and other mysterious tokens of Masonry would fall into entire disuse.—Masonic oaths embrace the great leading sentiments of the order, sentiments on which the institution is based. Let any one examine these and he cannot find within the whole compass a solitary sentiment which comports with the moral law. This leads us to notice the deception which has been practised by Masonic writers. They have professed to publish to the world the great leading sentiments of their institution. Have they fully and fairly published the sentiments contained in their oaths? They have deceived the public. They have dressed the institution in borrowed ornaments, while its real deformity has been artfully concealed. A. C.

Secret Societies.

HINTS ON THE DISCUSSION.

Br. Bassett: I have but few words to say, and those few words will be under my true signature.

I saw, some time ago, a notice in your paper, that its columns would be open for a discussion on the merits of Secret Societies. Since then I have seen several attacks on the character of Secret Societies, but none as I recollect as to their merits. I was sorry, when I saw the notice alluded to—sorry because I feel an interest in seeing a paper of the Protestant Methodist Church, useful, and well sustained.

I do not intend to discuss the merits, or character of the individuals, who may be the authors of the several pieces which have appeared in the Recorder, in opposition to Secret Societies, for certain good reasons. First, I make it a point never to differ, or rather fall out with any man, on any subject, who I consider to be my inferior in point of character, and surely, I am not able to judge of that matter unless I know who my antagonist is,—and second, I make it a point never to undertake to discuss any subject with any person who is entirely ignorant of the topic he undertakes to discuss. I make use of the term 'Secret Societies,' because it is used by those who have been scribling for your paper. Now sir, I dislike both Secret Societies and secret men.

I have the honor to belong to a society whose objects, are charity, and benevolence, but I never kept it a secret from any body. The society has never to my knowledge tried to hide from the world, that there was such a society, or the place where it held its meetings.

'Tis true that in some of their acts of charity and alms, they have not let even their "left hand know, what their right hand doeth."

I understand a Secret Society to be one that hides from the world their existence. And I understand a secret man, to be one who keeps himself hid from the world.

You say in your last that if the discussion is to be all on one side, it will be best to stop it soon. Well—so far as the society to which I belong, is concerned, I could have informed you before it commenced, that it would have been all on one side, so far as we are concerned. We know too well, the darling virtues of silence and caution to cast our "pearls before swine." We are too strict observers of the injunctions of Holy Writ, to do that. Besides, we have not an opportunity of being heard upon this matter. We cant, make ourselves properly understood, by those who know nothing about us. Do you suppose, Mr. Editor, that a christian can make known to an unbeliever, his feelings when under the influence of the Holy Spirit of God, so that he can comprehend, and understand them? Again, suppose that I was to start out, and undertake to discuss the character, private, or public, of your W. S. S's. and your ———s's who have been scribbling under fictitious names! how do you think I should make out? Why sir, I know nothing about them or their characters, only so far, as they have developed them through the medium of you paper, (and that is none too favorable in my estimation,) and were I to draw conclusions from their premises, I must presume them to be the worst of characters; and why? because they are secret men. They dare not let the world know who they are. They dare not even tell their names. If a man stabs us in the dark, we say he is a coward,—an assassin of the worst kind; but yet some people think, or seem to think that to attack a man's character or that of a society, and destroy their character and reputation in a secret manner or under disguise, that they are doing a noble act, while they themselves screened behind a name too innocent, and pure for them to commit sacrilege upon, by affixing them to their insignficant attacks upon those who wish and will do no harm. As I said before, I do not intend to discuss the merits, or demerits of any society, with any person, under an assumed name or with any one who has no knowledge of what he is talking about, and let me just say to my brethren through your paper; to let those "filthy dreamers" talk on; but as for you my brethren "touch not; taste not; and handle not the unclean things."

But Mr. Editor, I did not intend to say half as much, as I have said, when I commenced writing. I merely intended to say a word, or two to you, without noticing any body else, I said to you, that I was sorry to see the notice that your columns would be open for discussion on the the subject of Secret Societies, because I had a regard for the character of your paper.

If you open your columns for such discussions, I fear that there will be more harm done to you and your paper, than to the societies they seek to villify, for you must see the unfairness of trying in this manner, the societies spoken of, and the great disadvantages under which a member of any of them must enter the lists, if indeed, he was disposed to do so. As I before said, I am a member of a society that I glory in, and one that our enemies please to call secret oath bound, &c. I am not afraid of any injury that may result from the unmerited attacks of any man, or body of men, but I can hardly reconcile my conscience to support a paper which is permitting my enemy, or the enemies of the society to which I belong, (and which I know to be good) to be all the time attempting to cut my throat, or those of my fellows and brothers.

And I suppose there are many others who are "like minded." I do not at all wish to dictate to you, how you shall conduct your paper, or with what you shall fill its columns. By no means—your paper is yours and my money is mine, but I hope you will excuse one, who would be glad to sustain it, just to drop a simple hint upon the propriety of suffering such articles to find a place in the paper, as he thinks, will at least, do it no good. Well, I will be plain; my first thought was, on seeing the notice above alluded to, to drop a line to you, requesting you to erase my name from the list of your subscribers, without giving any reason; on reflection I thought this would not be fair, and I thought it would sound too much like a secret man. To be sure, this would not hurt you much, if there should be no others, who would do the same thing, and it may be, you would do better to pursue a course that would drive off all your subscribers, who are members of what are called Secret Societies—you might get an increased list of their opposers, so that your paper would be in that event better supported than it now is. I do not know as the members of the Secret Societies, are of much if any advantage to you.—I don't know whether there are many of them, or whether they are good pay masters, all these things are better known to yourself.

But on the whole, Brother Bassett, I have concluded to let my name remain yet a little, if you are agreed, and hope my brethren, and friends will do the same, if you are agreed.

Yours, truly, JOSEPH HILDRETH.

Brownsville, in Reply to Gratiot.

Mr. Editor: I was glad to see my old friend "Gratiot" out in your paper of the 15th inst., on the subject of Secret Societies in general, and I suppose the Sons of Temperance in particular, as they seem to be attracting more attention now than any other of those societies. His efforts to justify himself in reference to his position to this organization of the friends of Temperance, are not as satisfactory as we could have desired.—He is evidently embarrassed; would that I could relieve him. But he has so many objections that I fear it will be a hopeless task—for you know in this matter of objections more than half depends on the will to entertain and raise them. An effort, however, should it even prove a failure, will show my sincerity, and I therefore (with your permission) go at him.

1st. "They are robbers of the churches."—This is objection No. 7, and seems to be the climax of all the rest, and if found to rest on a good foundation, is worthy of more consideration than any of the rest. Yes, they are robbers! and that too of the most sweeping kind—taking everything; sacrilege is their business—their hands and hearts are full of it. And then their success in enlisting friends to swell their ranks; makes them truly a formidable band. This is a serious matter. "Our mother" cannot long stand before them. The Babylonians will be too strong for her. "Gratiot" and a few others perhaps, in their great zeal aided with something of a prophetic eye, have made this discovery and they cannot be mistaken—at least I would think so from the confidence with which they speak and write on the subject. Now I know that "Gratiot" has a zeal for the church, (and for this as much as any thing else, I respect him;) yet without questioning his intelligence, I am led to wonder how he can see any thing in an institution, established and patronised by Temperance men of all creeds and parties, who are publicly as well as privately pledged to the advocacy and promotion of Temperance principles, that can in any way militate against the interests and prosperity of the church. To believe this we would have to give the lie to facts, established in the history of the Temperance reformation—some of which have been made palpable to our own senses.—The agitation of this question, and the organizations through which the work has been thus far carried on, have had a most salutary influence on the churches; that many wine-bibbing parsons, rum-dealing elders and deacons, whiskey-loving stewards and class-leaders, together with a few of the rank and file, have found their places too warm for them, and have, therefore, been compelled to abandon their hypocritical professions, or reform and conform truly and spiritually to them. If this is the robbery complained of, we have only to say that our regrets are, that we have not been able to do more of it. In this work, not of robbery, but reform, it gives me pleasure to say, that the "Sons" have been very active and successful. Thousands are now rejoicing over the victories they have achieved through their aid, over a vitiated and depraved appetite, many of whom have doubtless become members of the church, and are adorning their profession by a walk and conversation such as becometh godliness. That he who "knoweth the end from the beginning," and hath declared that "no drunkard shall enter the Kingdom of Heaven," and that he delighteth not in the damnation of any, must certainly look with favor on this work, and grant his blessing on the hands and hearts of those that are engaged in it.

Again we say—it is not robbery. That is a business practised by dram-makers, venders, and drinkers, and we are determined to wash our hands and clear ourselves from them, and any connection with their unholy pursuits.

2. Money. This is objection No. 6, and is a question of some importance. Means are required to secure ends, and we have long since learned that money is the life of almost every enterprise. Who can tell the amount of money that is daily squandered by dissipation, or the amount paid by us in taxes, caused by the use of ardent spirits? How may we estimate the amount of suffering, degradation, and crime, the hunger, thirst and nakedness—the days of trial and nights of gloom and anguish in dollars and cents, which indulgences of this kind have cost many of our fellows—some of whom we are almost daily brought into connection with? Or how may we count up the amount of capital, &c., employed in distilling and vending this liquid damnation? Humanity calls upon us to give. Good policy as tax-payers, dictates that we should give. If we would meet successfully this host of Satan, with their stills and their strong boxes which keeps them stirring—we must give of our substance to a common fund, upon which we may draw, in the prosecution of our contest with them. Selfishness will keep more from our ranks, than any scruples about the propriety of joining Secret Associations. Was all our means employed strictly in advancing by agents and publications, the great cause so near our hearts, it would be a good expenditure. Yet we propose to, and do grant benefits to our brethren in their afflictions. Intemperance more than any thing else, has robbed our "children of Bibles and bread," &c., &c.—"The Order," with its means and influences is designed to supply this need—a work that our churches have long neglected.

3d. Time. Objection No. 5. Yes, this is an objection—and pray what was time given to us for, if not to improve in doing good? But "Gratiot" thinks that no good can be done, but in the church—all time spent elsewhere, is trifled away. Now this is a beautiful idea indeed, and how much of this precious boon is wasted at the grocery and still-house? how many days and weeks are worse than thrown away by men indulging in their cups?—Who can estimate these things?—Let "Gratiot" do it—at any rate before he charges us with moral delinquency in this matter.—For certainly, in nothing have we effected more signal good, than in the time redeemed and well improved by our members. They are not only seen more punctually attending their business and the Division Room, but we have been greatly deceived by our optics, if their attendance at church has not been as much improved as in any thing else.

But I have not time now to notice at length the other objections, nor do I think they are worthy of much attention, for they sound to me, more like the whinings of some old maid, who has lived quite past "the wonders," than a Reverend Brother of fifty. This is "straining at gnats," and I must leave him in his agonies.

BROWNSVILLE.

TEMPERANCE.

Progress of Intemperance.

There lies before us a duly authenticated document from the Philadelphia Custom House, containing a "comparative statement of the quantity of foreign wines, spirits, molasses, &c., imported into Philadelphia from 1843 to 1847."—From this statement we derive the following:

	Gals. in 1843.	Gals. in 1846.
Brandy,	68,934	170,272
Rum,	2,000	8,645
Whiskey,	3,294	4,614
Maderia,	15	16,054
Port,	71	15,682
Sherry,	144	881
Teneriffe,	00	9,975
Malaga,	4,823	30,920
Sicily,	00	19,250
Red,	00	51,869
White French,	12,397	51,869
Holland Gin,	11,813	49,870
	103,491	380,844
Claret Wine,	79,402	621

This statent exhibits a most startling increase in the consumption of intoxicating drinks, and should incite the friends of humanity to renewed and heightened exertions to check the invasion of an enemy more dangerous and destructive than a world in arms against us.—North American.

Important Facts.

In Sweden there were, in 1834, no less than 161,000 Distilleries—in 1844, these were reduced to 72,000. That country has 332 temperance societies, with 90,000 members.

Norway has 128 temperance societies, and 14,812 members.

In the kingdom of Hanover, there are 456 societies, and 69,116 members.

In the duchy of Oldenburgh, there are 75 societies, and 28,128 members.

In the rest of Germany, there are 126 societies, and 25,825 members.

So that there are now in all Germany, including Austria, 1,426 temperance societies, and no less than 1,019,193 members.

John Wadleigh's Trial for Sleeping in Meeting.

Justice Winslow.—What do you know about John Wadleigh's sleeping in meeting?

Witness.—I know all about it; 'taint no secret, I guess.

Justice.—Then tell us all about it; that's just what we want to know.

Witness, (scratching his head.)—Well, the long and the short of it is, John Wadleigh is a hard working man; that is, he works mighty hard doing nothing, and that's the hardest work there is done. It will make a feller sleep quicker than poppy leaves. So it stands to reason that Wadleigh would naturally be a very sleepy sort of a person. Well, the weather is sometimes naturally considerable warm, and Parson Moody's sarmon is sometimes rather heavy like.

'Stop, stop!' said Justice Winslow. 'No reflections upon Parson Moody; that is not what you were called here for.

Witness.—I don't cast no reflections on Parson Moody. I was only telling what I know about John Wadleigh's sleeping in meeting; and it's my opinion, especially in warm weather, that sarmons that are heavy like, and two hours long, naturally have a tendency———

'Stop, stop, I say,' said Squire Winslow. 'If you repeat any of these reflections on Parson Moody again, I'll commit you to the cage for contempt of court!'

Witness.—I don't cast no reflections on Parson Moody. I was only telling what I know about John Wadleigh's sleeping in meeting.

Squire Winslow.—Well, go on, and tell us all about that. You weren't called here to testify about Parson Moody.

Witness.—That's what I am trying to do, if you wouldn't keep putting me out. And its my opinion, in warm weather, folks is considerable apt to sleep in meeting especially when the sarmon—I mean especially where they get pretty tired. I know I find it pretty hard work to get by seventhly and eighthly in the sarmon myself; but, if I once get by there, I generally get into a kind of a waking train again, and make out to weather it. But it isn't so with Wadleigh. I've generally noticed if he begins to gape at seventhly and eighthly, it's a gone goose with him before he gets through tenthly, and he has to look out for another prop for his head somewhere, for his neck isn't stiff enough to hold it up. And from tenthly up to sixteenthly he's as dead as a door nail, till the amen brings the people up to prayers, and Wadleigh comes up with a jerk, like opening a jack-knife.—Seba Smith.

Hints to Young Men.—Always have a book within your reach, which you can catch up at your odd minutes.

Resolve to edge in a little reading every day, if it is but a single sentence. If you can only gain fifteen minutes in a day, it will be felt at the end of the year.

Regulate your thoughts when not at study.—A man is thinking even while he is employed at labor. Why may he not be thinking of something that is useful?

Resolve in your mind what you have last been reading.

The Lost Days.—In conformity with act of Parliament, New Style was begun in 1752 in all British dominions. From this time the year instead of commencing on the 25th of March, was begun on the 1st of January; the correction of the calendar being made by dropping eleven days in the month of September—the day following the 2d of September of this year being called the 14th of September—consequently, we may look in vain for the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th and 13th of September, 1752, there being no such days on record. We have read somewhere that this act of Parliament caused great anger and indignation among the ignorant masses. They are said to have stoned some of the members, at the same time accusing them of having robbed the people of eleven days of their natural lives.

The Sarah Sands.—It will be seen by the Britannia's news, that the steamer Sarah Sands had put into Cork in consequence of an accident, but was to sail again on the 3d inst.

A young man was killed at Richmond on the 5th inst., by a ball from a gun which was fired by some of the military in honor of the occasion.

Ministers' Department.

From the Religious Telescope.

A DIVINE CALL.

This is the starting point with every true minister of the gospel, without which no one should ever think of entering upon this holy and responsible work. By a divine call we mean a special call given by the Holy Ghost, by which the man is inwardly assured that God has appointed him to the work of the ministry.

This is a prerogative of the great Head of the Church, which he has in every age reserved exclusively to himself, no doubt, for the best of reasons. Had it been left to the Church to choose her own ministers, the consequences would have been disastrous in the extreme. The numerous examples furnished by the different divisions of the militant church, in which the Divine agency in appointing men to preach has not been fully acknowledged, should teach us to beware how we interfere with the plans of God. Loss of faith and power, deadness and formality, and a withdrawal of the spirit of God from the Churches, have universally been the results of the labors of men-called and men-made ministers, while Divine power and the spirit of revivals have always rested upon the Churches that have guarded well this point.

In proof of a Heaven-appointed ministry, we refer to God's plan as revealed in the Old and New Testament. It is so obvious to every reader of the Bible, that the Lord did, in every instance under the Jewish dispensation, select his own priests and prophets, that it is unnecessary to spend time to prove it. In the erection of the Christian Church our Saviour pursued the same principle, selecting one here and another there, to the number of eighty-two. The same principle was carried out after the ascension of Christ, in the Church, under the care of the Apostles.—That this was intended as a permanent arrangement, to exist down to the latest period of the Church, is proved by the general tenor of the New Testament. A few passages strike us as appropriate: "The harvest is great, but the laborers are few: pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers into his harvest." Here the Church is taught to pray the Lord, not the Church—to send men out to preach. Again: The Apostle Paul addresses the Ephesian elders thus: "Take heed unto yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers." When the Apostles were in a strait in reference to the choice of an apostle to fill the place of Judas, they sanctioned this principle by appealing to God to ascertain which he had chosen. Again: "No man taketh this honor to himself, but he that is called of God as was Aaron." "How can they preach except they be sent?" But we need not multiply texts; the doctrine is asserted and acknowledged in a variety of ways in the N. Testament, and its negative is not once named, neither can it fairly be inferred from any passage of holy writ. This view accords with the experience of evangelical ministers, such as "have preached the gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven," of every age and name. Thousands of living witnesses, such as have been the most successful in the salvation of souls, have learned in their own experience that a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto them, and that woe to them if they preach not the gospel.

Such a call, and an assurance of it it is almost absolutely necessary to a minister's efficiency.—Without this, he will either make preaching the gospel as a common mechanical business, and preach only when it is the most conducive to his present interest; or, he will always be doubting and halting at every trial. He cannot have the assurance necessary to carry him through the trials incident to his work, without the evidence of being divinely appointed. But, having this assurance he can set his face as a flint against every opposing influence, because God has sent him. His firmness, his zeal, his self-sacrificing devotion to the cause, his whole spirit and demeanor, in the pulpit and out of it, all give evidence that he is commissioned from above. A man thus called and commissioned is ready to stand in the breach to save Israel from destruction; he is ready to rush in between the dead and the living, if the destroying plague can thereby be stayed. O, did all who now labor in the vineyard of the Lord, but realize the full force of their commission, as the servants of Jesus Christ, and preach with that authority and power that their high commission confers, how soon would the Church be awakened from her slumbers, shake herself from the dust, and be clothed upon with salvation! We fear many of us as ministers, need a renewal of our commission, and the evidence of it, before we can "open our mouths boldly to make known the mystery of the gospel as we ought to speak."

Our John Johnson;

OR, THE MAN WITH EXTENSIVE CONNECTIONS.

We are not, dear reader, about to inflict upon you a long biography of the distinguished personage whose name is so conspicuously paraded at the head of this article; for, to own the truth, our personal acquaintance with the individual has been next to nothing. Indeed, we are not quite sure that we have his name right, as it stands recorded in the old family Bible; for a sense of duty to all the world constrains us to confess, that we quote from recollection—not having seen, for several years, the family record of the very reputable generations of the Johnsons. The name itself signifies, as any body may know, that the hero of our story was neither more nor less than John's son.

When we first heard of him, John Johnson lived in Charleston, S. C., and was a member of an orthodox church, in good standing. Suffering his own garden to be overrun with weeds, he spent much time in weeding the gardens of his brethren. He was so pure and godly (in his own estimation) that all others were, in his sight, amazingly deficient as regarded all essential qualities and qualifications for the kingdom of God. But his chief business was, to keep his minister in the straight and narrow path of duty. By virtue of his admirable skill in fault-finding, he could detect in an instant, defects in a sermon, or a prayer, which other people had not the wit nor the wisdom to discover. As he was always in the right, and his brethren always in the wrong, he was always, from moral necessity, opposed to whatever the majority were in favor of; and as he was of course always in the minority, because "broad is the road that leads to death, and thousands walk together there; while wisdom shows a narrower path with here and there a traveller"—he was compelled to resort to intrigue, and mischief-making, in order to carry his point, and secure his end. This kept the church to which he belonged in a continual turmoil, and rendered the life of his poor minister a life of continued anxiety and wretchedness. The Rev. Mr. Psalter, for such we must call him, worn out with the labors and trials, and tormented by the vexatious intrusions and importunities of brother John Johnson, asked and obtained leave of absence for a few months, for the purpose of taking a long breath; being determined to obtain a situation, if possible, where he could enjoy exemption from the evil which had well nigh worn out his patience, and rendered life a burden. Keeping his determination to himself, not daring to tell his wife and children of it, lest John Johnson should get hold of it and prevent his going, he started on his journey, and arrived safe and sound in the good city of Philadelphia. Intent upon the object he had in view, he lost no time in calling upon a ministering brother, to whom he related his troubles. What was his surprise to learn that the good brother to whom he had gone for sympathy, was in a like predicament: "Alas," he exclaimed, "you have come to the wrong place for relief; for in my society I have a man, one of the most officious communicants, who exactly answers to the description of your Mr. John Johnson, and he keeps the church in such an uproar all the while, that I have been praying for a call."

Losing no time by delay, Mr. Psalter took passage for New York, and made the accquaintance of several of the brethren there. Great was his grief on finding that each one had a John Johnson in his parish. He went to Boston, and diligently inquired into the state of things there, thinking that in the metropolis of New England he would find at least one religious society that had no John Johnson in it. In this he was disappointed; and making all convenient haste, he went to Salem, hoping that the race of the Johnsons had been exterminated when the Puritans drove off the Baptists and Quakers, and hung their witches.

Calling on the venerable Dr. Worcester, then alive, and preaching there, Mr. Psalter told his pitiful story, and repeated his earnest inquiry for a religious society without a John Johnson in it. "Go back," said the Doctor, "and make the best you can of the evils of your condition; for, in all my long experience, I have never known a parish without one of the Johnson family in it."—Wesern Evangelist.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, AUGUST 5, 1847.

Rev. J. H. Thomas.—We publish entire the letter of this excellent brother, without any reply to its contents, (as he says it is probably his last,) except to name a few errors, in which no wrong could have been intended on his part.

Information Wanted—Statistics of Conferences.—We are about publishing the Annual Register of the M. P. Church, for the year 1848, and are anxious to obtain, in view of this publication, the statistics of those Annual Conferences which have not published their Minutes in full. We desire to have the name of the President of each Conference, the number of Stations, Circuits, Missions, Itinerant ministers and preachers, Unstationed ministers and preachers, Members, and houses of worship in each District. Also, the time and place of the next session of each Annual Conference. If the secretaries, or any other having the information, will communicate it to us without delay, we shall be greatly obliged, and will be pleased to reciprocate the favor in any possible way.

"Change for the Better."—So says the Western Christian Advocate of William Shires, late proprietor of 'Shires' Garden,' a theatrical establishment in Cincinnati, and also of two other similar establishments, one in Pittsburgh, and one in Louisville. He has entirely given up the business, and entered upon a mechanical avocation, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, in Cincinnati. Shires, we know, has had a praying mother.

A Doctress.—We see in a Boston newspaper, the advertisement of Mrs. Mott, a female physician, announcing to the public that she is to be found at all times at her residence, in Cambridge street, where she will attend to all diseases incident to the human frame, in men, women and children, except those arising from immorality.

Great Snake, Perhaps.—A great wonder has for two or three weeks past been exciting the attention of the folks of Clermont county, Ohio. In the Cincinnati Commercial is published the affidavit of a man, sworn to before a magistrate, stating that he did see in a mill pond, on the East Fork of the Little Miami, and near Williamsburg in said county, something like a sea serpent, its head about the size of a horse's head, and its body, about the same thickness. At first this was disbelieved, but latterly other persons having professed to have seen the monster, a great snake meeting was appointed, and some five hundred or more persons assembled to drain the pond, and get the creature. Our latest intelligence from the seat of the snake war, is by the Clermont County Sun, which states that since the great snake meeting, snake stock has depreciated.—We reckon it turned out like a much greater meeting we saw last summer at Pittsburgh and Allegheny, we should say ten thousand persons of the two cities were present, including mayors, editors, clergymen and all sorts, to see a man fly!—After the multitudes had waited long in anxious expectation, as we were informed by one who staid, some fellow on the top of Hand Street Bridge, Allegheny river, relieved the scene, by letting off a goose. When it flew, the people considered themselves dismissed. These are the days of real wonders, but of humbug also.

Bibles in Hotels.—The Young Men's Bible Society of Cincinnati, have lately been supplying the Hotels of that city with Bibles. The Commercial gives a list of the number furnished to the several Hotels, both in parlors and rooms.—The number of Hotels is nine teen. The number furnished to parlors, from one to five for each hotel, is 37. The number furnished to rooms, from 12 to 95 for each Hotel, is 709. The same society have been very enterprising heretofore, in supplying the various steamboats on the Ohio river with the Bible. Wish there were many more such societies.

Going South.—The Clermont County Sun, states that Rev. A. J. Laughlin, who has travelled Batavia Circuit, for the year closing, withdraws from the Ohio Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to join the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

An Omitted portion of History.—John G. Whittier, one of the best of writers, in a late number of the National Era, calls attention to an item of American History, which has somehow been carefully kept out of sight. It is the participation taken by colored men in the two great struggles with Great Britain, for American freedom. He brings to notice interesting facts, which, it seems, have been for half a century, carefully 'elbowed aside.' He shows that the free colored men of the United States bore their full proportion of the sacrifices and sufferings of the Revolutionary War, and also of the war of 1812, and yet, he says, they have no historian. He gives the testimony of Hon. Calvin Goddard, formerly Congressman from Connecticut, that in the little circle of his residence, he procured, under the act of 1818, the pensions of nineteen colored soldiers. One of these was Primus Babcock, an aged Black man, who held an honorable discharge from service during the war, dated at the close of it, wholly in the hand writing of Geo. Washington. This instrument was forwarded to the War Department, in procuring his pension. "I cannot," says Mr. G., "forget the expression of his feelings, when informed that it (his discharge) could not be returned to him. At his request it was written for, as he seemed inclined to spurn the pension, and reclaim the discharge."

The like honorable mention is made, upon the best authority, of the patriotism and bravery of colored troops from New York, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire and Rhode Island, in the war of the revolution. Old citizens of Philadelphia, to this day, remember the fact, that when the troops of the North marched through the city, one or more colored companies were attached to nearly all the regiments. It is stated also, that all the vessels in the American service, at that time, were partly manned by blacks. The celebrated Charles Pinckney of South Carolina, in his speech on the Missouri question, admitted that the colored people were, in numerous instances the pioneers, and in all, the laborers of our armies. To their hands, he said, were owing the greatest part of the fortifications raised for the protection of the country, whilst numerous bodies of them fought side by side with the whites, at the battles of the revolution. The following passages contain important facts and will be found interesting.

"In Rhode Island," says Governor Eustis, of Massachusetts, in his able speech against slavery in Missouri, 12th of 12th month, 1820, "he blacks formed an entire regiment, and they discharged their duty with zeal and fidelity. The gallant defence of Red Bank, in which the black regiment bore a part, is among the proofs of their valor." In this contest, it will be recollected that four hundred men met and repulsed, after a terrible and sanguinary struggle, fifteen hundred Hessian troops, headed by Count Donop. The glory of the defence of Red Bank, which has been pronounced one of the most heroic actions of the war, belongs in reality to black men; yet who now hears them spoken of in connection with it? Among the traits which distinguished the black regiment, was devotion to their officers.—In the attack made upon the American lines near Croton river, on the 13th of 5th month, 1781, Colonel Greene, the commander of the regiment, was cut down and mortally wounded; but the sabres of the enemy only reached him through the bodies of his faithful guard of blacks, who hovered over him to protect him, every one of whom was killed. The late Rev. Dr. Harris, of Dunbarton, New Hampshire, a Revolutionary veteran, stated, in a speech at Francestown, New Hampshire, some years ago, that on one occasion the regiment to which he was attached was commanded to defend an important position, which the enemy thrice assailed, and from which they were as often repulsed. "There was," said the venerable speaker, "a regiment of blacks in the same situation—a regiment of negroes fighting for our liberty and independence, not a white man among them but the officers—in the same dangerous and responsible position. Had they been unfaithful, or given way before the enemy, all would have been lost. Three times in succession were they attacked with most desperate fury by well-disciplined and veteran troops, and three times did they successully repel the assault, and thus preserve an army. They fought thus through the war. They were brave and hardy troops."

Governor Eustis, in the speech before quoted, states that the free colored soldiers entered the ranks with the whites. The time of those who were slaves was purchased of their masters, and they were induced to enter the service in consequence of a law of Congress by which, on condition of their serving in the ranks duriug the war, they were made freemen. This hope of Liberty inspired them with courage to oppose their breasts to the Hessian bayonet at Red Bank, and enabled them to endure with fortitude the cold and famine of Valley Forge. The anecdote of the slave of General Sullivan, of N. Hampshire, is well known. When his master told him that they were on the point of starting for the army, to fight for Liberty, he shrewdly suggested that it would be a great satisfaction to know that he was indeed going to fight for his liberty. Struck with the reasonableness and justice of this suggestion, General Sullivan at once gave him his freedom.

Facts are also adduced, exhibiting the bravery of troops of colored men, in the war of 1812.—Hon. Mr. Martindale, of New York, said in a speech, in Congress, that he himself saw an entire battalion of negroes, as fine martial looking men as he ever saw, attached to the northern army in the last war, on its march from Plattsburg to Sacketts Harbor. Hon. Charles Miner, of Pa., said in Congress: "The African race make excellent soldiers. Large numbers of them were with Perry, and helped to gain the brilliant victory of Lake Erie. A whole battalion of them were distinguished for their orderly appearance." Dr. Clarke, in the New York constitutional convention of 1821, speaking of the colored inhabitants of his State, said: "In your late war, they contributed largely towards some of your most splendid victories. In this very house, in 1814, a bill passed, authorizing the Governor to accept the services of 2,000 free people of color. They were not compelled to go—they were not drafted. No: your pride had placed them beyond your compulsory power. There was no necessity for its exercise; they were volunteers; yes, sir, volunteers to defend that very country which had treated them with insult, degredation, and slavery."

On the capture of Washington by the British forces, says Mr. Whittier, it was judged expedient to fortify, without delay, the principal towns and cities exposed to similar attacks. The Vigilance Committee of Philadelphia waited upon three of the principal colored citizens, viz: James Forten, Bishop Allen, and Absalom Jones, soliciting the aid of the people of color, in erecting suitable defences for the city. Accordingly, 2,500 colored men assembled in the State-house yard, and from thence marched to Gray's Ferry, where they labored for two days, almost without intermission. Their labors were so faithful and efficient, that a vote of thanks was tendered them by the committee. A battalion of colored troops was at the same time organised in the city, under an officer of the United States army; and they were on the point of marching to the frontier, when peace was proclaimed.

General Jackson's proclamations to the free colored inhabitants of Louisiana are well known. The second proclamation is one of the highest compliments ever paid by a military chief to his soldiers:

"To the Free People of Color.

"Soldiers! When on the banks of the Mobile I called you to take up arms, inviting you to partake the perils and glory of your white fellow-citizens, I expected much from you; for I was not ignorant that you possessed qualities most formidable to an invading enemy. I knew with what fortitude you could endure hunger and thirst, and all the fatigues of a campaign. I knew well how you loved your native country, and that you, as well as ourselves, had to defend what man holds most dear—his parents, wife, children, and property. You have done more than I expected. In addition to the previous qualities I before knew you to possess, I found among you a noble enthusiasm, which leads to the performance of great things.

"Soldiers! The President of the United States shall hear how praiseworthy was your conduct in the hour of danger, and the Representatives of the American people will give you the praise your exploits entitle you to. Your General anticipates them in applauding your noble ardor."

Secret Societies.--The Discussion.

Really, our writers are improving the time, as we have allowed but a limited period for the controversy to occupy our columns. It was not agreeable to our wishes that it was admitted, but we yielded to the claims of some, that temperate articles, upon either side, should have place for a time. We are yet doubtful that the discussion will be either profitable or interesting to the majority of our readers. We therefore renew our request for correspondents to close it soon. It cannot be continued beyond the limits of this volume.

A few words to our friend, Dr. Hildreth. We are much obliged for the interest he takes in our paper, and his promptness, as an advance paying subscriber. We take pleasure in saying that others of his brethren, we have also amongst our best patrons. The Dr. thinks that the admission of the discussion on this question, will injure our paper. We have feared this same thing. But we must remind him on which side of the question this controversy was began in our columns. In our paper of April 23, 1846, appeared an article by Dr. Knight, in vindication of the order of Odd Fellowship. This was the first, to our recollection, on the question of secret societies which found place in our paper. Next, an article was inserted, May 21st. from the pen of a gentleman in Newark, in behalf of the order of the Sons of Temperance. Then, in our paper of July 30th following, appeared an article by a respectable Free Mason signed "A Fellow Craft" in vindication of the order. The Dr. received our paper last year, and he may perhaps recollect that members of those associations first occupied our columns, on the subject. Well, be cause we published those articles, agreeably to the wishes of an Odd Fellow, a Son of Temperance, and "A fellow Craft" Mason, several Anti-Masons actually ordered our paper discontinued. One of them however was still further displeased because last fall we did give as an item of news, the names of officers appointed at the anniversary of the Grand Lodge of Ohio. We could just as readily have given the list of officers of his Anti Masonic society, had the brother furnished them to us. We have since been reminded of the fredom of our press, and have been solicited to open our columns to articles on the question of secret societies. We cannot help thinking that some good brethren upon either side are more sensitive than need to be, on this subject, especially as they must see that we are determined to treat the different parties with fairness and impartiality. We are glad that our friend the Doctor, comes to so good a conclusion, and calls on his brethren and friends to continue their patronage. Those Anti—brethren who discontinued, should certainly renew their subscriptions.

Purchase of Cuba.—The Editor of the New York Sun, is quite zealous for the annexation of Cuba, by purchase, to the United States. He has been visiting there, and states that he had a consultation with a meeting of the most wealthy and influential men, of the city of Havana, on the subject. It seems that the Cubans are anxious for annexation. For one hundred millions of dollars, Spain would dispose of her control over Cuba. And the Editor of the Sun is assured, that so soon as the United States make the offer of this sum, the inhabitants of the island will, within one week's notice, make up and pay over the whole amount. The Sun insists that we must have Cuba—that it is indispensable, to completing this great country and nation of ours.

Sad Disaster.—On Monday last, three persons were drowned in the Muskingum river, a few miles below this place. It happend on this wise. A Mr. and Mrs. Saunders, and their son-in-law, Mr. John Stainbrook, were passing down the river in a skiff. They had considerable load of corn and wool in the skiff, which they were taking to Taylorsville, below. Two steamboats, the Harlam and Mingo Chief, coming up near together, met and passed the skiff. The waves caused by the two boats, overwhelmed and swamped the skiff, because it was so heavily laden with the persons and bags of corn. All three of the persons were drowned,—neither of the steamboats having a yawl, by which they could render assistance.

Singular and Distressing Death.—A few weeks ago we were informed by a letter from a member of the family, of the singular affliction, of a young son of Brother J. D. Langdon, of the vicinity of Cincinnati. In January last, by a mysterious protrusion of his left eye, it was discovered that a cancerous tumor was forming behind it. This continued to increase until it forced the eye out upon the cheek, and was of course very painful. Dr. Muzzy of Cincinnati performed the operation of removing the tumor, and replacing the eye. For a few days there were hopes of his recovery, but again the tumor began to grow, and continued to increase in size, till the operation had to be repeated by Dr. Muzzy, but with no better success. He was afterwards taken to eminent physicians in Louisville, who all decided that the case was a hopeless one. The subjoined notice, which is just received, brings us intelligence of the sad issue of the case. We knew Edwin from his infancy, and must say, that to know him, was to love him.—He was not simply the idol of his parents, but was admired by all, as a most inoffensive and amiable youth. How mysterious are the ways of Divine Providence. We sympathise with those dear friends, whose hearts have been penetrated with deep sorrow. But we rejoice that their sorrow is accompanied with hope and consolation. 'Tis best to have ties in heaven.

Columbia, O., July 30, 1847.

Dear Brother Bassett: Your heart will undoubtedly be filled with sorrow on the reception of this communication, as it contains the mournful intelligence of the death, of a son of one of your best friends.

Died, on Monday, July 26th, 1847, at his father's residence near Columbia, Ohio, Edwin Mattoon, fifth son of Rev. James D. and Sarah P. Langdon, aged 12 years and 7 months. The disease with which he was afflicted, was Fungus Haematodes of the eye. It made its first appearance, about the middle of last January.—The tumor increased, and baffled the skill of the best physicians in Cincinnati, and Louisville.—Two surgical operations were performed by Dr. Muzzy, of Cincinnati. The first, on the 4th of March; the second, the 25th of May: Still the disease progressed, and assumed a more fearful aspect. Death had undoubtedly marked him for an early victim.—The bud was to receive a withering touch, from the blighting hand of death; ere it had expanded into manhood. And although 'marvellous in our eyes, yet, it is the Lord's doing, and let his will be done.' His general health was good, until a few days previous to his death. His father, and others conversed with him about dying, and his prospects for eternity. He appeared quite composed—'said he had often prayed to the Savior, and said if he died he would go to heaven.' On Monday, at quarter past 1 o'clock, P. M., he fell asleep in Christ; and his happy spirit was borne we trust, 'where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.' 'Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such, is the kingdom of heaven.'

His funeral took place on Tuesday, 27th, at 3 o'clock, P. M., in Columbia. An appropriate, and impressive discourse was delivered by the Rev. Joel Dalby, Jr., of Cincinnati; from Job, 30, 23. OSWALD WARRINGTON, Jr.

Pittsburgh Conference.—Brothers Brown and Porter have our thanks for their invitation to attend the Pittsburgh Conference, and Brother Hazlett for inviting us to spend the preceding Sabbath in Washington, Pa. We shall do ourself the pleasure to attend the Conference if we find it practicable, but apprehend that we cannot leave home in time to reach Washington before Sabbath. Other good brethren we trust, will assist at the meeting there. Will Brother Watson please inform us if there is a stage route from Wheeling to Waynesburg? There was a visiting delegation of the brethren appointed by the Ohio Conference to attend, and it may be of importance to them to be informed of the facilities for reaching Waynesburg. They are Brs. R. Dobbins, John Whetstone, and the writer. We trust those two brethren will attend.

Telegraph.—The apparatus for the Zanesville office on the line, has not yet arrived, but is hourly expected. No electric news yet. We understand that the posts are up as far west as Springfield; but the supply of wire was exhausted when the party had proceeded a little way west of Zanesville. The article is to be brought on from Philadelphia. By the way, we made a mistake a week or two ago in stating that the line crossed the upper bridge, over the Muskingum river. It passes below the bridge, and crosses the river, at a single span, without any connection with the bridge.

Presbyterian Camp Meeting.—The Watchman of the Valley announces a Camp Meeting to be held seven and a half miles from Madison Indiana, on the Paper Mill road, to commence on Thursday August, 26th. Ministers from Madison and other Presbyteries, are to be in attendance.

The Foreign News.—The news by the Britannia, as we announced yesterday, shows another great fall in the price of breadstuffs, produced by the fine prospects of a good harvest and abundant supplies imported into England. As breadstuffs go down, cotton goes up, and there had been an advance of ⅛d. per pound since the last steamer.

The English government is still engaged in its armed intervention in the affairs of Portugal. This Junta refuses to accept the amnesty, and a British squadron has gone to reduce the insurgents to submission. In addition to this work for the navy, it has had a task to perform in the China seas, capturing the Bogue fort and destroying them. Keying, the Emperor, has agreed to allow the English to enter Canton, and promises to punish those who are concerned in the riots with the English. The French have also been chastising the natives of Cochin China for imprisoning the missionaries. The forts at Touran were attacked, and one thousand of the natives, it is said were slain. Food riots are occasional in Europe, but the most eminent danger is over, and comparative abundance is diminishing the number of these outbreaks.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Letter from Br. J. H. Thomas.

Br. Bassett: I wish to have the privilege of saying a few things in the Recorder, perhaps for the last time; for reasons justifiable, or unjustifiable, will be best known to the readers of the periodical, and to the brethren and strangers scattered abroad, when they are made known.—Dear friends: Forasmuch, as numerous things had been written, and published in the Recorder, since the small secession took place, in consequence of the church's connection with slavery, mark! with slavery! and the course that the General Conference of 1846, and the Ohio, with others of the Annual Conferences, of the same year had taken, and these communications tending in their nature to stifle conviction in the minds of anti-slavery brethren, and also to reconcile them to the condition of the church, and some of them tending to bemean, or unappreciate the motives of seceders, of which the undersigned has the honor, or dishonor of composing a part. I concluded to venture to appear again in the Recorder, to address my brethren in and out of the church, and all whom it might concern, by way of a series of letters, commencing with No. 1. Consequently I wrote a communication, No. 1. in the latter part of April, 1847, and in the same month forwarded it to the Recorder for publication: requesting the Editor,—in a private letter, in case he did not think proper to give it a place in the paper, to be so good as to return the manuscript copy. After keeping it some three or four weeks, (I suppose through the hurry of business, I attach no blame to the Editor of Recorder.) he wrote me a private communication, (the particulars I need not here mention,) the substance of which was, that in as much as he was set as a watchman for the church, (1) and he feared my design was, (as I had headed my piece No. 1. indicating that there was more to come,) to persuade the anti-slavery brethren to leave the church, (as is indicated in his editorial touching this case,) and although he did not pretend to find fault with the communication in its manner of address, yet fearing the result, he indefinitely declined the publication. Well, in return to this, I wrote to the Editor, another private communication, (all in good part,) requesting in substance, that in case of a failure to publish, to return as a favor to me the original, (as I had not kept an exact copy,) And I would just here remark, that I had been requested by some of the then, and presume one of the pre sent members of the Methodist Protestant Church, to correspond through this medium or otherwise. Well, after some two months, my communication was published under the head of correspondence, pre-accompanied with a considerable lengthy preface, in the column of editorial; of this I do not complain, (but for that spirit of proscription, which says, we cant publish J. H. T's. unless it just suits us,) I will notice briefly some things contained in the preface, make some explanation, touching some things in the communication, give a passing notice of Br. A. Jones, as in Western Recorder, No. 39, vol. 8th, (the preface composing the head, and said Jones' scurrilousness the tail of my communication,) and so take my leave of causing trouble or perplexity, to the Editor, or readers of said paper; saying at the same time, Come out of her my people. I would remark here, that I think the paper has improved in style and workmanship, and if free, (I dont mean to do wrong) would be worthy the support of the general, as well as christian community.

The Editor, after noticing my withdrawal from the church on acconnt of slavery says, we are anxious &c., and do not intend to slack our hand with regard to slavery, (Amen) but believe it our duty to remain firm, &c. Must we remain my Br., connected with sin as such in the abstract, to effect a good? He says the gospel in 2000 years has not yet brought about the conversion of the world. I ask, must the church live in connection with all the evils of the world, or one of its worst evils, in order to effect its conversion? Or do you believe Mr. Editor that the world will all be converted? Will not seducers wax worse and worse? Speaking of olden time, he remarks: "Our Lord found the holy temple converted into a depot of merchandise, &c. Yet do we read, he asks, of his withdrawal? Do we not rather read says he, of his efforts &c. I answer, Christ had laid the foundation of a new church, and in entering the temple, did he not whip them polluters out with cords? Did our Methodist Protestant brethren do so? No! They embraced them (slaveholders) to their bosoms, and they now say in so many words, we cant live without them. (2) Speaking of seceding, he says. We hesitate not to say, that the Methodist reformers never would have set up for themselves, if it had not been on account of persecution and expulsion. What! And not have effected any thing? I beg leave to dissent here; for I believe there were engaged in that reformation, noble souls that would not have suffered such noble principles to be stifled, even at the expense, or inconvenience and reproach of forming a new body. Would they have discharged their duty to the church and the world, if they had stopped short, even of doing what they already have done? I think not. He asks, how is it with Br. Thomas, and other abolition brethren? Are they proscribed, &c? Here I might take a little advantage of the arrangement as to present tense, (3) but I desire it not.—It is a fact, although anti-slavery men have been permitted the use of some of the periodicals, yet they have been under the necessity of great reservations; and the Methodist Protestant Church periodical, has been almost, if not quite, closed against them, so much so, that a very worthy Brother would not remain or take the editorship thereof on account of it. What is this but proscription? And in latter days, for fear of throwing some more light on these subjects, they are inadmissible almost entire. He says, (after complimenting, it is all appreciated Brother B.) "Br. Thomas has not sufficient cause at this time to withdraw, and attempt a new organization." Why then are you so afraid to publish my letters Brother, (4) or have the committee laid an embargo? Not sufficient reason, &c! O my old friend and Brother, is this ironically intended, or are you in earnest? The charges brought against the church as to her connection with the accused thing, are not now denied.—Then as to reasons, we would just refer the reader to what has past. And as to attempting a new organization, I feel myself inadequate. But if, in the act of brethren and sisters agreeing in the principle essentials, coming together and settling down on primitive gospel polity, is organizing a new church, so let it be. And you see, the Editor, sympathises with us in our views, but he cannot act. And why? And now I say, Itinerancy or Congregationalism, I trust you, and all other good brethren will act in some way, so as to get rid of that which, is the sum of all villanies. Dear Brother B. and all concerned, all I desire, connected with this is, that you should become so weak, as to feel your disease, that you might apply the proper medicine to your recovery. Br. B. and others; we offer to you our hands, and invite you to take the proper ground. Your kindness in return is appreciated. We must pass. In the 21st line, and 5th word from period in my communication Western Recorder No. 39, vol. 8th, I discover a most egregious error that is either in the original manuscript, (which is in the possession of the office,) or some how else. The word ☞ not ☜ some how or other is there introduced, and I am made to say, that I do not believe it is wrong, for religious bodies to be connected with American slavery; when nothing more foreign to my mind could have been presented; for it is the contra view I take of the subject, that has caused Br. B., myself, and others, to differ. The word not, ought not to be there. Then it would read as intended. The word following, at the beginning of the 30th line, ought to be "failing."—Lastly, as to Br. Jones. With this Br. I have had but little personal acquaintance, but from information I have held him in high esteem. But I do think, his remarks touching our little association at Port William, are entirely premature and gratuitous. What conversation took place, between him and any of our brethren, to have caused this good Brother to notice us individually, and the association connectedly, as he has done, (without knowing more about it,) I cannot say, neither reconcile to my mind. I trust the Brother has not got the consent of his mind to become the persecutor of small things, that may p erhaps die without his help. But if we do die, we intend to die hard. We intend, if die we must, to die contending for the faith, once delivered to the saints. But I do think, his remarks were uncalled for. And I can say with one of old, "Let talkers talk, mind thou that which is best. And never be ashamed of any thing but sin." Now true, we are a weak and scattered people, (and more the pity,) and a few delinquencies, as is well known in the Methodist Protestant Church, in her Conference matters, makes the number to do business small. This the Brother ought to have known. But we transacted our business in harmony, and I trust Brother J. will repent. J. H. THOMAS.

(1) As it is not usual amongst friends, to publish the contents of private letters, we are sorry that our friend did not take pains in quoting us, to use our own language. We have no recollection of saying that thing exactly. [Ed.]

(2) Our excellent friend is not capable of doing injustice intentionally to any, but this "so many words" statement of his is entirely gratuitous, it is too much said—he ought never to have penned it. [Ed.]

(3) Prescribe, according to Webster, means "to denounce, condemn." Who has done that to Br. T? Have we not rather said all manner of good words in his behalf? [Ed.]

(4) Why brother, your letters thus far, have been published. [ED.]

Written for the Western Recorder.

MR. EDITOR: I was lately favored with the opportunity of hearing a public address from a Rev. gentleman, who, with two or three others, seceded from the Ohio Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, professedly on account of its connection with slavery. The object of his address, was, chiefly, to offer some reasons in justification of such a course. And, although, I respect his ability, and award to him honesty of purpose, yet, I must be permitted to dissent from some of the conclusions to which he arrives.

And, I remark, first, that he appears to proceed on the false assumption, that true anti-slavery sentiment, is nearly extinct in the Methodist Protestant Church; that the real Simon Pures have gone out; and, consequently, there is no hope for the Church. Why, sir, not only the Church as a whole, is denounced as being pro-slavery, but, the Church north, and, even your Ohio Conference is pro—that is, for slavery.—And is it possible, that the Ohio Conference, after her unequivocal, and oft repeated denunciations of the system of slavery, is in favor of slavery—has been dissembling all the time?—Can't believe it. Yes, but then, there's another standard by which to judge of the sincerity of people's anti-slavery professions now-a-days: If they don't "come out," as I have done, and dissolve their connection with a pro-slavery Church, they are not very good abolitionists, I fear. Ah, "thats the bite," I understand it now. But, there are some of us, and a goodly number I trust, who have got it into our heads, that we can oppose slavery quite as successfully in the Methodist Protestant Church as we can any where else; and, this is the very reason, why we continue in her communion; were we, with our present convictions to act otherwise, we should be doing violence to our conscientious promptings. The brother, on the occasion referred to, seemed anxious to impress our minds with a sense of our "personal responsibility." This is just what we believe in. Not, however, that we are "personally responsible" for the sins of the slave-holder, for, we maintain, with the venerable Asa Shinn, that while honestly laboring for the removal of this great evil from the Church, we do not fellowship slave-holders.

There is one thing, Mr. Editor, about our friends who advocate secession, a little mysterious; they scarcely ever quote the General Conference Resolution rightly; they make it say "slavery," instead of "the holding of slaves."—They tell us, however, that there is no difference; then why so choice about it? Why prefer the former to the true reading? Now, I am not in favor of this resolution, but I must protest against the idea that it was INTENDED to sanction the system of slavery as established by law. Whatever may be the construction put upon it by some of the southern members, I am fully of the opinion that a majority, or, at least, a number of the members who voted for this resolution, did not mean by "the holding of slaves," anything more than the holding a control over slaves, with a view to their ultimate emancipation. But, an effort is made to convict the majority, or all who voted for this resolution, of intending to sanction the principle and practice of slave-holding.—Such, I think, is not the fact. I think the only fair way is, to come as near the intention of the thing as possible. But, I am sorry that anti-slavery men were prevailed on to do that which may be construed into a sanction of slavery.

Permit me in conclusion to say, that I cannot, as yet, see sufficient cause for secession, on the ground of our connection with slavery. We have freedom of speech,—the press is free,—no official violence is directed against us; every one can speak his sentiments freely and fully, with the view of enlightening the public mind of the Church upon the subject, and it is my firm conviction, that more can be effected in this way, than can be by so many little independent factions, of seceders.

There is need of us all exercising the graces of forbearance and charity towards each other; and, I have thought, that if some of us were not quite so profuse in making invidious and personal allusions, it would be as well. Hoping that anti-slavery principles may progress in the Church, until she shall rid herself of all sinful connection with slavery, I subscribe myself,

R. COLLIER.

TO THE PUBLIC.

For the protection of Society, in this law-abiding land of ours, we have many restrictive laws, aiming towards the restraining of vice, and tending towards the encouragement of virtue.

Our Statute Book contains a long catalogue of crimes and misdemeanors accompanied by proper punishments; but on its pages are found no efficient laws for the prevention of drunkenness: on the contrary, intemperance is licensed! indulgences are granted, and the sale of intoxicating drinks is clothed with the authority of law. How absurd is such legislation!

Intemperance may be styled the foster mother of most of the other crimes. It is indeed the root of the tree of evil, whose branches spread far and wide, and whose leaves distil deadly poison. Murder, Adultery, Arson, Bigamy, Felony, Perjury, Profanity, Assault and Battery, &c., throughout the list, are but the branches of the tree of evil, the legitimate fruits that spring from the root intemperance. The propriety of laws to prevent the above mentioned evils, is readily granted by all; much more then should we have laws to kill the cause itself. Why lop the branches, and yet water the root? Why make laws to destroy the legitimate fruits and yet do nothing to kill the source from which they spring? Why battle with the effects, and yet cherish by law the cause? The time has come when the absurdity of this course is manifest. The sophistry of the past can no longer stay the tide of public opinion. The law-abiding power must aid in the cause of temperance, and in order that a proper and effective law may be passed, our candidates for the Legislature must be men who are favorable to temperance reformation,—must be men who will pledge themselves not to be found in the ranks of opposition to the temperance cause.

The time of holding our county conventions for the nomination of candidates, to represent the people in the Legislature, approaches: In view of this fact, we ask the public to take into serious and earnest consideration the subject of Temperance reform. We ask for the subjoined resolutions a careful examination, and we further ask, that community may select at the coming convention, candidates for election to the State Legislature who will heartily and cordially favor the cause of Temperance reform. We ask this, for we wish not to be forced to withhold our votes from the selected candidates—we wish not to be disfranchised at the coming election.

We have strong political preferences, we wish to gratify them, but we will no longer be trifled with, in the cause which above all others is most destructive to the weal of man!

In conclusion, we present the citizens of this county with the following resolutions, freely discussed and passed by a unanimous vote of the Springfield Temperance Society, at their meeting held at the Presbyterian Meeting House, Putnam, July 27, 1847.

Resolved, 1st. That the Temperance cause still demands our most strenuous efforts and untiring zeal. And that the time has arrived when Temperance men are bound to take a more decided and bolder stand, in favor of the cause in which they have so long labored.

Resolved, 2nd. The permanence of the Temperance reformation and the complete triumph of the cause can only be secured by calling in the aid of the law-making power. And that it is the duty of every Temperance man, to withhold his support from all candidates for offices of trust and influence, who by their private habits, or public acts encourage the use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage.

Resolved, 3d. That as Temperance men we cannot vote for any one to represent us in the Legislature, who will not pledge himself to go at least so far as to vote for a law, which shall give the people of every township the power to decide for themselves, for or against the vending of intoxicating drinks, within their respective bounds.

Resolved, 4th. That our President with ten others, be appointed a committee, whose duty it shall be to address circulars to the Temperance Societies, and prominent friends of the cause throughout the county, inviting them to hold meetings in their respective townships, for the purpose of co-operating in the object of the foregoing resolutions.

Whereupon, H. SAFFORD, G. N. GUTHRIE, T. WILBER, JOHN HAVER, C. FRAME, BENJAMIN C. WOODARD, J. J. ANDERSON, SAMUEL ASHMORE, W. L. RIPLEY, and J. S. WARD, were appointed said committee.

Resolved, 5th. That said committee, be instructed to procure the publication of the foregoing resolutions, and address.—On motion adjourned. F. R. POTTS, President.

J. S. WARD, Secretary.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Although we have laid before our readers in extenso the report and accompanying papers of the committee appointed to act with regard to the proposed Wheeling connection, it has occurred to us, that a brief synopsis of these interesting documents would be acceptable to such of our readers as have not found time to peruse them.

The facts presented are comparatively few, though the details are large and of relative importance. A committee was appointed by the President, under authority of the "Board," to confer with the Wheeling authorities relative to a modification of the law of the last legislature of Virginia. In pursuance of their purpose, they proceeded to Wheeling, and had conferences, official and unofficial, with the representatives of Wheeling, and certain cities and towns of Ohio; in the course of this intercourse, however, it was found desirable that the authorized routes should be examined before anything definite was done, and Mr. Latrobe, the chief engineer of the road, was directed to make a general survey. When this was done, the Wheeling committee visited Baltimore, and negotiations were resumed.

From the survey, it was ascertained that the cheapest route would be by Fish creek to the Ohio, and by the banks of the Ohio to Wheeling. An arrangement was accordingly concluded by which the right or option of adopting that route, and of touching the O. river at the mouth of Fish creek, are secured to the company; Wheeling, moreover, agreeing to subscribe $500,000 to the road, and to provide the company, free of expense, a depot in the city, with the right of way through the city limits, and the use of locomotives in the streets. This arrangement, thus concluded, is submitted with the report, to the company, ratified by the authorities of Wheeling.—The committee are of opinion that it will secure all the advantages ever expected from a terminus of the road at any southern point on the Ohio.

The committee then proceed to show the character of the law under which this arrangement has been concluded. It gives a choice of three other different routes; releases the company from all restrictions upon tolls, in competition with other works; and imposes no obligation to complete all parts of the road simultaneously. In view of the practical effect of the law, the committee have considerable reliance upon the assurances of Wheeling interests, to procure from the State of Virginia 2-5 of the cost of the extended road from the Maryland line to that city.

The committee consider all desirable advantages and privileges secured by this arrangement; but at the same time think that it would have been advisable to accomplish this object at a much greater cost, being the uniform purpose of the company, than to have expended a less sum upon a work that must have exposed them to powerful rivalry. They now carry the object of arresting the trade and travel passing up the river, instead of meeting it further north in competition with Philadelphia and New York. The report proceeds to show that Wheeling has been regarded, certainly since 1835, as the preferred terminus for the main stem; but the company turned their attention to a point further south, when Pennsylvania refused them a way through that State to Wheeling. The history of legislation upon this subject is then treated by the report, and the fact admitted, that in view of the internal improvements of the west, a more southern terminus did for a season offer greater advantages. But subsequent experience has shown that such preference was not entitled to the force generally conceded to it.

A comparison is instituted between Fishing creek and Fish creek, and the supposed advantages of the former shown to consist in the fact, that the road might be constructed at the same cost, while its more southern position offered superior facilities of connection with Cincinnati, through Zanesville, Columbus and Xenia; and it was also thought to be the only point except Parkersbug, from which a connection could probably be made with Cincinnati, via Marietta, Athens and Chillicothe. Without these advanges, real or supposed, Fishing creek would be entitled to no preference; the committee therefore conclude, that if from more recent information it appears that the same and even greater advantages may be had by a terminus at Fish creek, the present law is equally entitled to preference.

The committee suggest that elongation of distance is not an objection, because the profits are increased thereby; that the object of reaching the Ohio is not the trade and travel of a mere point, but that of the whole west. And in this connection allege, that with reference to both lines of works in Ohio, the present project is more desirable than a terminus at Fishing creek.

The committee having advanced a preference for the existing law and its privileges, making the terminus at Fish creek, proceed to show in what its advantages consist, with especial relation to the facilities of connection with the two great lines of public works through the State of Ohio, intended to connect west with St. Louis, and north with the Lake country. They show, that while some advantages possessed by a more southern terminus would have made that preferable for connection with the southern line of works, yet a connection may be formed at little more expense and with scarcely less advantage from the mouth of Fish creek. But the committee, by recent investigations discover, that with the great central line of Ohio improvements a connection can be more promptly and certainly formed at Wheeling, than at any other point north or south on the Ohio river; while, with the main terminus at any point north of Wheeling, the connection with the southern line must have been lost altogether.

The committee refer to their extended intercourse with gentlemen from all parts of the State of Ohio, and to the uniform opinion that Pittsburg is too high up the river, and Parkersburg too low to command all the great resources of the State; but that Wheeling, or some point near it, not remote from the National road, is most desirable for the terminus. And that should the company adopt this proposition, and proceed in earnest with the work, the resources of Ohio would be called into activity, and the great central line promptly extended to the river. The committee refer particularly to information derived from Mr. Alfred Kelly, an intelligent gentleman selected to represent the interests of Columbus in the conference upon the subject.

The committee observe, that they have felt it to be their principal duty to refer emphatically to the certainty of a connection with the western improvements, as the chief object of reaching the Ohio river at any point; and any thing short of this surrenders the main object of the enterprise. Referring to some preferences with regard to Wheeling, Fishing creek and Parkersburg, existing in Ohio, the committee find that all unite, nevertheless, in deprecating a terminus at Pittsburg, or any point north of Wheeling. An additional advantage is to be perceived in the fact that in the terminus or termini suggested by the committee, not only is an early connection with the western improvements ensured, but the command of the trade and travel of the western country, whether by land or water, without competition. The position of Wheeling being seventy miles nearer to Columbus and Zanesville, than Pittsburg, the committee reasonably anticipate the construction of the shorter and cheaper lines and the postponement of the longer and more expensive, until the growth of the west should indispensably require further improvements. The cities of Columbus and Zanesville have no interest to create a preference beyond that of the most direct and cheapest line to market. The distance from Columbus to Baltimore by the proposed route, will be considerably less than from Columbus to Philadelphia by Pitsburg. And the committee think it undeniable that the river trade and travel, instead of working up the river ninety-six miles further, would stop at Wheeling, whence it could reach Baltimore as soon as by the river it could be taken to Pittsburg. And no doubt is entertained that the trade and travel passing into the Ohio canals between Pittsburg and Wheeling, would prefer dropping down to the latter place to the delay of working up stream to the former.—*Balt. Great Fire at Ripley.

A letter from Ripley to the Morning Herald, dated July 21st, gives the details of a most destructive fire which occurred in that city, the night before. It broke out in the ware house and stable of Mr, D. P. Evans, which were soon wrapped in flames. It next sezed upon the stable of Mr. C. Palmer and the Mansion House stables, and "thence proceeding towards Main street, the ware house and pork house of Mr. E. Collins were soon in a sheet of flames." It was here checked in this direction, by tearing down another warehouse belonging to Mr. Collins. Other buildings destroyed were, the stables and out buildings of the Galt House, the stables of A. Liggett, Esq., the large tobacco warehouse of Mr. J. Bennington. and two large frame houses belonging to Mr. George Easton, occupied by the Post Office and a shoe store and manufactory. "Some fourteen buildings were burnt to the ground, and as many more on fire at different times, but some with little or no damage." "Mr. Evans' residence was given up for lost several times." The College was at one time on fire in several places, which was saved by an opportune shower of rain and its leaky roof. The alarm and anxiety were intense; and but for the most strenuous exertions of the fire companies, the citizens and the Ladies, and a providential change of the wind at a time when the most appalling devastation was threatened, the ruins of the devouring element would have been much more extensive. The prompt aid of the weaker sex on this occcasion, in conveying water in lines from the river, is spoken of in terms of high admiration. The writer says, "I have seen large fires, but never such a one that sent such showers of shingles over every part of the town."

The principal sufferers named are, D. P. Evans, Wm. Patterson, A. Liggett, N. Crosier, E. Collins, L. Palmer, Wm. Armstrong, G. Pennington, Gen. Eaton, J. C. Campbell, Wm. Parker, and a Mr. Easton, of this city. Very little of the property destroyed seems to have been secured by insurance.—Watch. of the Valley.

BALTIMORE AND THE WEST.—The Columbus (Ohio) State Journal, in alluding to the agreement between Wheeling and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, with regard to the "right of way," says:

"There seems now to be a prospect that this great work of improvement will be pushed forward to completion within a reasonable time. For a long period it has been at a stand—looking, as it were, from the summit of the Alleghanies, for the most advantageous point to intersect the Ohio river, which was the limit originally prescribed for the stupendous undertaking. But should the work take the course indicated by the foregoing paragraph, Wheeling will enjoy but a brief season the advantages of a terminus. The people of Ohio will look to that. A short time only will elapse before the road will penetrate the interior of Ohio, connecting itself with the richest agricultural region between the river and the lakes, and drawing from both a large amount of their present transit business. It will soon connect itself with the river again, at Cincinnati—thus securing to itself all the advantages and benefits of a junction at a point advantageous for its interests in seasons of low water; while at the same time it will be reaching its long arm through the fertile vallies and broad prairies of our western neighbors, towards Mississippi. The word will then be, not 'Baltimore and Wheeling,—but 'Baltimore and St Louis'—which will comprehend all the intermediate points. We fancy we can read the completion of this great work, as part and parcel of the inevitable destiny of the West.

A Terrible Accident.

FIVE CHILDREN KILLED.

A large lime stone fell from near the top of Coal Hill, above Sligo, on Monday afternoon. In its descent it rolled against a frame school house and instantly killed five children, besides wounding three others, one of whom it is feared may not recover.

The names of the children killed were Oliver McAninch. John Cassidy, Morgan Richards, John Davis, and Charles Doran. It occurred during school recess, and the children were playing in the yard, and seeing the rock rolling down it is supposed they ran under the house, which was elevated on the lower side four or five feet from the ground, in order to escape the rolling stone. The teacher, Mr. Chivers, was the only one in the house at the time the accident occurred, and very narrowly escaped.

We sympathize sincerely with the afflicted parents who have thus suddenly been called upon to mourn the premature deaths of their little ones. An event like this, hurrying so many children from the very midst of their youthful sports to death itself, and from the play ground to the grave is almost unexampled for the promptness of the summons and the sting it leaves for those who mourn.—Pittsburgh Gazette.

POISONOUS CARDS.—The Danbury (Ct.) Times says that a child of Mr. Charles Chapman, of that town, was poisoned on the 6th inst. by putting a visiting card in its mouth. The enamel or coating was composed of carbonate of lead.

DEATH OF CAPT. PILLSBURY.—The news by our "pony express," published yesterday, announced the arrival of the steamer Mckim, in charge of the Mate, Captain Pillsbury having died on the passage. We find the following notice of his death in the New Orleans papers of the 12th inst:—

"Died on board, of yellow fever, Wednesday, 7th inst., at 3 P. M., Captain Henry Pillsbury, late commander of the U. S. steamship Mckim. Capt. Pillsbury is a son of the Hon. Timothy Pillsbury, Representative to Congress from Texas. His remains were brought to this city for burial, which will take place to-day."

We also learn that Mrs. Pillsbury is now in this city, on a visit, and that the news brought by our express was the first tidings she received of her sad bereavement.—Baltimore Sun.

Notice.

The fifth Session of the Muskingum Annual Conference Methodist Protestant Church, will be held at Youngstown, Mahoning county, Ohio; to open on the 1st day of September next, at 9 o'clock, A. M. A brother, competent to the work, has been solicited to conduct the opening exercises; who, we hope, will consent so to do. As Brother Gee's letter, in the Recorder, removes all reasonable apprehension of any difficulty in getting suitable entertainment, it may be expected, as it is much desired, that ALL, both Ministers and Laymen, will be in attendance; and that, too, at the opening of Conference. Come, brethren, cheer us with your presence! Let not the distance keep any away. GEORGE CLANCY, President.

Indiana Conference.—Inasmuch as the next Session of the Indiana and Wabash Conferences was appointed to commence at the same time, and being not far distant from each other, it is thought advisable that Indiana Conference change the time of its Session. I believe there is no provision in our Discipline in reference to this matter; and where there is no law there is no transgression. After having consulted about three-fourths of the members of Conference, and the District Committee, I am requested to publish to all, whom it may concern, that our next Session of the Indiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, will commence the twenty-ninth of September next, at Johnson's meeting-house, 7 miles West of Shelbyville, Shelby county. We earnestly solicit aid from sister Conferences. T. SHIPP.

UNION CIRCUIT, O. DISTRICT.—Our fourth quarterly meeting will be held at or near Middletown; and as it has been suggested that a Camp Meeting be held at the same time, should this be concluded upon, it will be held near brother Job Inskeep's, four miles north east of Middletown, commencing August 20. We invite all our brethren of adjoining circuits to assist us. From the West and South, come to Middletown; from North and East, to Middleburg, and you will learn the facts, and receive directions. D. MOORE.

[A Camp Meeting, brethren. We wish to hear of a good Camp Meeting in old Champaign or Logan.—ED.]

MORGANTOWN CIRCUIT—Pittsburgh District.—The last quarterly meeting for the present Conference year, for the Monongahela Circuit, will be held, by divine permission, at the new frame meeting-house, near Mapel's mill Dunkard creek, Green county, Pa., on the 2nd. We also invite our Itinerant and unstationed Brethren who can make it convenient to attend.

Also, we propose, by divine permission, on the Saturday and Sabbath previous to the Annual Conference, hold ing a meeting at Mt. Morris, Green county, Pa. To this meeting we invite Preachers, and delegates, who may be on their way to Conference.—Come, Brethren, come and welcome; we shall expect you from the South. You will find a band of Brethren ready to receive you freely. P. T. LAISHLEY.

TANNER'S CREEK CIRCUIT, Indiana District.—Our 4th quarterly meeting is to be held at the East Fork Chapel, embracing the 11th and 12th days of September next, with the expectation that those brethren who were appointed by the last session of the Indiana Conference as fraternal visitors to the next session of the O. Conference, will attend and assist us. May we not hope that Br. W. Pelan of Twin Creek Circuit will attend? All brethren, ministerial or lay who can make it convenient to be with us are invited to do so. W. W. PAUL.

ST. JOSEPH CIRCUIT, Wabash District.—Br. Shipp, our President, is requested to visit this circuit on the 21st August, and Columbia the 28th, if practicable. He will please let us know in good time, if it will suit him to attend. St. Mary's may be visited either before or after.

G. WILLIAMS.

Rev. G. Brown expects to have a supply of Hymn Books—fine medium, and plain—Disciplines, and Snethen's sermons, at the Pittsburgh A. Conference in Waynesburgh. Those who want, can send their money by the preachers, or delegates, and purchase.

Delaware Circuit, Muskingum District.—Notice is hereby given that our fourth Quarterly meeting will be held at Westbrook's school house, where I live, commencing August 7, 1847, to which we invite Br. T. Potter, and all others who can come. We need help.

WM, HATFIELD, Jr.

New Subscribers this week, 4—discontinuances, 2.

Br. S. Halm, we certainly did not get word to change the direction of your paper before, or we should have done it.

The P. M., Morgantown, Va., again notifies us that the paper sent for M. D. Wells, is not taken out. Will Br. Laishley do us the favor to attend to this case before Conference?

The Law of Newspapers.

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered wishing to continue their subscriptions.

2. If the subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publishers may continue to send them till all cash charges are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their papers from the offices to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled their bill, and order their paper discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the paper is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The Courts have decided that refusing to take a paper or periodical from the office, or removing and leaving it uncalled for, is "prima facie" evidence of intentional fraud.

Liabilities of those who take Periodicals.

Thus law declare that any person, to whom a periodical is sent, is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office or persons with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a Post Office, Store, or any other place of deposite, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the Postmaster, Storekeeper, &c., are responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or informs the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

POETRY.

The Prairie and its Flowers.

BY ALFRED LITTLE.

Of Earth's fairest jewels, the brightest and best,
Is the beautiful prairie enthroned in the West;
The grass gently flowing like waves o'er the sea,
The wide spreading prairie, the prairie for me.

Though Brussels may boast of her carpeting fine,
Yet nature's own carpet, the prairie, be mine,
With grass for foundation, fresh, verdant and green,
While the filagree flowers are inserted between.

How varied these flowers in feature and hue,
Like the azure sky o'er them, in spring they are blue!
When Summer is glowing, brightened they appear,
In Autumn all faded, and yellow and sere.

O'er the prairie I've wandered at dawning of day,
All nature was smiling, the insects at play—
The bee to the blossom, the bird to the bower,
'Till the red sun was setting on many a flower.

The mild fragrant zephyr is breathing of thee—
To the floweret it whispers, 'tis here I am free!
Now louder and louder it sweeps o'er the main,
While the wild rose is nodding assent to each strain.

I love the green prairie, transcendantly fair,
Its sweet scented perfume is blessing the air,
'Tis a basket of flowers, bright glistening with dew,
It rivals the rainbow, reflecting each hue.

Thou Eden of beauty, again may I rove,
O'er thy broad blooming bosom I cherish and love;
Again o'er thy carpet I'll chase the lone hours,
Thou breast-pin of nature bestudded with flowers.

Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church.

NO. VI.

The fifteenth article, contains a highly important provision for the decision upon any enactment of the General Conf., believed to conflict with the constitution. This was designed, no doubt, to prevent any encroachments upon the rights and privileges of any department of the Church, upon a call of a majority of the Annual Conferences, made officially, for a judicial decision upon any rule or act of the General Conference, each Annual Conference appoints a delegate; and the decision of two thirds of these delegates, if a majority attend, can nullify or confirm any act of the General Conference, upon which they have been called to decide. If they do not reverse the act, it will, of course, be confirmed.

Article sixteenth, provides for a "Special call of the General Conference." Two trials of the Annual Conferences concurring, can call a special Gen. Conference.

Article seventeenth, provides for the alteration of the constitution. The second, tenth and fourteenth articles, are made unalterable, but by a general convention. The General Conference is empowered to AMEND; that is, to correct, or to change any thing that is wrong in the other articles of the constitution, by two thirds of the Annual Conferences, in writing, applying therefor.

I have now briefly attended to the several articles of the Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church. In some places I have noted quotations, and in some I have not; believing that if but a small amount of interest should be excited, persons would, for themselves, examine.

Mr. Editor: you will permit me to add, not intending to disparage other systems of church government, that upon a view of the constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church in parts, or as a whole, agreeably to my opinion of the spirit, or meaning of this instrument, I cannot discover how a better system could have been formed. It is true, there are a few things, and matters of importance, which might have been made a little more explicit, which would have obviated some difficulties in the minds of a portion of the church and prevented some very injurious USAGES. But if we adopt the mode which divines say is the only correct course, to arrive at the true meaning of the scriptures; that is, take the whole, and let one portion explain the other, we need have no difficulty in arriving at a legitimate conclusion relative to any portion of the Methodist Protestant Constitution. It is believed whatever doctrines professedly derived from the Bible, which in any way reflect upon the Divine character, removes restraints upon vice, and discourages virtue, cannot have any foundation in truth: and, consequently, are not supported by the word of God, when correctly understood; so I conclude, any usage, which operates injuriously upon any portion of the church, and deprives any of their just rights, has no foundation in the constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church, but it is derived from some other source. If I were asked what portion of the constitution I would desire to have amended, when I examinine the whole, and discover the connection, and the tendency to produce one grand object, namely, the security of the ministers and members in their mutual rights, I would be under the necessity, conscienciously, to answer, not any.

If the members and ministers of the Methodist Protestant Church are truly pious, and act upon the principles contained in the constitution, we will have nothing to fear; for these principles are such as are, and must be approved, at least secretly, by almost every person of reflection and consideration. Let every department of the church attend with fidelity to its own peculiar duties; and particularly guard against any deviation from old paths of Methodist Protestantism; and be content in this respect, to be unlike some of our neighbors who aim at the acquisition of power and I say again, in my humble opinion, we have nothing to fear. BRITISH METHODISTS.

There is great dissatisfaction among the Wesleyans of England, on account of the preachers having taken part with the Government on the Educational scheme. Serious consequences may ensue to the Wesleyan connexion. They—i. e. the Leaders, have gone with the National church against the Dissenters. There is great dissatisfaction in the societies & among the local preachers, on the course of the Wesleyan authorities.—I will give you an extract from the London Patriot:

"The Wesleyans and the Government."—"The strange conduct of the Wesleyan leaders, in connexion with the Government scheme of Education, will not soon be forgotten. It is, perhaps, the first time that their power to cast the balance in public questions has been fairly obtruded on the attention of the community. On several former occasions, they have silently lent themselves to parties who wanted such a make-weight to insure their success; but so far as we remember, they have never, till now, put themselves forward as a third element in the country, capable of securing for the Government a triumph over the Opposition, or for the Opposition a victory over the Government. We are grievously mistaken if they will be quietly permitted to play, a second time, this selfish and ungenerous game." It is asserted that those who have done this, have not the confidence of the Wesleyan body: or if even they have, that confidence is improperly placed, because they are not chosen by the popular voice, and sent into conference, as delegates, by the people. To this, the Wesleyan leaders reply: "This is not a political question, if it were, we should not have interfered. It is a religious question, and therefore it is our duty to decide for the Connexion." Was there ever greater nonsense, or insult, offered to any people—as if religious rights are not as valuable and dear to the people as their political rights—as if the Wesleyans had no guardianship, no duties, in view of religious privileges, but had abandoned them in favor of the Wesleyan ministry. As if this ministry were the sole conservators of liberty for themselves—for the whole connexion—for posterity. An independent paper, styled the "Wesleyan" has been started in opposition to the Oligarchy of the conference. W. S. S.

The Church-property Question.

The members of the Meth. Episcopal Church are beginning to see wonders. They are now astonished to find out, what has been told them for years, that their meeting houses and churches which they have built with their own money do not belong to them, if conveyed according to the "Deed of Settlement," but that they are the property of the clergy, and that in cases of dissatisfaction they have no right to their use.

What the lamented Snethen wrote and published on this subject was said by the preachers to be false and slanderous; and was made the basis of charges and specifications, against those who were expelled for endorsing his assertions. Recent circumstances, in this city, and elsewhere are opening the eyes of the Laity. If we are correctly informed, the members of one of the churches of this city having been anxious for some time past to dispose of their property to advantage, found a good bidder, and closed the conditions of sale, and on the strength of their confidence in their right to what they had themselves purchased or what their fathers had purchased for them, bought a lot in a more eligible situation and commenced a new building. On the attempt to consummate the sale they had made, they were surprised to learn from legal counsel that they could give no deed to the property which would be satisfactory to the parties—that it did not clearly belong to the congregation, but to the "Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States!" So then they must finish the new one, and hold on to the old! If they convey the new church according "to the deed of settlement" which thus deprives them of the old one, we are greatly mistaken in their soundness of judgment.

Bishop Hamline at the late session of the New York Conference, appointed Rev. Benjamin Griffin to the Centenary Church, Brooklin. From the difficulties arising out the Green and Maffit case, the people supposed themselves badly treated, and refused to accept the appointment. The Advocate in relation to the affair says:

On his (Mr. Griffin's) presenting himself, he received a written communication from the trustees, stating, in substance, that he would not be allowed to occupy either the pulpit or the altar. Mr. Green occupied the pulpit the next Sabbath. The right of the trustees of "The Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church," in the premises, remains to be tested by the civil tribunals.

The Brooklyn Methodists shall see whether they have any right to their own church or not. How such a tribunal will decide we are at a loss to determine!—Meth. Prot.

MRS. MARIA WHITAKER.

Death, the great conqueror, and king of terrors, has again visited us, and taken away one of our much beloved sisters, Maria Whitaker consort of David Whitaker, daughter of Bartholomew and Sarah Ann Pettet, of Delaware county, Ohio, sister Whitaker was born in the year of our Lord, 1824, in Muskingum county, Ohio, near Zanesville, where she in the 12th year of her age gave her hand and name to Br. J. Dalbey as a seeker of religion, and it was not long till she found it to the joy and comfort of her soul. Br. Dalbey informed me that when he was stationed in Zanesville, he classed quite a number of young persons, and also led them, and that they did well. I wish to inform that Brother, that sister Maria was one of that number, and that she when I first saw her had not forgotten him who had imparted so many religious lessons to her. Not long after, her father moved to Delaware county, where I became acquainted with the family, and where I in the month of November last, united her and David Whitaker in holy matrimony. Soon after, the sister and her husband settled in Medina, Medina county, Ohio. They lived very happy together for six or seven months, and after a severe attack of disease, for six weeks, death did its work, and thus sister Maria in the 24th year of her age, left her dear companion and this world of sorrow, to reign with her blessed Saviour; yes, Maria is gone and has left an affectionate husband and a numerous circle of friends and relatives, both in Delaware and Muskingum county, to mourn their loss. But thanks be unto the great Saviour of the world, although they are called to mourn, they need not mourn as those that have no hope, for their loss is her gain: far I can say as far as I was acquainted with sister Maria, I have every reason to believe that she has gone to mansions above. I met her in class, and she was the first person on Delaware circuit, that I heard praise God aloud; and thank God, she was not ashamed to shout aloud for joy. She said she knew that her Redeemer lived, and that she was not a reprobate, because she knew her Saviour dwelt in her, the hope of glory. And while she was confined and near her end, and although her affliction was very severe, yet she bore it with christian fortitude. She told her husband, that there was nothing in this life to bind her to earth but him, but O, my dear companion, death is come, and I must go and leave you. Dont weep for me, for all is well, all is well, my Saviour smiles and bids me come. Thus she closed her eyes in death, without a sigh or a groan, and now sister Whitaker is no more with us but rests in the arms of her blessed Saviour. Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth, yea saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them. O how certain is death. Little did I think when I joined them together in marriage, that I would be called on so soon to preach sister Maria's funeral, and write this notice. Truly this teaches us that we are mortal, and soon must pass away. O, that God would sanctify this scene to the good of us all, and that husband, father, mother, sisters, and brothers may so live that they may meet sister Maria in heaven, where parting is no more.

DR. THOMAS PENNELL,

Departed this life, at his residence in Graham's Station, Meigs county, Ohio, on the 22d day of June, 1847, in the 67th year of his age. The subject of this brief notice, was a native of Eastern Virginia, and embraced the christian religion in the year 1803, under the labors of the Rev. D. Hitt,—received license to preach in the year 1806. Joined the travelling connection in the Methodist Episcopal Church,—travelled six years and three months; then located, and remained in good standing, as a local preacher until the division took place in the church; then joined the Methodist Protestant Church, and travelled in the Methodist Protestant Church, for seven years, then in consequence of ill-health, located and remained in a local capacity, maintaining a good moral character until he died. Brother Pennell was beloved by his family, and by all his christian brethren that knew him. During his last sickness, he enjoyed constant communion and fellowship with God. When christians came to visit him he exhorted them to holy living, and sinners he exhorted to repentance. He possessed such an amount of fervor and holy zeal, as to influence him to converse freely and fully upon the subject of religion, at all times and under all circumstances. His last days were his best days; his last words were, "Glory to God"—then expired in peace. "Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

SWEDEN.

EXTRAORDINARY RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT.

I shall close this letter with interesting, but singular news, from a country, of which, as far as I recollect, I have not as yet written to you.

The Berlin Evangelical Gazette, published by Dr. Hengstenberg, contains in its numbers for March of last year, three articles concerning an extraordinary revival in Sweden, which for some years has engaged the attention of the religious public in Germany. I will give you a summary of this matter.

It is known that, for a length of years, the religious interests of Sweden were shamefully neglected; the pastors lulled their flocks into a deceitful repose; all life in the church seemed extinct. Lately, this deplorable sleep was disturbed by a phenomenon, which presents a singular character. Here are some of its features as delineated in the narrative of an eye-witness, who made it a duty to examine this unusual appearance, calmly and without prejudice. This awakening commenced in 1844, in Smaland, the poorest province in Sweden; it proceeds not from the pastors, who, for the most part, are careless about the salvation of souls; some uneducated people, poor villagers, scarcely able to read, especially women of every age, even children ten years old, suddenly preach repentance and faith to their companions, of the same class in society; they prepare the way of the Lord; they address unbelieving, worldly hearts, addicted to vice; they make their houses, their villages resound with the most urgent exhortations; like John the Baptist, they cry, "Repent, and believe in Jesus Christ." They designate themselves by the name of Roestars, from the verb roest, to cry; and their discourses by the name of ross, a voice, thus calling to mind the passage in John i. 23.—People are astonished, they gather around them, they listen with earnestness, with curiosity, often with profit. On one hand, the Roestars describe the severity of the Sovereign Judge; they proclaim his terrible judgments threatened against ungodliness; on the other hand, they speak in the most consoling and persuasive terms, with the accent of charity, of the mercy and long suffering of God; in the name of his Son, they beseech sinners to be reconciled to him, and turn to him through faith in Jesus Christ. But, above all, they strongly rebuke those who are abandoned to the so general vice of drunkenness, they paint to them, in the most striking colors, the fatal consequences of their excesses, and call upon them to reform. They reproach nobody: they do not censure negligent pastors, or those who preach smooth and accommodating doctrines; on the contrary, full of the most entire respect for established order, they beg the people to go to church, to attend on preaching in which they will always hear some good word, to observe carefully all the days set apart for edification, to attend faithfully to all public and private duties, and to show themselves submissive and obedient to the laws. They themselves are most punctual in attending worship, and miss no opportunity of approaching the Lord's table. Accordingly, churches formerly deserted, may be seen filled; hearts full of levity, becoming serious; sinners returning to God, and forsaking the paths of ruin.—In a single village, seventy men engaged in the manufacture of brandy, have renounced their wretched business. All this is excellent; all this rejoices the hearts of those who take pleasure in the stones of Jerusalem, in this, the revival presents nothing very wonderful; but the singularity that is about it, is the way in which the Roestars are qualified for their vocation, and the manner in which they fulfil it.

The account given in regard to this is so strange, that I hesitate to state it to your readers. I decide on doing it, however, giving notice that I only reproduce the statements of others, without, in any way, vouching for their correctness. Correct or not—and certainly the whole cannot be false—the existence itself of these narratives is interesting in reference to the history of a contemporaneous church.

The Roestars, as we have seen, are an uneducated people; some of them have not even read the Bible; many are incapable of expressing themselves clearly on questions regarding the common concerns of life: and yet their discourses are full of divine truth, conformable to pure and simple doctrine,, and above all, animated with a very rare evangelical spirit; but, what is especially extraordinary, these men, slow of speech, confused in thought, are gifted with an easy, prompt, clear, always powerful, sometimes even eloquent and poetical faculty of speaking, when they enter into their sacred exercise. Into this they are introduced by a sort of bodily preparation. First, they suffer from a great lassitude through all their members; next, they experience convulsive motions; the shoulders project over the chest: they lay down on their back, or remain standing; their senses are shut to all impressions from without; they are in a quiet ecstacy, and there they are—the persons who open their lips and make their penetrating voices ring again. This state commonly lasts over two hours; they come out of it of their own accord; then they are like people who have waked up from a delightful dream, their eyes shine with a tranquil fire, which gradually decays, they feel extremely comforted and joyful, but they do not recollect their discourses. There are some of them, in whose case all is limited to mental impressions accompanied with convulsions, which are sometimes communicated to those who are present, and which have even pervaded entire assemblies. When these simple people are asked, whence comes this sudden and singular change upon them? they reply, that it is the Spirit of God, who, in being poured out upon all flesh, according to the prophecy of Joel, seizes them in an irresistible manner, and it is in vain that they endeavor to contend against him. These prophets (?) do not atribute to themselves any particular merit, and, these extraordinary seasons excepted, they are engaged in their every day business.

It may be well thought that this wonderful phenomenon did not fail to attract public attention; the subjects of these exercises were examined, reports were made, pastors and bishops interposed to withstand this awakening, scientific men and policemen became engaged in curing the supposed victims of disease, and in rectifying their eccentricities. They thought they discovered fits of epilepsy, of insanity; they used these poor people ill; they determined to reduce them to silence by sending them to hospitals, to madhouses; remedies of every character were administered to them. All was fruitless; persecutions only caused the number of Roestars to increase, and sometimes even their persecutors were seized with similar fits, and became Roestars in turn.

What seemed to justify these harsh measures were the excesses exhibited in some places, the prolonged duration, and the rapid propagation of these cases. Doubtless, also, the alarming predictions of some of these Roestars, who announce, in relation to a future day drawing very nigh, terrible judgments of God, and extraordinary events throughout Christendom, as, also, the approaching coming of Christ, may have disquieted and menaced the public order and tranquility.

VARIETY.

FEARFUL ACCIDENT.—On Monday evening last, Mr. Charles Loeser, Proprietor of the "Bulls Head" Hotel, N. E. corner Sixth and Willow streets, was returning to the city from the Falls of Schuylkill, with his family in a carriage, drawn by a pair of spirited horses, and when near the Reading Railroad Bridge, an approaching locomotive alarmed the horses, and caused them to spring suddenly towards a deep stone quarry on the south side of the road, and before Mr. L. could check them, they leapt off a precipice fifteen or twenty feet in height, literally dashing the carriage to pieces, and severely, though not dangerously injuring all the inmates. Stunned and bleeding, Mr. L. staggered to the hotel of Mr. Kinsel, near by, and that gentleman promptly and humanely repaired with his men to the rescue, took care of the wounded persons, and plunging horses, and after a time sent the former carefully home in his own vehicle.—Phil. Sat. Courier.

A VILLAGE WITHOUT A DOCTOR.—The Western Lancet states that the Post Master of Geneva, Coffee county, Alabama, announces the marvellous fact, that amongs a population voting about eight hundred, some pretty large families, and the village containing about forty families, they cannot count one doctor. Geneva is on a stream navigable for steamboats, at the heart of navigation, and in a cotton region. The letter-writer ought to have stated, also, whether the region was so healthy as never to require a doctor; or whether the inhabitants couldn't afford to pay a physician. There certainly must be some appalling reason for there being no one of the medical faculty amongst a population of eight hundred.—Philadelphia Saturday Courier.

HYDROPHOBIA.—We see the following direction given for the cure of this heretofore supposed incurable disease. They are by Mr. Youatt, the celebrated veterinary surgeon. Mr. Youatt says that he himself, and other veterinary surgeons, also, have been repeatedly bitten by rabid dogs, but that by pursuing the plan here recommended no serious consequences have ever ensued. This is strong testimony as to its merits. After describing the symptoms, explaining the nature and the activity of the virus, he says:—

Cauterize the wound thoroughly with lunar caustic. Let this, sharpened to a point, be applied thoroughly to every recess and sinuosity of the wound, where the teeth or salvia of the animal could possibly have penetrated. This will form an eschar, hard, dry and insoluble, a compound of the animal fibre and the caustic, in which the virus is wrapped up, and from which it cannot be separated. In a short time this dead matter—sloughs away, and the virus is carried off with it. Previous to applying the caustic, it will often be necessary to enlarge the wound, that every part may be fairly got at; and after the first eschar has sloughed off, it will be advisable to apply the caustic a second time to destroy any part that may not have received the full influence of the first operation, or that may possibly have been inoculated more by it. This carefully and thoughtfully done, the patient may feel perfectly safe. The poison will have been entirely removed, and no danger can remain.

MILL BURNED.—We learn from the Cecil (Md.) Whig, that the mill of Mr. Edward Canby, late in the occupancy of Mr. Thomas Wollaston, was burnt on Tuesday last, as also was the barn on the same premises. The fire originated from lightning. The loss is estimated at ten or twelve thousand dollars. The mill was insured for $7,000 in the Mill Creek Insurance Company, the contents, for $5,000, in the Wilmington Fire Insurance Company.—Baltimore Sun.

AMERICAN PRISONERS IN MEXICO.—By the schooner Excellent, at Pensacola from Tampico, it is stated that four of the Kentucky prisoners, taken with C. M. Clay, escaped from the city of Mexico and arrived in Tampico just previous to the sailing of the E. They left Capt. Clay and the other prisoners still in the city, and they saw while there Midshipman Rogers at different times. They travelled without molestation the whole distance on the main road to Tampico.

LIGHTNING AND TELEGRAPH WIRES.—Professor Olmstead, of Yale college, says he has no doubt that the wires of the Telegraph have an effect on electricity.

"As the storm comes up, and especially when over the wires, say fifty or a hundred miles distant, the lightning is attracted by the wires, which can be proved by any one remaining in the Telegraph office for half an hour. About the time the storm is coming up, the wires are continually filled with electricity. It is my opinion we shall never have very heavy thunder showers or hear of lightning striking, as long as we have Telegraph wires spread over the earth."

DISTRUCTIVE STORM AND LOSS OF LIFE.—The following letter, from our correspondent at Middlebury, Carroll county, Md., details the effect of a destructive storm in that vicinity, accompanied by loss of life:—Baltimore Sun.

Middlebury, Carroll Co., Md., July 13th.

Since our last refreshing and invigorating rains in Carroll and Fredrick counties, the Indian corn has assumed a most favorable aspect, and our agriculturists are now calculating on getting a good return for their labor and industry.

On the 6th inst., a narrow cloud passed over the lands of Messrs. Warfield, Bond, Plouts, and Wrestler, near Johnsville, and let down a quantity of hail, which cut into ribbons the blades of corn, and did it considerable injury—fortunately, however, its effects were not extensive. In about half an hour after, another cloud, while sailing over the farm of Mr. Howard, about a mile from Libertytown, discharged both rain and lightning; the latter fell upon a shock of wheat, under which three of Mr. Howard's colored women had placed themselves to keep from getting wet, killing one instantaneously, and knocking down the other two and stunning them considerably. Soon after this melancholly occurrence, a portion of fluid struck a tree in an opposite direction, near the residence of Mr. Howard, without doing the venerable old gentleman any other injury than burning the skin of one of his arms, which produced some inconvenience for about forty-eight hours. Lightning frequently strikes into wheat or rye shocks, during harvest, and persons should therefore be as careful not to take shelter under them as they would under trees.

ACCIDENT TO THE REV. MR. ALRICH.—The following letter from our correspondent at Washington, Pa., communicates the particulars of a serious accident which occured to the Rev. Mr. Alrich:

[Correspondence of the Baltimore Sun.]

WASHINGTON, (Pa.) July 5th, 1847.

I write to inform you of a very sad accident that has befallen one of our most respected citizens. On last Tuesday evening, Rev. Wm. P. Alrich, Professor of Chemistry in Washington College, Pennsylvania, while performing in the laboratory a very interesting experiment with the compound hydro-oxogen blow-pipe, was severely injured, in consequence of the flame passing back in the tube, igniting the gases and causing the vessel to burst into fragments, several of which in their passage struck Prof. Alrich, laying him on the floor stunned senseless, and to all appearance, lifeless.

Medical help was immediately called in, who pronounced him very severely, though not dangerously wounded. His head is badly bruised, and his face much disfigured; and he is at present unable to attend to the duties of his professorship.

Prof. Alrich is highly esteemed as a citizen, and a gentleman of great literary attainments.

Yours, &c., N.

A PICTURE.—The New York grand Jury, for city and county, on Friday morning made a presentment to the court of Sessions relative to the conditions, management, &c., of city institutions of charity. Blackwell's Island, 160; Nurseries, do. 956; New Alms house, do. 400 Lunatic Asylum, do 430—making a total of 4346 sick and well dependents upon the city charity, independent of the inmates of the city prison, penitentiary &c., say 1000 more. The grand Jury found all these institutions in excellent order and well kept. Within the quarter ending 1st inst., the coroner held inquest in 45 cases of drowned persons, 34 cases of death caused by intemperance, mostly delirium tremens, 15 deaths by apoplexy, 15 suicides, 5 deaths by violence from blows, 13 unknown.

I. The dispensation of the Gospel the subject of prophetic anticipation.

II. The evangelic announcement of the Savior's nativity.

III. The divine mandate at the incarnation of the Son of God.

IV. The introduction of the Mediatorial economy the subject of rejoicing in heaven.

V. The work of grace on the day of Pentecost the model for religious revivals.

VI. The primitive Evanglisits the patterns of all succeeding preachers.

VII. The divine institution for saving the world.

VIII. The moral revolutions which the triumphs of the Gospel accomplish.

IX. The religious excitement produced by the successful preaching of the Gospel, defended.

X. The principal cause of the failure of the agencies of Christianity.

XI. The penitent sinner on earth the delight of the Angels in heaven.

XII. The final consummation of the dispensation of grace in the solemnities of the day of judgment.

The views embodied in these discourses are such as are held in common by all evangelical denominations. The author eschews all controversy. The style is didactic. Nothing sectarian has a place in these sermons, which are simply devoted to popular impression and instruction. It is proposed to put to the Press these Sermons as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers have been secured to justify their publication. If the author meet with adequate encouragement in the sale of this first Volume, it will be succeeded by a second, and so on.

[The contents of the second, third, fourth and fifth volumes are also given in the prospectus which has been furnished us, but as the first volume is to be published separately, the above will sufficiently for the present, indicate the nature and plan of the work. ED.]

The whole of these discourses were prepared and delivered during a not unsuccessful ministry of upwards of twenty years, partly in this country and partly in Great Britain; and are already committed to writing.

Each Volume will be sold at the moderate charge of One Dollar, to be paid for on delivery.

The Volumes will be neatly bound,—octavo size,—and printed on good paper, in a clear type. Each Volume will contain upwards of three hundred pages. Subscriptions will be received for the first Volume alone; or for the first and second; or the whole series may be subscribed for at once.

Mr. LEVI PETIT is authorized to receive subscriptions for these contemplated publications; or a letter addressed to the author, Mount Vernon, Knox county, Ohio, with a request over the writer's signature, to become a subscriber, will insure the insertion of his name on the subscribtion list. POETRY.

From the Episcopal Recorder.

THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE.

Tune.—"Auld Lang Syne."

Hail! sweetest, dearest tie that binds
Our glowing hearts in one,
Hail! sacred hope that tunes our minds
To harmony divine.
It is the hope, the blissful hope,
Which Jesus' grace has giv'n:
The hope, when days and years are past,
We all shall meet in heav'n.

Chorus.—We all shall meet in heav'n at last,
We all shall meet in heaven;
The hope when days and years are past,
We all shall meet in heav'n.

What! though the northern wintry blast,
Shall howl around thy cot:
What! though beneath an eastern sun
Be cast our distant lot,
Yet still we share the blissful hope,
Which Jesus' grace has given, &c.

From Burmah's shores, from Afric's strand,
From India's burning plain,
From Europe, from Columbia's land,
We hope to meet again.
It is the hope, the blissful hope,
Which Jesus' grace has giv'n, &c.

No lingering look, no parting sigh,
Our future meeting knows;
There friendship beams from every eye,
And hope immortal grows.
O, sacred hope! O blissful hope!
Which Jesus' grace has giv'n.
The hope when days and years are past
We all shall meet in heaven.

Chorus.—We all shall meet in heav'n at last,
We all shall meet in heaven;
The hope when days and years are past,
We all shall meet in heav'n.

FREE MASONRY.

Masonic writers contend that their institution is christian, that as an organized system, it originated among the Jews, at the building of the first temple, that from thence it spread into different and distant nations. I design to show that such an idea is groundless. I have never seen any proof that Masonry originated among the Jews, at the building of the temple, or at any other period. That Solomon's workmen were under a systematical organization will not be questioned. Must we go to Masons to know what this organization was? To inspired history and to no other source are we indebted for all the information the world possesses on this interesting subject.—There were no mysteries into which the builders of the temple were solemnly initiated—no secrets which they were sworn on pain of death not to reveal—nor were they at liberty to embrace what religion they chose—nor to unite with Pagans in religious ceremonies. These things are essential to the very existence of the Masonic system. That they originated among the Jews, or were sanctioned by their Divine Law-giver cannot be proved. Solomon is claimed by Masons as a member of the institution.—But where is their proof? Have they any record to produce which shall substantiate this? Mr. Town says that, his Masonic character is justly inferred from his building the temple: p. 261.—What evidence is this that he founded the institution of Masonry, or was ever initiated into its mysteries? With as much justness may we infer that every Free Mason builds a temple, as to infer that because Solomon built a temple, he was a Free Mason. A christian institution could never be received and patronized by Pagans. Masonry professes to be a christian institution, yet Masonic writers contend that it has been extensively patronized by Pagan nations. A moment's reflection will convince any person of candid judgment, that one or the other of these propositions cannot be true. Masonry as a professed system of morality, either is not a christian institution, or it never was patronized and reduced to practice by idolators. Would an institution which should exhibit the glorious character of the true God and of his Son Jesus Christ, and which should also exhibit the divine law as the only rule of action, be cordially received by heathen nations, and yet they sustain their heathen character? How was christianity received by them? It was treated with the utmost contempt; the character of its Divine author was ridiculed; hardships were endured; lives were sacrificed, and miracles were wrought to establish it among them. If Masonry displayed the character of the same God and Saviour, and the holiness and purity of the moral law, it would have met with the same opposition, and have required the same Almightiness to plant its standard. Wherever it might have been embraced, it would have destroyed the worship of the gods, and have overturned the systems of idolatry. Hence, the idea that Masonry originated among the Jews, and spread from thence through almost every part of the heathen world, is entirely without foundation.—If it has existed among heathens, and has been patronized by them, it is an institution with which they were pleased; consequently one of their own invention. For heathens are no better pleased with the character of a christian institution, than they are with the moral character of Jehovah. Mr. Town has presented us with a long catalogue of ancient heathen characters, who are considered by him and others to have been Masons; he and Mr. Bradley have labored extensively, to show that the mysteries of Masonry were known to heathen nations long before the Christian era. From all the information we can obtain on this subject, their statements are correct. Hence, says Mr. Bradley, our records inform us that the way, and customs of Masons have ever corresponded with those of the Egyptian philosophers to which they bear a near affinity. Unwilling to expose their mysteries to the vulgar eyes, they concealed their particular tenets and principles hierogliphical figures, and expressed their notions by signs and symbols, which they communicated to their magi alone, who were bound by oath not to reveal them: the Pythagorean seems to have been established on a similar plan—p. 54. This quotation is full in proof that Masonry is a heathen institution.—The customs of those philosophers, their mysteries, and their oaths, were heathenish; yet they were Masonic, and are initiated by modern Masons. Some nations, says Mr. Town, with whom the world has had no intercourse for hundreds of years, are in possession of all the Masonic secrets, and have regular bodies, similar ceremonies, and in all essential points, agree with the rest of the world—p. 101. This writer has occupied several pages in the tenth chapter of his book in showing that Masonry existed among ancient heathen nations. A greater part of what he has said is quoted by Mr. Bradley. From this chapter, he says, I shall make a few quotations of Masonry among the Tyrians. Owing, says he, to the friendly intercourse between the Tyrians and Carthagenians, if Masonry existed among the former, it would amongst the latter. Of the existence of Masonry in ancient Egypt, he says, be this however, as it may, we are substantially informed by several ancient historians, that Masonry did flourish in Egypt, soon after this period. Hence, says Mr. Town, we find that Masonry might have existed amongst the ancient Britons and Gauls, previous to their having been conquered by the Romans. Thus we find that Masonry has probably existed in England since the time the Druids received their institutions from Pythagoras, about five hundred years before Christ. Mr. Bradley adds Persia to the list, and says the children of the royal family were at fourteen years of age, put under the tuition of four of the wisest and most virtuous statesmen. Among the many things embraced in their education, the first, says he, taught them the worship of the gods—p. 32. Mr. Town, after speaking of the existence of Masonry among those heathen nations, of its progress in England, and of its introducti on into America, observes: thus, my brethren, I have endeavored to give you a concise, and it is thought, a true history of the great leading events of our order. We hence may discover its antiquity, and hence its early and rapid dissemination amongst manki nd; and in his closing remarks, says: the rude savage of the wilderness, who has the degrees, now meets the civilized Mason as his brother. Masonry was obviously one of the first things which polluted the primitive church. Some of the ancient christian fathers who were Masons, labored abundantly, says Mr. Town, to prove from the ancient mysteries, that the knowledge of the true God had been preserved and transmitted down from the first ages in perfect accordance with the christian religion. Again, Origin was so charmed with the ancient mysteries, that he taught them in conjunction with christianity—p. 139. Was the Apostle Paul charmed with these mysteries? Did he teach them in conjunction with christianity? Did he introduce them into the church institutions? Would he have countenanced such a thing in those ancient fathers? Have no fellowship, says he, with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them. The introduction of these Pagan superstitions into the church of Christ, were the bane of its purity. It is hence clearly perceived that Masonry did exist extensively among heathen nations, and that one order of their mysteries was Masonry. A few quotations from ancient history will throw farther light on the nature of these mysteries, and show the coincidence between them and modern Masonry. Various orders of mysteries existed among heathen nations. The highest of these are supposed by Masons to have embraced their mysteries. Mr. Town, speaking of the knowledge which it is pretend ed some of the ancient heathens possessed of the character of God, says,—that most, if not all this knowledge was obtained through the medium of that higher order of mysteries, which were known only to individuals, yet existed in every country—p. 144. These mysteries, he says, contained certain requisitions as a test of the secrecy, fidelity, and justice of the disciple—p. 131. We are informed, says Mr. Jones, that the general object of these mysteries was by means of certain shows and representations, accompanied with hymns, to impress the senses and imaginations of the initiated with the belief of the doctrines of religion, according to the views of them which the inventors of the mysteries entertained. If this was their design, continues he, they must have been grossly perverted from their original intent—p. 15. When the time of their initiation arrived, says Mr. Bolin, they were brought into the temp le, and to inspire the greater reverence and terror, the ceremony was performed in the night. Wonderful things passed on the occasion. Visions were seen and voices were heard of an extraordinary kind; a sudden splendor dispelled the darkness of the place, and disappearing immediately added new horror and amazement; apparitions, claps of thunder, earthquakes, improved the terror of the gloom, while the person admitted, stupid, sweating through fear, heard, trembling, the mysterious volumes read to him, if in such a condition he could hear at all. These nocturnal rites were attended with many disorders, which the severe law of silence imposed on the persons initiated prevented from coming to light—An. Hist. vol. 1. The severe law of silence was this: the votaries were enjoined, on peril of instant death, to observe the most profound secrecy respecting every thing that passed. If any one ever revealed it, it was supposed that he had called divine vengeance upon his head. Such a wretch was publicly put to death—Jones' Class. Dic.—p. 15. How many striking resemblances here are of modern Masonry. These mysteries were the highest order among the Athenians. These were the most exalted mysteries of that nation, into which Hyppocrates was initiated, and are considered by Messrs. Bradley and Town to have been Masonry; for they have produced the circumstance of his initiation as an evidence that Masonry existed among that people. Now the question arises, whence did these or any of the heathen mysteries originate? The idea that they are of christian origin, is too absurd to be admitted. For it has been shown that a christian institution could never be acknowledged and patronized by heathens. All the mysteries which ever existed among them must have been of their own invention. Masonry can be traced to no other source. We learn, says Mr. Jones, p. 15, from Herodotus, Diodorus, and Plutarch, that these mysteries were first invented in Egypt, from whence they spread into most countries of Europe and Asia. Masonry having fallen into the hands of Jews and Christians, has been artfully decorated with Jewish and Christian ornaments. Divest it of these and its loathsome heathen form appears. The practice of initiation into its mysteries, the administration of an oath of secrecy, under the penal sanction of death, and every thing essential to the existence of the institution, are of heathen origin. I will now place before the reader farther, and if possible, clearer evidence, that Masonry originated among Pagans. In the lecture of the third degree, Masons say, the forty-seventh problem of Euclid, was an invention of our ancient friend and brother, the great Pythagoras, who in his travels through Asia, Africa and Europe, was initiated into several orders of priesthood, and raised to the sublime degree of Master Mason—Bradley, p. 98; Morgan, p. 70. Mr. Preston, says, the records of the fraternity inform us, that Pythagoras was regularly initiated into Masonry, and being properly instructed in the mysteries of the art, propagated the principles of the order in other countries into which he travelled—p.107. It was here, (in Egypt among the priests, says Mr. Bradley,) that Pythagoras was initiated into their mysteries, and instructed in their art. This great heathen philosopher was a Master Mason, learned Masonry among the heathens, was initiated in Egypt among the idolatrous priests. He propagated the principles of the order in other countries into which he travelled. I might pursue this part of the subject much farther and produce much evidence, but I think there has been enough said to convince any unprejudiced mind that Masonry is a heathen, and not a Christian institution. Written for the Western Recorder.

W. S. S., and Secret societies.

Mr Editor:—W. S. S., has at last appeared in the Recorder in what he perhaps terms, if no one else can, an affirmative to the first part of his proposition as published in the same paper of June 24th.

It will be recollected, that that proposition proposed to discuss the right or wrong tendency of the principle of Secrecy, &c., nothing else. We would not, willingly, suspect him for being an anarchist or a libertinist; but a friend to good order—a believer in the truth of the holy Scriptures, and in the just and equitable organization of society—social, civil, benevolent and religious, all having their appropriate spheres of action, without being intolerable by Divine law. Now we suppose he believes all of this. Then wherein do we differ? He appears to tnink, if secrecy should be attached, it is despoiled of benevolence and all atributes for good; and we think secrecy in some of its parts, at some times, is necessary to its harmonious existence. We say we are willing to believe him a friend to society, but opposed to the introduction and perpetuation of the principle of secrecy in society. His argument then amounts to this, that if any subject of the Divine law or government should have a knowledge of a thing, of which his fellow subjects are ignorant, and neglect or refuse to tell it unto them; or the case would be the same, if two or more have a knowledge of a certain fact of which the mass of the communtty are ignorant, and they fail or refuse to make known to said community all they know themselves, they are to be considered as having formed an imperium in imperio, and are guilty of "rebellion against right, and authority, and law, and precept." I obey or fill the law of right, when I render voluntarily unto others, that which they have a right imperiously to demand. But he that would contend, that he had a right thus to demand of me, all things of which I have a knowledge, would be near of kin to him of St. Peter's chair at Rome. We impute no such principle to W. S. S., but to the doctrine advanced in support of his pro position. I submit to authority, when I obey the law of right. I obey the gospel law, when I visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and render assistance according to my ability. I obey precept, when I keep silence, or when I speak, guide my tongue as with a bridle. And example, also, when I do as did the Saviour, when He put them all forth save the father and mother, and James, John and Peter, and when the object of entering in was concluded, he commanded to keep a profound secret, what was done therein. Why did Christ speak in parables to the Jews, and not to his apostles? because it was for these to know, and those not. Their hearts were fully set in them to evil, they had determined not to believe, if it should be plainly declared unto them.

That oaths, pledges, and promises are necessarially implied in his proposition, appears to be a groundless assumption. But such confederations are contrary to Divine laws, because they are governments within government, and not to be tolerated for one moment. What part of Divine laws? Does the gentleman wish to fall back to Judaism, and establish a theocracy in the hands of angels, notwithstanding the Divine government has passed into the hands of a Mediator on better promises. That all visible associations or confederations of men for whatever purpose, whether civil or ecclesiastical, benevolent or otherwise are only human institutions, and accountable to Him, who is King of kings, and Lord of lords, is a fact indisputable.

No visible society exists by special Divine authority or appointment. But this notion of matters he supposes an imperium in imperio, and prays his "brethren to consider these things and to bring their seeret oaths to the light of revelation, and their secret doings, to the light that makes manifest." And then he goes right on, and publishes both to the world. Is that a secret which has been published to the world? If our friend contends he has published the truth in this case, he will admit there is no such thing in existence as he is pretending to oppose, for his own publication proves this. But if he admits the oaths and doings he has published are false imputations on the secret orders of the day, and that he knows not what their secret oaths and doings are, or whether any is performed by them, he will admit that he knows not what he is opposing, or whether anything.

Butin what light are we to regard his production in either case? He laughs for our good, and thinks it no crime, and neither do we; then may we not laugh for his good; and be innocent?

He has found an Englishman from whom he learned, the principle of secrecy overturned monarchies and established republics; but when it had produced this fruit, it should be suppressed by all governments as anti-republican. If this is good Divinity, it is certainly poor logic. But "then our Englishman has another objection," "and proceeds to speak of pounds and shillings." Does W. S.S., suppose this costly array and what by his Englishman is termed "childish foolery or merry Andrews," a legitimate offspring or effect of the principle of secrecy.

As well might he suppose that all the costly fixtures in many of our city churches—the dandy appearance of many of the clergy—the gold and costly apparel of church members in general, are a legitimate fruit of the religion of the meek and lowly Jesus. But publicity is given to the object and means of this religion, by the cry of an angel flying in the midst of heaven. And is the object and means of any secret society kept more secret?

Is not Beneficence their means, and the good of man their object, proclaimed by all secret societies. But they enter into secret conclave and make it unlawful to publish to the world, words heard therein. Did not Paul, duly prepared, enter into the same, where Jesus was, and hear words unlawful for him to tell his brethren? We did not set out to follow in connection the remarks of W. S. S., on secret societies, for how any one can conceive them to have any reference to his published proposition, is more than we can tell. But if he will stick to his proposition, we propose (if no abler pen will,) to supply the negative in due form and connection. But all matter irrelevant to the proposition could only be replied to by retort, or else according to its folly; therefore we decline giving such reply to this or to any other article he may write on the subject, unless he sticks to the text. MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

From the Missionary Herald.

TAMIL MISSIONS.

LETTER FROM MESSRS. SPAULDING, SCUDDER, AND OTHERS, MARCH 16TH, 1847.

VOYAGE TO MADRAS.

It will be recollected that the Flavio sailed from Boston to Madras, November 18, having on board a number of laborers for the Tamil missions.—Mr. and Mrs. Spaulding, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Scudder, and Mr Hastings were destined to Ceylon; Mr. and Mrs. Chandler, and Mr. and Mrs. Ford were destined to the Madura district; while Doct. S., though belonging to the Madras mission, was expecting to labor temporarily in connection with the Madura brethren, in consequence of the inability of the Prudential Committee to send out a physician to the field which they have been called to occupy. The following letter, written the day before the missionaries landed at Madras, gives an account of the voyage which will be perused with interest, not only by their numerous friends, but by all who love the enterprise to which they have consecrated their lives.

"As we draw near the close of our voyage, we feel it to be our privilege as well as duty to give you a short acccount of the dealings of our heavenly Father with us, since we received your farewell benediction, and witnessed the deep interest and sympathy of our friends as they accompanied us to the ship. The hymn, the prayer, the parting scene, the first motion of our floating world as it started in its orbit, the rapidly increasing distance that was to separate us until we meet where ships and seas and farewells are not known, are still fresh in our memory. Those scenes and sympathising friends will long live in our hearts; and we doubt not that many in different parts of the land, as well as those present on that occasion, have followed us with their prayers.

You may recollect that the weather was quite unsettled when we left Boston. We had scarcely cleared the harbor before a storm overtook us and followed us nearly three weeks. The wind was not only ahead, but blew a gale, drifting us rapidly towards Point Sable. The sea was thrown into fearful mountains, separated by deep and frightful ravines, into which the ship was plunged as it rolled or pitched from its giddy height; while the spray, whirled up into the air by the wheels of His chariot from the uneven surface, formed a thick cloud and made it impossible to see at a distance. For a season it seemed doubtful whether we should ride out the storm, or find a resting place in the great deep. Then we called upon the Lord in our distress, and He who commands the calm as easily as the tempest, heard our voice and saved us from our fears.

Our ship suffered little damage, with the exception of some small injury to her bulwarks and some splitting of her sails. A part of our stores, and about one third of our supply of water, were also lost. During these three weeks many of our number suffered severely from sea sickness; but since that time we have been highly favored. Doct. Scudder has been occasionally afflicted with derangement of the digestive organs, and Mrs. Spaulding slightly with her former difficulties. The health of the latter, however, we hope is much improved.

Our time has been spent very pleasantly, and, we think, profitably. In addition to our other duties, we have paid particular attention to the study of the Tamil language. In the providence of God we have been highly favored in having a pious captain. We feel that we cannot say too much in his favor. He has been exceedingly kind and obliging; and he has done every thing in his power to make our situation comfortable and our voyage pleasant. He has been uniformly present at our morning and evening prayers, and taken his turn in leading our devotions. The mate and the crew have been very civil and respectful; and those not on watch have attended our evening prayers. Our Sabbaths have been our most pleasant days. With the exception of the first, when most of of us were too ill to attend, we have had two services; one for ourselves, which the captain has also attended, the other for the ship's company. We have also had two weekly meetings, one on Wednesday evening, the other on Friday evening. Most of the seamen not necessarily on watch, have attended both of these meetings, and appeared interested. We have also sought opportunities for private conversations with them. Mr. Chandler has had an interesting Bible class, for which most of them seem very grateful.

In the early part of our voyage, one of the seamen seemed somewhat thoughtful, and in a few weeks gave evidence of a change of heart. We understand that he has pious parents, and for many years attended the Sabbath School. He informs us that after his arrival in Boston, he had refused other opportunities, and delayed nearly two weeks, for the purpose of securing employment on board the vessel in which the missionaries were to sail, from a desire to be benefitted by their instructions. While waiting at the Sailor's Home, he was deeply impressed by a perusal of Buchanan's Researches, published by the American Tract Society. Soon after his embarkation, however, and during the storm, he had almost shaken off his seriousness; but he was led back, and, we hope, saved through the power of truth. The steward also, who was formerly a slave, and was once sold under the hammer, but afterwards freed by the will of his master, gave evidence some weeks ago of having embraced the Savior. About four weeks ago, feeling that we had not done all for the salvation of the crew which it was our privilege to do, and which our responsible situation demanded, we agreed to set apart half an hour, at seven o'clock each morning, as a season of special prayer for the influences of the Holy Spirit. Soon there appeared a manifest stillness and solemnity among them, with much less profaneness, and an inclination to be instructed. Four of them, making six in all, have expressed a determination to follow Christ. The interest still continues, and we trust that many more, through grace and the influence of Captain Crocker,—who in a recent conference exhorted them to perseverance, and expressed his determination to do all in his power to encourage and assist them,—may find the pearl of great price before they reach America. His labors will, we confidently believe, be extended to all whom he can possibly influence.

It is delightful to feel that in all our personal labors, we are assisted by those in America who pray for us and sympathize with us; and that, in view of such happy results, we can say, Paul planted, Appollos watered, but God gave the increase. We have been able also to form a temperance society among them, and are happy to say that, with two exceptions, every man on board has signed the pledge of the American Temperance Union. We have observed with interest the missionary prayer meeting on the first Monday of each month, the annual prayer meeting on the first Monday in January, and the union prayer meeting for colleges. These have been very pleasant seasons, reminding us that, though absent from your assemblies, we are still with you, and one with you, and with all who go to the house of prayer and praise on such occasions. In our intercourse with each other, we have enjoyed much of that "perfect love which casteth out fear." On the whole our four months have passed away very pleasantly and rapidly; and we doubt not you will unite with us in thanks to our heavenly Father, that we have the prospect of soon being in our long anticipated and much desired work."

Our brethren were able to go ashore on the succeeding day. In the midst of warm and fraternal greetings, however, they heard much to awaken feelings of sadness. Under date of Mar. 19, Mr. Spaulding wrote as follows:—"Soon after we came to anchor, the brethren Winslow and H. M. Scudder came on board to welcome us to this land. How affecting, how mournful the tidings from all parts! Lawrence is not; Whittlesey is not; Mrs. Muzzy is not; H. M. Scudder's child is not; and,—what is more unexpected and shocking—Dr. Armstrong is wrecked and gone with many others! How mysterious the way of God! And yet we know it is well with our brother, and well because the Lord has done it."

Miscellaneous.

Dr. Franklin on Infidelity.

The following letter of Dr. Franklin, found in his works, edited by his grandson, William Temple Franklin, (London edition, vol. iii. p. 279,) addressed to the author of an infidel publication, submitted to him in manuscript, [probably Paine,] claims the attention of every American citizen:

Dear Sir,—I have read your manuscript with some attention. By the argument it contains against a particular Providence, though you allow a general Providence, you can strike at the foundations of all religion. For, without the belief of a Providence, that takes cognizance of, guards and guides, and may favor particular persons, there is no motive to worship a Deity, to fear its displeasure or to pray for its protection. I will not enter into any discussion of your principles, though you seem to desire it. At present I shall only give you my opinion; and though your reasonings are subtle, and may previal with some readers, you will not succeed so as to change the general sentiments of mankind on that subject; and the consequence of printing this piece will be, a great deal of odium drawn upon yourself, mischief to you, and no benefit to others. He that spits against the wind spits in his own face.—But were you to succeed, do you imagine any good will be done by it? You yourself may find it easy to lead a virtuous life without the assistance afforded by religion; you having a clear perception of the advantages of virtue and the disadvantages of vice, and possessing a strength of resolution sufficient to enable you to resist common temptations. But think how great a portion of mankind consists of ignorant men and women, and of inexperienced, inconsiderate youth of both sexes, who have need of the motives of religion to restrain them from vice, support their virtue, and retain them in the practice of it till it becomes habitual, which is the great point of its security. And perhaps you are indebted to her originally, that is to your religious education, for the habits of virtue upon which you now justly value yourself. You might easily display your excellent talents of reasoning upon a less hazardous subject, and thereby obtain a rank with our most distinguished authors. For among us it is not necessary, as among the Hottentots, that a youth, to be raised into the company of men, should prove his manhood by beating his mother. I would advise you, therefore, not to attempt unchaining the tiger, but to burn this piece before it is seen by any other person, whereby you will save yourself a great deal of mortification from the enemies it may raise against you, and perhaps a good deal of regret and repentance.

If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be without it? I intend this letter itself as a proof of my friendship, and therefore add no professions to it, but subscribe simply,

Yours, B. FRANKLIN.

American Eagle.

Mr. Freedy, of Defiance, has in his possession a living Bald Eagle. It was caught in a corn crib in the vicinity of that place, a few weeks ago. The eagle had entered the crib for the purpose of capturing a chicken and found himself captured ere he was aware. He had neglected the necessary precautions to protect his rear and to provide for his retreat. The eagle is now kept in a cage. He is a very fierce looking fellow. His talons are very savage looking indeed. He seems to bear his captivity very well, and eats and drinks as though he were at liberty.—Chickens and other living fowls are frequently thrown into his cage, which he seizes, kills, and devours with great rapidity—and with the most savage ferocity.

But the most remarkable thing connected with this bird is a very singular attachment which he has formed for an old hen which was thrown into his cage for him to devour. Although she has been in his cage for several weeks he has studiously refrained from molesting her. This is the more remarkable as he has uniformly killed every other fowl put within his reach. The old hen sits with him upon the same nest and seems to be upon the very best terms with her savage companion.

In order to induce the eagle to kill the hen the person who keeps him deprived him of food for four days—but it appears that even starvation would not induce him to harm his helpless companion.

This incident of the eagle and the hen is as remarkable as that related by Goldsmith of the lion and the spaniel.—Dayton Trans.

Squash Bugs—Hens that don't Lay.

Mr. Editor,—Can you inform me of the best method of destroying the Squash Bug? They made their appearance on my vines two or three days since, and I have killed great numbers of them by putting them in boiling hot water. Is there any thing to make hens lay this season of the year? Mine have not laid any to speak of for a month past.

Is there any remedy for the hens that are attacked with the Pip? By answering these questions you will confer a favor on

WM. GARCON.

Worcester, June 28, 1847.

☞ Bugs on squash and pumpkin vines are caught by placing shingles or bits of board near the plants. Early in the morning you will find the large black, and the striped bugs under these boards where they gather at night and are protected. Take up one board in each hand, bring the two in contact where the bugs may be crushed by rubbing them together.

Sprinkling the vines repeatedly with ashes, plaster and such matters drives the bugs away.—Charcoal dust, lime, ashes, and all such remedies have a good tendency to keep off the intruders.

Hens that have been laying for two months and have not been allowed to rear young ones, are inclined to nest in July. Young hens are best.—Procure pullets every year, in October or November. They will lay more eggs through the winter than old hens. Pullets never have the pip. Hens are not a long lived animal. We have never met with any success in doctoring them.—Massachusetts Ploughman.

Religious Intelligence.

PITTSBURGH DISTRICT.

Willow Point, Va., Aug. 3, 1847.

Br. Bassett: I have concluded once more, with your permission, to report through the Recorder, the condition of Manchester circuit. In doing this, I am happy to state that peace with God through Jesus Christ, I trust, is enjoyed by far the greater number of those who compose our societies, in evidence of which, there is manifest submission to his will, devotion to his cause, and the dwelling together in unity, which is both good and pleasant to behold. I have joy in believing that here God has many faithful witnesses, whose christian deportment gives a lively exemplification of the divine reality, and glorious excellency of the religion of the Saviour; while they rest not satisfied with present attainments, but press onward, as though determined to gain the exalted heights of the christian character and experience.

In reviewing the quarter which is now closing, and in connexion the three years I have labored with this people, there are many circumstances which plainly declare the abundant goodness of God which has been vouchsafed to us. The numbers in society have gradually increased since the period my labors commenced among them.—Then there were about seventy-five; now, one hundred and seventy-five. Many times of refreshing have we enjoyed, at the regular appointments, also on protracted and quarterly occasions—some of the best I have ever experienced.

The universal kindness of the people, has drawn forth the warmest affections of my heart. They have always discharged promptly their pecuniary obligations to me, proving in this respect, the sincerity of their declaration to the Conference by which I was first appointed to serve them: Namely,—'That they intended to be honest.'—They appear established in the faith that a man cannot labor as heartily and successfully if his heart is discouraged, and his energies paralyzed by a lack of the needful for a comfortable subsistence. They have also, ever since they have had a name and a place among the circuits of the district promptly paid their apportionment of the President's salary. They have heard and promptly responded to the call for their contribution to the support of our deeply afflicted Brother Shinn. And they have annually, promptly sent up as good a Conference collection as any other charge with the same numbers in the district.—And (as I believe) this promptness in these good works has been induced by motives such as christianity alone can furnish. They shall not lose their reward.

But in the review, there arise painful as well as pleasing reflections. I try to appreciate my responsibility in the office I fill, and the relations I sustain. My best endeavors have been marked with imperfections. But this I know, I have labored honestly. I hope under the blessing of God some good has been done. But much more is yet to be done, or many souls must sink to ruin. Some who are numbered with us, I fear are yet unjustified, unsanctified and unfit for heaven.—May God undertake their cases, and convert, renew, and save them. A few who run well for a season, have wandered like the prodigal, and now vainly strive to satisfy their souls with husks.—O, that they would return to their Father's house. Others who have attended the sanctuary regularly, and many who have been occasional hearers, are still in their sins and exposed to death. O, God, save these! With all these different characters I have had to do in my humble ministrations. And shall I be able to render a joyful account of my stewardship? Ah! what is the estimate of God upon my labors, and their improvement by those for whom they were bestowed? And what a fearful reckoning awaits us! Shall minister and people stand approved?

And now with this people I must take my leave. That in-glorious 'restriction rule' declares it, and demands positive obedience,—yea, must be obeyed, whether circumstances are for or against it. I hope this rule may have a short life and such a death as will consign it to eternal annihilation. But for the present I submit, and must say Farewell! to my beloved charge; to go, God only knows where. For the last six months I have been so greatly afflicted in my throat, that I fear I shall not be able to take an appointment at our ensuing Conference. However, I desire to resign my all into the hands of our good God, who has thus far dealt mercifully with me.

I pray that the Great Head of the Church will send to this vine, a man who may water and rear it, so that an hundred fold more fruit may be yielded in coming years, than has been in years that are past. And may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with all. Amen.

JOS. BURNS.

INDIANA DISTRICT.

White River Ct., July 30, 1847.

Br. Bassett: I embrace this opportunity of informing you and the friends of Zion, what the Lord is doing for us. We have held several pleasant two day meetings since my former communication, in all of which the Lord has been with us. Ten more have given us their hand, and say they are determined to help us fight the battles of the Lord, and go up with us, to possess the goodly land of Canaan, believing that the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel. We have much reason to rejoice, and to be thankful and praise our God. Our fourth quarterly meeting will be held at Light's school house, eleven miles below Spencer, on the first Saturday and Sabbath in September, in conjunction with which we are going to hold a camp-meeting, commencing the day before quarterly Conference. We want Br. Shipp, and the ministerial brethren in general, to come and help us. We hope the brethren will pray that the Lord may meet with us, and that the hills and valleys of White River Circuit may become vociferous with the praise of God, and with the shouts of new born souls.

Yours, in the bonds of love,

WM. BARNET.

To Young Men.—How, after the duties of the day are over, do you employ your evenings? This is a question of importance. If you have no regular employment, no fixed pursuits to engross your attention, and operate as a stimulus to the mind when unemployed, you must, of necessity, have many leisure and unoccupied hours; intervals when time will hang heavily on your hands; and suggest the necessity of some means to relieve it of its weight. The very time which is dissipated in idleness, would, if devoted to study, enable many a young man to obtain eminence and distinction in some useful art.

A sexton's son became an astronomer by devoting a few hours every evening to the study of the stars, after ringing the bell for nine o'clock. Gifford was, in early life, an apprentice to a shoemaker, and spent his leisure hours in study. His destitution was such, that he was compelled to work out his problems on a smooth piece of leather, with a blunted awl. David Rittenhouse was a plough-boy, and covered his ploughbeam and fences with his juvenile calculations. James Ferguson was a shepherd's boy, and learned to read and write while watching his flock in the fields by night, and with no other light than the moon and stars.—Hallowell Courier.

WESTERN REGORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, AUGUST 12, 1847.

Dont Forget.—Those who are indebted for the Western Recorder, will greatly oblige us, by paying up before the close of the present volume. It will be a convenient opportunity to send by the preachers or delegates to the approaching Conferences. We need to receive, about this time, several hundred dollars, to enable us to meet claims against us which have grown out of our publishing enterprise. Dont forget. We shall have to discontinue many at the close of vol. viii, if they do not pay up.

A Great Dependance is also placed in the liberality of those true friends of the paper, who pursue the good old custom of paying in advance. From them we trust we shall have some essential aid in entering upon our next volume. Read the next paragraph.

Annual Register, M. P. Church, 1848.—This little publication, so much demanded by the Church, is now in press, and will be issued at an earlier date than heretofore. An edition of 6000 copies of the first half of the pamphlet, including the Calendar, is already worked off from the press. And we only wait to obtain the statistics of the several Annual Conferences to be held within a few weeks, when we expect to make up the remaining part of the publication. Every subscriber for the Western Recorder who pays $2 in advance for vol. 9, shall have a copy of the Register sent him by mail, so soon as it is issued.

Magnetic Telegraph.—This wonderful instrument was put into successful operation, from Philadelphia, to Zanesville, on Friday evening last, since which time, daily despatches have been received. The line is also completed westward to Columbus. And we shall soon be in connection with the Queen City of the West.

Daily Paper.—Agreeably to previous assurances, on the completion of the Telegraph to this point, the Zanesville Courier has commenced a daily issue. The first number appeared on Monday last, with new type. From the enterprising spirit of the publisher, and his facilities for dealing out the news, having the office of the Telegraph in immediate connection with the office of his paper, we should think that his enterprise would succeed.

Important News from Mexico.

The Zanesville Courier has intelligence from Philadelphia by Magnetic Telegraph, that on the morning of the 16th of July, Gen. Scott, in his advance upon the city of Mexico, and within eight miles of it, encountered the Mexican forces, when a great battle ensued. As usual, the Americans were victorious, but lost 300 slain.—The number on the side of the Mexicans, not ascertained. Next morning, 17th, General Scott and his soldiers entered and took possession of the city of Mexico. The flag of the United States now occupies a place over the Halls of the Montezumas.

Information Wanted—Statistics of Conferences.—We are about publishing the Annual Register of the M. P. Church, for the year 1848, and are anxious to obtain, in view of this publication, the statistics of those Annual Conferences which have not published their Minutes in full. We desire to have the name of the President of each Conference, the number of Stations, Circuits, Missions, Itinerant ministers and preachers, Unstationed ministers and preachers, Members, and houses of worship in each District. Also, the time and place of the next session of each Annual Conference. If the secretaries. or any other having the information, will communicate it to us without delay, we shall be greatly obliged, and will be pleased to reciprocate the favor in any possible way.

Col. M. Jewett.—We regret to learn by the Ohio State Journal, that this aged citizen of Columbus, met with a serious fall on Saturday morning last. He was precipitated from the stone steps of the Insurance office, and carried home insensible. Fears were entertained that the accident might prove fatal.

Putnam Female Seminary.—The Annual Examination of this Institution, at the close of the Summer Term, has just been held, and was a very interesting occasion. We had the opportunity of attending but part of the examination, and we are increasingly impressed with the conviction that the Institution is well conducted, and is an ornament to our village. The address of the President, Rev. Mr. Kingsbury, to the class of graduates was most appropriate and impressive, and we should be gratified to be furnished at his convenience, with a copy of his remarks, for publication. The exercises were concluded with an address in the Presbyterian church on Tuesday afternoon, by Rev. Mr. Hitchcock of Columbus. There is now to be a vacation of eight weeks The Winter Term of the Seminary commences Oct. 6, ensuing.

☞ We are much obliged to the Editor of the Methodist Protestant, for the following, which appears in a late number of his paper.

Whitehead's Life of Wesley.—There are many of the families of our Church who have no one of the several biographies that have been written of that distinguished servant of God, Rev. John Wesley. We see by a late number of the Western Recorder, that Bro. Bassett has a supply of the above work, which he proposes to sell at a low price. It is well worth the patronage of our Western brethren, and we hope Bro. Bassett will meet with a ready sale for all he has on hand. We also are well supplied with the work, and shall be happy to fill orders from our own and sister states. We make this reference, however, that those of our Western readers who may not see the Recorder, and have no opportunity of procuring the work from us, may avail themselves of the privilege of securing it from Bro. Bassett.

JOSEPH C. NEAL, ESQ.

This talented, and highly esteemed gentleman, late editor of the Saturday Gazette, Philadelphia, whose sudden death was chronicled a week ago, is much lamented by his brethren of the press. At a meeting of these, it has been determined that an unostentatious monument be erected to his memory. The following touching sentiments appear in the last number of Neal's Saturday Gazette, and are from the pen of the gentleman who was the coadjutor of the deceased, and who is now his successor, in the charge of that fine paper.

Our Late Friend.

We are sitting in the same room, and at the same table, where we have so often sat with our lost friend, Neal. His ink-stand is before us, with the pen laid across, as was his custom. A piece of his MS. lies as he left it; the close, fine hand as distinct as ever. Probably one of the last things he did was to write that manuscript. His chair is there too, calling up many pleasant memories. There he was accustomed to place his hat, and yonder his cane. All the familiar places are here,—but he is not! We miss his morning salutation as we enter the room: we miss his cheerful smile: we miss the eloquent tones of his voice. We look up from our paper, with the old habit; but he is not in his accustomed seat. Silent, empty, desolate that old arm-chair stands. The apartment is the same, and yet different. The shell is here, but the soul has fled. Where is the fund of anecdote that enlivened our morning's work? Where the wit that set us in a roar? Where the genial philosophy, that, like a fructifying stream, made the path it traversed a "way of flowers?" Where are the jokes that dropped from his mouth as pearls did from the child in the fairy tale? Oh! if the spirit could ever return to earth, it would gladden us to think that it occasionally sat in that old arm-chair, invisible and yet present; not palpable to the touch, and yet filling our hearts with pleasantness as of old!

He is gone! The wind steals in at the casement, rustling the silent manuscript he has left, and we look up suddenly, but he is not there. There is a light, quick footstep coming up the stairs, and, before we think, we have turned at the familiar sound, but it is a stranger. A letter from some far-off state, comes through the Post-office, addressed to him; and we discover curselves handind it over to the accustomed place, when, all at once, we remember he is gone. Yes, he is gone. Gone in the prime of his days; in the moment of his matured usefulness; in the hour when, as we fondly hoped, his health was returning and his happiest days in store. He has not left us for a day; he has gone on no summer journey; but silent and unattended, he has descended into the dark valley, and passed to that "bourne whence no traveller returns." Others survive, of less apparent usefulness—but who shall judge the ways of Heaven? There is an inscrutable purpose in this visitation, which, though our finite intellects fail to perceive it now, will some day be made apparent. There is a power above—a good and beneficent power—who sees not as we see; and, perhaps, he has garnered up our friend to preserve him from "many sorrows." Who can say?

> "The good die young,
> While they whose hearts are dry as summer dust,
> Burn to the socket."

Maysville Church Difficulty.—The Methodist Episcopal Church in Maysville, Kentucky, having some time since divided on the question of adhering North or South, the parties went to law as claimants respectively, for the church property. We learn by the last number of the Western Christian Advocate, that after protracted delay, the Court has announced its decison, giving the property to the M. E. Church South. And yet, the Advocate says, not one dollar was ever contributed towards erecting the church, by any member of the Church South in Maysville. So soon as the decision was announced, the members of the M. E. Church, determined to erect a new house of worship, better than the old one. The Advocate thinks that the Maysville public will liberally aid them, from a conviction of the injustice of the decision. We know not so well the merits of this Maysville case, but we have long since been aware that some difference exists between law and justice, in certain cases. When the separation of the Methodist Protestants from the M. E. Church took place, some years ago, the former, who had in various places in this State been principal contributors towards the church property, left all behind, and with the aid of a sympatising public, erected churches de novo. This was the case in the city of Cincinnati, in 1828.

Masses for O'Connell.—Great ceremonies have been had by the Roman Catholics at St. Louis, on occasion of the death of Daniel O'Connell. The Cathedral was dressed in black drapery, and with much 'solemn trifling,' in the way of priestly manœuvering, 'mass for the dead' was celebrated, and a contribution taken up to pay for masses for the departed soul! The Bishop afterwards pronounced an eulogium upon the illustrious deceased.—He represented O'Connell as without a parallel for virtue and piety. He said that during a period of 30 years he had heard mass every day, and partaken of the holy communion every Sunday. He had in one instance turned aside. He had "unfortunately" said the bishop, "joined one of those secret societies which the church forbids," but he separated himself from it, and became so strictly devout, that at the funeral of Cobbett, he refused to enter a Protestant Church, but steadfastly remained without! Bishop Kenrick recommended all to pray that the spirit of the departed O'Connell might pass, unscathed by purgatorial fires, straight to the presence of God.

Rev. Asa Shinn.—We are happy to be able to state, that this venerable brother is again at home with his family in Allegheny City, after a long protracted affliction. Several brethren have written us that he is again amongst them, greatly "improved in mind and body." Our own heart was made glad with the intelligence several weeks ago. But we feared lest we should act prematurely in making the announcement. Let the prayers of his many friends, & of the church, still be offered up, for his permanent restoration. Just at this time, as the Conferences are approaching, we would remind our friends in the several Districts, that a remarkable series of afflictions and calamities has, within a few years visited Br. Shinn, and his family. They should therefore remember him, liberally.

Death of Rev. Orange Scott.—The last number of the Olive Branch, announces the death of this excellent man, the principal founder of the Wesleyan Connection in America. He died at his residence, at Newark, N. J., on Sunday, August 1, and his remains were taken to Springfield, Massachusetts and interred, beside those of his first wife. The True Wesleyan containing the announcement, has not yet come to hand.

☞ The items following, by Brs. Morrison and Brown, should have been published before, but were unintentionally omitted through oversight. The first error named by Brother Morrison, was in the copy; the second is ours.

Correction.

Br. Bassett: I see two errors in the Discourse on Church Government, in the 39th No. of the Western Recorder. The first is where it reads, 'by the request of Matthew, James and John.' This should be, 'the mother of James and John.' The second is, preceding the quotation: 'Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands,' &c., for 'Deut.' read Dan. 2d, 34, 35.

Freeport, Ia., July 10, '47. S. MORRISON.

Heaviest Pork Yet.

☞ Rev. G. Brown sends us the following, and says that it can be relied upon; as almost any amount of testimony can be produced to confirm it.

Levi Leonard, of Ashtabula county, Ohio, killed a hog in March, 1847, two years old, over eight feet from the end of the snout to the end of the tail—over six feet around the body. The weight was 723 pounds! Br. Bassett, can any of your pork men beat this? Huzza for the Yankees. I was present and saw the animal killed.

July 14, 1847. REUBEN HERRICK.

Hoaxed.—Professor Mitchel, Director of the Cincinnati Observatory, having been appointed General, by the Governor of Ohio, and having to superintend the fitting out of the new regiment of Ohio volunteers, containing we presume, about 1000 men in ten companies, a Cincinnati paper perpetrated an announcement of the facts in rather scientific style. From this has originated the following scientific news item, which is gravely going the rounds of the newspapers of the country.

New Cluster of Stars.—The Cincinnati Herald states that Professor Mitchel, has discovered a new cluster of stars to which he has given the name of Becchoide. Their appearance is singular. They are of a blue tinge and emit an unsteady light. They seem to revolve in a spiral orbit. They are sub-arranged into ten distinct agglomerations, which are still further subdivided. The number of stars in this cluster is about one thousand, but their celestial situation is not described.

Herald of Truth.—We have received the August number of this interesting Journal. We have not had time to enjoy our usual treat in its perusal, but see that it contains numerous articles on interesting topics. Among these are several, of particular interest to Western readers, as, Lake Commerce; Description of the Grand River Country, Michigan; and Dr. Buchanan's Lecture on Progress. Those who like to read close thinking, intellectual writers, will be fond of the Herald. L. A. Hine, Editor, Cincinnati. Yearly subscription, $3. Eighty pages in each number.

Sears' Magazine.—We have received the August number, containing pictorial descriptions of the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee and Kentucky, with eleven engravings. An interesting work, published by Robert Sears, New York, at $1,50 per annum.

Religious Telescope.—This is the organ of the United Brethren, published weekly at Circleville, Ohio. The Telescope has lately commenced a new volume, with new type, Rev. D. Edwards is Editor. He makes it a useful paper. It is stated in the first number of the new volume, that 126 new subscribers were received during the week previous. We are glad that our neighbor gets along so well. Wish our friends would do as well for the Western Recorder. Perhaps they will, when we come to commence a new volume.

There is a happy medium between a settled, severe gravity and gloom, and frivolity, levity and mirth, which young Christians should strive to cultivate.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor: Your correspondent, "Decency Prudencia" from Green County, Pa. appears to have run the thing considerably 'into the ground,' in his last effort on the use of the "noxious weed," and was there a more accomplished or approved author on genteel politeness than Chesterfield, I would unhesitatingly say that he had read it. Although he may be a "regular reader" of the Recorder, I hope he is not a member of the Methodist Protestant Church, and if he is, I am sorry he should harbor such opinions of the "superintendent and lusty delegate," as to "eject the surplus liquid at short intervals against window blinds, clock case, or other furniture," should they be the inmates of a "Baptist or Presbyterian family," while in attendance at the session of the coming Annual Conference, to be held at Waynesburg, Pa. It is a very fortunate thing for the "superintendent and lusty delegate" that this "Decency" man was born in the 19th century. Not only fortunate for them but fortunate for the Church, (the Methodist Protestant,) and I might say, fortunate for the success of religious liberty. Because, should he not have been born, and just at the time he was, and should things have turned out just as they have, the Methodist Protestant Church would be doomed to its last gasp at the winding up of the ensuing Annual Conference of the Pittsburgh District,—for had he not issued his "Bull" to the "superintendants and lusty delegates," of the Pittsburgh District, the only remembrace of Methodist Protestantism would have been the "holes burnt in their carpets, or tobacco spittle on the partition walls."

Now, however much these things are carried on in the "little capital" of Green County, Pa. I know not, but I would advise Mr. "Decency" that should he apprehend any danger in his "parlor" from the "surplus liquid" of "pig tail," to request the committee of reception to send him no "superintendant or lusty delegate," to partake of his hopitality who has the least smell of the "noxious weed" about him.

Hear him in conclusion. "We throw out these remarks, hoping as it comes from this quarter, it will be heeded. That circuits will have an eye to this matter in selecting delegates, and ministers take the hint in time."

Now I would say to all ye "lusty delegates" who intend to be present at the ensuing Annual Con. to be held in Waynesburg, and ministers also, prepare to drop your quids. Ye moving smoking "volcanoes"—stop your "craters." "Decency Prudencia," of Green County, Pa. has issued his Bull, that any thing in the shape of a man, supporting the dignity of a "superintendent" or "lusty delegate," in attendance at the Waynesburg Conference, who shall be guilty of "boring" any person whatsoever in said town, by ejecting from their "craters" any "surplus liquid" upon any "window blind, clock case or other furniture," while in such attendance, or shall look like a "city black-leg," or mimic a "volcano," or shall cause any "urchin" to crawl through any "filthy fluids" (while its mother is getting dinner,) which may be collected on the floor, in puddles, shall suffer the penalty of being "very badly bored" by being compelled to read another of his most interesting communications in your valuable publication, the Western Recorder.

Respectfully, A DELEGATE.

Pittsburgh District, Aug. 4, 1847.

A Question.

Mr. Editor: If you please, I will ask our wise sons of Divinity, through the Recorder, the following question: If a man is a moral being, and immoral is the opposite of moral, is man or any moral being capable of an immoral action? If you think this question worth a place in your paper, sign my name, SAMBO.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Fruits of the War.—The Jonesboro Whig has the following direct and sufficient answer to the question, "What harm has the War done?"

"Col. Wm. B. Campbell's 1st regiment of Tennessee volunteers numbered 1,000 brave men on the march to Mexico. Only 350, rank and file, of this gallant regiment, returned with their Col. to their homes.

"Col. Wm. T. Haskell's 2d regiment of Tennessee volunteers numbered 1,040 on their march to Mexico. Only 360 of these gallant men, rank and file, returned with Col. Haskell to their homes and friends—their wives and children—their fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, and other relatives and friends.

"The rest of them—thirteen hundred and thirty—sickness and bullets, disease and shot, and swords, have consigned to an early grave in a foreign land, from their native homes, without coffins and winding sheets, or headstones to tell who they are or where they are. Poor fellows! mournful and vacant are many loved homes and firesides; but the sleeping dead know it not.—They repose beneath the burning sands of an inhospitable clime, promiscuously thrown together; and there they must rest in quiet till the last loud trump calls the nations of the earth to stand before the God of Armies!"

Government Slave Auction.—On the 13th of July, 1847, in the city of Washington, D. C., two Christian women were sold as slaves on the account of the United States Government. The Marshal's notice states that one negro woman, named Elizabeth, about the age of sixty years, and one negro girl, named Caroline, about the age of twenty-one years, had been seized and levied upon as the property of Henry Miller, and would be sold to satisfy Judicial No. 22, in favor of the Postmaster General, and Judicial Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, in favor of the United States, and against said Henry Miller. The sale took place as notified. There was a good deal of competition among bidders, but benevolence, out-bid selfishness, and these two women—professors of religion—were knocked down to some kind-hearted gentleman at $530, which sum goes into the Treasury of the United States. A strange commentary this upon the doctrine of our nation's Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created free and equal," and have an "inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.—Sabbath Recorder

Fatal Accident.—Mr. James Adams, who resided in Pearce, near Fremont street, lost his life on yesterday morning, at the "Five Mills" on the Franklin road, in the following manner:—Workmen had been engaged in making some repairs requiring that the water should be turned off. When it was about to be let on again, Mr. Adams placed himself where he could see it fall. He was warned that he was in danger, but would not come away, and was swept down the rocks, falling on his head and breaking his neck, causing instant death.

Fatal Railroad Accident.—On Friday, an accident of a fatal and distressing character occurred on the Columbia railroad, about three miles from Lancaster, Pa. As a burthen boat train was coming down, an axletree broke and in consequence one of the sections was thrown from its position over upon the north track of the road. Two men, named Edward Edwards and Thomas Williams, were killed. Very shortly subsequent to the above, an up train of burthen cars approached the wreck. The locomotive dashed against the boat, and a terrible crash was the result. So great was the concussion that the locomotive was broken into pieces, while the boat car was damaged to a considerably greater extent than it was before. Four of the cars of the up-train were thrown off the track. The escape of engineer and firemen was truly miraculous. The deceased individuals were from the State of Ohio. Their wives accompanied them, one of whom had her collar bone broken, but the other sustained but little injury. A Lancaster paper states that the men were miners of Pottsville, and left home lately for the purpose of getting married.

Lamentable Accident.—On Thursday afternoon, as the steamboat Pioneer was returning to Philadelphia from an excursion to Fort Penn, William H. Halfpenny fell overboard, and was no doubt killed by the wheel, as he passed directly beneath it. His body was recovered; a meeting of condolence held, and a subscription taken up in aid of his wife. The unfortunate man was endeavoring to regain his hat, which had blown off.

Steamboat Accident—Clerk Drowned.—The steamer Die Vernon, ascending the Mississippi, burst her steam pipe on Monday night last about 160 miles above Memphis. The passengers escaped uninjured and the boat was but little damaged. The first clerk, Charles C. Norris, becoming frightened when the explosion occurred, leaped from the hurricane deck into the river and was drowned.

Fatal Accident.—At Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, on Thursday last, Mr. William Root, whilst examining the bridge in process of erection over the Susquehanna, lost his balance and fell a distance of 20 feet—when he struck a cross timber of the false works of the bridge; and from thence 17 feet to the water below, striking upon the side of a gondola; and thence into the stream. He was immediately taken from the water in a state of insensibility, but was soon restored to consciousness, and continued to linger in dreadful agony until Sunday afternoon at half-past six o'clock, when death ended his suffering.

Serious Accident.—Mr. Hale, editor of the Elizabethtown Journal, was run over by the train of cars on the Trenton road, on Tuesday last.—He is quite deaf, and being thrown down, and both feet resting on the rail, the first pair of wheels passed over them, separating to a great extent the soles of the feet from the upper portion.

A Dreadful Accident.—An appalling accident occurred on Wednesday night about ten o'clock, in Southwark, Philadelphia. It seems that a number of young men and boys connected with the Franklin Engine company, were assembled in the vicinity of the engine house, when a young man named Joseph Coleman made his appearance among them with a fowling-piece, which he had just borrowed, and which, unknown to himself, was loaded. In handling and snapping it, it went off, with dreadful results. A young man named James McMullen had the left side of his face torn off and his jaw awfully mangled. He sprang with a sudden bound into the street, grasped at the objects around him convulsively, and died in a few minutes. Another, named Michael McLaughlin, was shot in the left breast, though not fatally. Joseph Cole was shot in the arm, but was not injured seriously. The warning is a most fearful one, as to the careless use of fire-arms.

Melancholy Accident.—The body of Edw. McQuaid, a stone cutter, at Cumberland, was found upon the pavement in front of his boarding-house on Tuesday morning. He is supposed, in a fit of somnambulism, to have fallen from the third story window.

Fatal Accident.—Mr. Halsey Carpenter was killed last Friday morning by the bursting of a grindstone, at which he was grinding, at the Diamond Hill Plain machine shop. He died in ten minutes after the accident.—Providence Journal.

Serious Stage Accident—Loss of a Mail.—The Louisville Journal, of Tuesday, has the following: Passengers who arrived at Vicennes on Monday, from the West, report the loss of the Western mail, horses, and stage coach, on Sunday night, in crossing the stream of Carlyle, Ill. The driver and passengers got out safely. The mail left St. Louis on Saturday morning, and contained every thing intended for this city, Cincinnati, and the Eastern cities.

Fearful Railroad Collision.—We learn from the Charleston Courier that a collision took place on Friday on the Columbia Railroad, near Gadsden, by which fifteen persons, nearly all colored men, were dreadfully crushed and mangled, several of whom cannot survive. The engineers, finding the collision inevitable, reversed the engines, and then jumped off, when one of the locomotives started back at a fearful rate for some distance, and finally came in collision with another train, severely injuring many others.—The locomotives were shattered to pieces.

Deaths from Punctures in Dissection.—From accurate researches it appears, that during a period of 21 years, from 1826 to 1846, 32 students belonging to the Faculty of Medicine of Paris, died of suppurative fever, rising from punctures received in dissection. It appears also, that while, during the same period, the rate of mortality was only 4 in 80, among students of law, and 1 in 75, among students of Polytechnic (Military) School, it was at least 1 in 50 among students of medicine.

Wife Killed by her Husband.—At Troy, Pa., on Thursday night, a Dr. J. B. Pierce, being awakened suddenly by the hoisting of a window by his wife, instantly seized a gun and fired.—She fell dead upon the floor. He supposed there was some one breaking into the house.

Drowned.—We learn from the Louisville Journal, that Mr. John C. Rankin, of South Hanover, Ia., was drowned in the Ohio, near that place, on Sunday evening, while bathing. His body was found on the following morning.

DEATH OF BENJAMIN F. HARRIS, Esq.—It is with deep sorrow we record the death of a gentleman, so long and so favorably known to the readers of the Gazette. Mr. Harrison, after a protracted and painful sickness of several weeks, died at his residence in Allegheny city, on Friday, between ten and eleven o'clock. All that the kind attentions of a wife could accomplish to alleviate his sufferings,—all that parental and friendly kindness could do to mitigate his sorrows, and smooth the pathway to the grave, was done. Mr. Harris was an industrious, enterprising, and amiable citizen,—faithful in all the social and business relations of life—and one who found many warm friends from his fidelity to business, and the confidence reposed in his word. He has gone to a better country—and, as we believe, prepared for the great change from life to death.

We sympathise most sincerely with the sorrowing family, in this, their time of affliction, and trust that in the consolations of a Christian faith, and the remembrance of that rest which remaineth for the people of God, they may find a balm for every wound.

Mr. Harris was at one time a licensed preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1840–41 was a Missionary among the Arkansas Indians. Since 1844, until some six weeks since, he has been a constant contributor to the columns of the Pittsburgh Gazette and for two years was one of the Proprietors of the paper.—Pitts. Gaz.

DROWNED WHILE BATHING.—Two persons lost their lives while bathing, near Brooklyn, N. Y., on Saturday. Mr. J. Gildersleeve swam a great distance from the shore and never returned. It is not known whether he perished by the cramp or by exhaustion. He was about 40 years of age and left a family. A young man, John Snediker, tried to swim too far and sank from exhaustion.

MURRAIN AND DEATH.—A correspondent at South Garden informs us that Mr. Luther Gates, of sterling, week before last, lost five valuable oxen and two cows, by a disease which some suppose to be the murrain. He assisted a physician from Fitchburg, who was examining the cause of their death, and from a slight scratch on his thumb contracted the disease, which carried him off suddenly. The physician, and another person who assisted him, it was feared had caught the disease but it yielded to seasonable medical attention. This has produced some excitement in that town. Mr. Gates was buried at midnight on the day he died.—Worchester (Mass.) Spy.

LIFE AND PROPERTY DESTROYED BY ELECTRICITY.—On Saturday last, a man by the name of James Coulter, in New Lisbon, Ohio, was struck by lightning and instantly killed. On the same night a barn, belonging to D. Brinker, about four miles north of the same place was struck, and with its contents, burned to the ground. The loss is estimated at $1,500.

SUDDEN DEATH.—We are pained to learn, from the Louisville papers, that the estimable lady of Rev. J. C. Gallagher, Rector of St. Paul's church in that city, expired on Wednesday afternoon, of apoplexy, after an illness of two hours.

ANOTHER CHURCH IN RUINS.—Between one and two o'clock, on Sunday morning, a fire was discovered in the upper part of the tower of St. Paul's Church, in the city of Rochester, New York. The destructive element raged without control, and in a short time the edifice was in ruins. The blackened walls, says the American, stand a monument of the depravity which caused the calamity, for there can be no doubt of the agency of an incendiary. St. Paul's was one of the finest church edifices in Western New York. It was of stone, in the Gothic style, and was consecrated in August, 1830. The building, from its elevated situation and fine architecture, was one of the chief ornaments of the city. Insurance $10,000—loss about $25,000.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN MAYSVILLE.—A fire broke out, on Tuesday morning last, about 10 o'clock, which consumed Catlin's large three story brick warehouse and two others in the same block.—There were 260 tons of Hemp stored in the buildings, all but a few bales of which were destroyed. Loss on the buildings, $10,000, and no insurance; loss on the Hemp, $26,000, of which $17,000 were covered by insurance, $11,000 being in the Columbus office. Several other buildings were more or less injured.—Z. Courier.

STORM AT RICHMOND.—During a severe storm at Richmond, Va., on Monday night, accompanied by violent wind, severe lightning and thunder, a large brick building, undergoing repairs, on Wall street, was blown down, falling with a crash truly terrific. A portion of the building fell on an adjoining frame building, carried in the roof, and also damaged two adjoining tenements. Being uninhabited, and the occurrence taking place late in the night, no one was injured.

CLERICAL.—Rev. R. R. Gurley has been called to the pastorship of the Central Presbyterian Church, in Washington City. Rev. Mr. McCalla has been officiating temporarily. Rev. Mr. Grier, of Philadelphia, has accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of the village of Ellicott's, Md.

MILLS DESTROYED.—On Thursday morning, the large grist mills, in the village of Hyde Park, N. Y., belonging to Messrs. Tillou & Doty, were consumed with their contents. Loss about $4,000. The mill was insured, but the grain, &c. are a total loss.

WESTERN CORN CROP.—In the Miami valley, corn has never looked so well, and never before has there been so much planted. An intelligent farmer of Clark county says that the yield this year per acre, in the Miami valley, will be at least twenty-five per cent. greater than that of last year. We doubt not that the same proportion will hold throughout the State.—Cin. Com., July, 30.

MISSIONARIES.—The American Board has sent a reinforcement to the Bombay mission, in the Goodwin, which sailed from Boston on Saturday. The individuals composing this reinforcement are the Rev. Wm. Wood, of Henniker, N. Hampshire, and Mrs. Wood, of Groton, Massachusetts, and the Rev. George Bowen, of New York city. Among the passengers in the Switzerland, at Boston, from Liverpool, are Mr. Amos Abbott, wife and five children, of Andover. Mr. A. has been for the last thirteen years a missionary at Bombay.

TELEGRAPH TO CANADA.—According to the following announcement in N. York letter of Thursday, there can now be an almost momentary communication between the citizens of Richmond, Va. and those of Montreal, Canada, and soon, of course, the same will be the case between the latter and the citizens of New Orleans. The letter says:

"Yesterday introduced the cities of N. York and Montreal to immediate communication, by means of the electric telegraph.—Balt. Sun.

The Spirit of Emancipation Abroad.

Most of our readers doubtless know that the mass of the laboring population in northern Europe are serfs, bought and sold with the soil they till, and held usually by large landed proprietors. We are glad to see that the spirit of emancipation is at length there. Recent intelligence says that M. Ruminn, one of Russia's and of nature's real noblemen, has liberated eight thousand serfs, and for a trifling rent, gives them the use of the lands on which they reside. When he came to leave these possessions, the whole eight thousand—the sick only excepted,—rushed forth to escort him with gushing hearts, to the borders of the district. When the hour of separation at length came, the concourse had swelled to twenty thousand persons, drawn together to enjoy a scene in which angels would love to blend their purest sympathies. It cannot fail to be known as an example for many other Russian noblemen to follow. Several others are known to be ardently engaged in the same enterprise, and the sovereign himself is said to lend freely his "powerful encouragement." God speed the right!

In Wallachia, a province of Bohemia, about sixty thousand slaves have recently been emancipated, including all that belonged to the State, to the clergy and all the public establishments. There remain in the province only about forty-eight thousand, "who are (held as) private property.—All hail to the spirit of the age of Northern Europe! Will free, enlightened, boastful America ever blush?

Since writing the above, we have seen and read with much interest a more full account of M. Ruminn, from the pen of Dr. Baird, in the New York Evangelist. Dr. Baird has enjoyed a very intimate personal and Christian accquaintance with M. Ruminn, first at Paris and afterwards at his residence in Russia. M. Ruminn became a Christian during a temporary residence at Geneva; at Paris he fell into the society of some excellent Christian brethren and pastors; seems to have embraced the gospel with all his heart, and to be now ready and all awake to learn and to do his whole duty. The emancipation of his serfs has been done as a deed of gospel benevolence, and as such we hail it with double joy. It is an honor not only to humanity but to the gospel of Jesus Christ. We hope the doctrine will prevail all over Europe that no man can be a Christian and live a Christian life unless he emancipates even all his serfs. We do not deem Russian serfdom half so bad and so wicked as American slavery—for it never thinks of rending families into bleeding fragments—never puts forth its iron hand to wrench the heart's dearest ties asunder—nor does it allow the master to sell his "people" as merchandise at all, unless he sells also the land they live on and all the family together. Yet let even serfdom be reprobated and expelled from the pale of Christian fellowship—from the catalogue of relations which a Christian man may sustain. And let the example of Christian men in the Greek church of Russia be a trumpet tongue of rebuke against Protestant Christians in exalted America.

Dr. Baird states that the serfs of M. Ruminn were paying him about four dollars each—for all who were over four years of age; of course the pecuniary sacrifice amounts to an annual income of some thirty thousand dollars, besides the loss on his real estate which Dr. Baird says he is about to sell on terms "as easy to the penniless serf as possible."—Oberlin Evangelist.

ICE.—Two cargoes of ice, 250 tons, have arrived this week from Maine, at Philadelphia, both of which met with quick sale to the Knickerbocker Ice Company, at $3 per ton. This ice was 21 inches thick, and as transparent as glass. Further supplies, the North American says will find eager buyers, as the stocks here are nearly exhausted. What wheat is to the west, ice water is to New England. The ocean is tributary to her wealth in the productions of the sea, while the people of near and distant lands are refreshed by the ice taken from her lakes and rivers.—A people who can live from and upon such a soil, deserve remembrance and respect for their enterpise and thrift.

AN IMPORTANT VOTE.—The House of Assembly of the Canadian Parliament last week forwarded an address to the Queen, praying that the free navigation of the St. Lawrence be granted to all nations, and that also the navigation laws be repealed, so far as they, in a manner relate to affect that colony. On Wednesday the vote was concurred in by the Legislative Council, by a large majority.

PASS IT ROUND.—Every "merciful man" who works a horse during the hot months, can promote its comfort by the use of the following simple shield against the teasing of flies. Take two or three handfuls of walnut leaves, upon which pour two or three quarts of cold water; let it infuse one night, and pour the whole, next morning, into a kettle, and boil for a quarter of an hour; when it is fit for use. Moisten a sponge with it, before the horse goes out of the stable, let those parts which are most irritable be smeared over with the liquor. Try it.

THE FAMINE FEVER.—At Qarantine, near Quebec, 656 emigrants have died, within four weeks. Last Wednesday 1,667 passengers arrived at Grosse Island in five ships—one of them from Bremen, with 326 passengers. Few sick—few deaths. The total deaths from the commencement of the season to the 17th of July inclusive, was 1,199, commencing with one death in the first week, there has been a gradual progression until the tenth week, when the number was 171.

WRANGLING.—Our political editorial friends are ever quarrelling in their papers on subjects of no moment or great moment, just as it happens. Why do they not learn from the independent press to behave themselves? Why should ill feeling be ever engendered? Does not this quarrelsome spirit work injury to families into which their papers come? Certainly, surely, truly, there is a great impropriety in editors quarrelling through the colums of their respective papers and using bad words and unfair reasoning. Such conduct leads the people astray, and should be discountenanced. We don't charge anything for this article, neighbors of the political arena.—Cin. Commercial.

THE CORN CROP.—In the Miami Valley corn has never looked so well, and never before has there been so much planted. An intelligent farmer of Clark county says that the yield this year per acre, in the Miami valley, will be at least twenty-five per cent greater than that of last year. We doubt not that the same proportion will hold throughout the State.

LITTLE MIAMI RAILROAD.—The little Miami Railroad company have entered into a contract with the manufactory near Pittsburgh, for a sufficiency of heavy T. rail to relay about forty-five miles of the track. When this is done, the distance between Cincinnati and Springfield can be safely accomplished in about three hours and a half.—Cin. Commercial.

The railroad from Madison, Ind., for Indianapolis, will be completed on the 14th of August. The rails are now laid within thirty miles of the latter place.

THE PRESIDENT AND HIS LADY.—The President's example, on his late visit to the city of N. York, was a highly commendable one. He attended worship three times on Lord's day. In the morning, in company with the Mayor, Mr. Brady; in the afternoon, with Mr. B. F. Butler, at Dr. Skinner's; and in the evening with Alderman Oliver, at the Dutch Reformed, Lafayette Place. However, from what we learn from a resident in Washington, it would have been extraordinary had his course been different; for, in regard to the observance of the Lord's day, no previous occupant of the Executive chair has exhibited such an exemplary regard for it as President Polk. He and his lady are as regular attendants on divine worship as any of the citizens of Washington, and as much stillness and quiet is maintained at their magnificent residence, as in the habitation of any private individual. No visiting is encouraged or admitted, on this day, from government officers or strangers of distinction—nothing to interfere with the religious reading and devotions of its sacred hours. The example of Mrs. Polk is worthy of all praise. No unnecessary levees or parties are encouraged by her, but a strict regard to Christian consistency is carefully maintained; very different from most of her female predecessors. No doubt the dissipated and fashionable have been wofully disappointed, and have sneered at her puritanical strictness; but the influence of such an example, in so commanding a station, is exceedingly salutary, and worthy of high commendation.

THE LONDON PEACE SOCIETY have memorialized ten different governments on the subject of the Mexican war, our own and the Mexican government, of course, among the rest. The memorial assumes the principal "that all war is inconsistent with the spirit of Christianity, and the true interests of mankind," and that all national difficulties ought to be settled by negotiation or arbitration, rather than the sword. Arbitration is always an honorable resort, when negotiation fails, and much is it to be regretted that the friendly mediation for this purpose, proffered to our government by a foreign power, was not accepted, and thus the waste of blood and treasure which has ensued, prevented.—Watchman of the Valley.

Catholic Sunday Proceedings.

The exercises at the laying of the corner stone of the new Catholic Church, which is to be erected on Sixth street, beyond Mill Creek, upon the property of Captain Moore, took place on Sunday. Three bands of music were in attendance, playing such tunes as Bonaparte's march. The Marshals were on horseback. The procession was very large, indeed, and was followed by an immense crowd of men, women and boys.—Bishop Purcell delivered the oration, which, had the performance been upon any other day, would have been very appropriate and interesting.—We do not know what others think of these Sabbath proceedings; but we regard them as ill-timed and unnecessary—showing a contempt for the views, opinions and feelings of the Protestant community, which regards the Sabbath in a light very different from the Catholics.—Queen City.

A CONGRESS OF NATIONS.—It is proposed that a congress of representatives from all commercial countries should assemble at Brussels, in the kingdom of Belgium, during the month of September next, to take into consideration the question of the influence of free trade and protection upon the relations of nations, and their mutual interests. Already many distinguished representatives from England, France, Germany and Italy have given notice of their intention to take part in the discussions, and an invitation to the citizens of this country to be present by their representatives has been given. This invitation to persons of all opinions on this subject comes from the Belgium Free Trade Association, and is presented through the Belgium commissioner at New York, we are informed by the Evening Post.

DROWNED.—In the Ohio river, near Louisville on the 14th ult., Thos, Byrnes and Saml. C. Wood, eldest sons of Silas Wood, Esq., of New York City.

ASTRONOMICAL.—The comet, discovered by Board, of Cambridge, and, as it now seems, previously discovered in Europe, can be seen with very moderate telescopic power. Every body knows "the dipper" in the Great Bear, 2 of the 4 stars composing it being "The Pointers." At 10 o'clock in the evening cast a glance from the dipper towards the pole star, and two stars of the third magnitude will be seen, which are in the tail of the Dragon, and a little above it to the left of the upper star, Kappa Draconis, the comet will be easily found. It has a short, scrubby tail extending upwards, and rather towards the right hand.

Calamities of Genius.

Homer was a beggar; Plautus turned a mill; Terence was a slave; Boethius died in gaol; Paul Borghese had fourteen trades, and yet starved with them all; Tasso was often distressed for a few shillings; Bentivogolio was refused admittance into an hospital he had himself erected; Cervantes died of hunger; Camoens, the celebrated writer of the Lusiad, ended his days in an alms-house; and Vaugelas left his body to the surgeons to pay his debts, as far as it would go. In England, Bacon lived a life of meanness and distress; Sir Walter Raleigh died on the scaffold; Spencer, the charming Spencer, died forsaken and in want; and the death of Collins came through neglect, first causing mental derangement; Milton sold his copyright of Paradise Lost for fifteen pounds, at three payments, and finished his life in obscurity; Dryden lived in poverty and distress; Otway died prematurely, and through hunger; Lee died in the streets; Steele lived a life of perfect warfare with bailiffs; Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield was sold for a trifle, to save him from the gripe of the law; Fielding lies in the burying-ground of the English factory at Lisbon, without a stone to mark the spot; Savage died in prison at Bristol, where he was confined for a debt of eight pounds; Butler lived in penury, and died poor; Chatterdon the child of genius and misfortune, destroyed himself.

BE ACTIVE.—The body was made for use. Every part of it is formed for activity. But any thing made for use will suffer injury to lie still. The human body, especially, if suffered to remain inactive, becomes useless. Activity strengthens the parts. If you would have more strength, you must use what you have, and it will increase. The right use of your members, also, must be learned by practice. Much practice is necessary, for instance, to train the fingers to the various uses in which they are to be employed, so as, (to use a homely phrase,) to make them handy. The body, likewise, needs exercise, to keep it in a healthy state. The various parts of its machinery have a great work to do, every day, in turning your food into blood, and sending it a great many thousand times, in a vast number of little streams, to every part of the body. But this machinery will not work, if the body is all the time inactive. It requires motion, to give it power. There is nothing, therefore, so bad for it as laziness. It is like a dead calm to a wind-mill, which stops all its machinery.—Rev. Harvey Newcomb.

Notice.

The fifth Session of the Muskingum Annual Conference Methodist Protestant Church, will be held at Youngstown, Mahoning county, Ohio; to open on the 1st day of September next, at 9 o'clock, A. M. A brother, competent to the work, has been solicited to conduct the opening exercises; who, we hope, will consent so to do. As Brother Gee's letter, in the Recorder, removes all reasonable apprehension of any difficulty in getting suitable entertainment, it may be expected, as it is much desired, that ALL, both Ministers and Laymen, will be in attendance; and that, too, at the opening of Conference. Come, brethren, cheer us with your presence! Let not the distance keep any away. GEORGE CLANCY, President.

Indiana Conference.—Inasmuch as the next Session of the Indiana and Wabash Conferences was appointed to commence at the same time, and being not far distant from each other, it is thought advisable that Indiana Conference change the time of its Session. I believe there is no provision in our Discipline in reference to this matter; and where there is no law there is no transgression. After having consulted about three-fourths of the members of Conference, and the District Committee, I am requested to publish to all, whom it may concern, that our next Session of the Indiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, will commence the twenty-ninth of September next, at Johnson's meeting-house, 7 miles West of Shelbyville, Shelby county. We earnestly solicit aid from sister Conferences. T. SHIPP.

COLUMBIAN FOUNTAIN.—Will the editor please inform us if Br. Wm. Whitney has left Washington City? We have repeatedly written to him, but obtain no answer.

The P. M. at La Grange, Ia., notifies us that C. Isbel has left the country, and that his paper is not taken out. He has had the paper more than a year, and paid nothing. The multiplicity of such cases has long since convinced us that the value of an agent to us, is not determined by the number of subscribers obtained, but the amount of payments collected.

The P. M. at Richie c. h. Va., notifies us that J. M'Gregor refuses to take his paper from the office. He is indebted for about 3 volumes. Hope he will pay up, and we will discontinue then, if he desires it.

Br. Ragan, G. P. is wrong when he says that he did not receive the paper after we became its editor. Almost half of vol. 7, was sent him, before it was discontinued. This may have been included in the note he gave Br. Foster, for Br. Springer's claim. Much obliged for your faithful attention.

The Law of Newspapers.

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered wishing to continue their subscriptions.

2. If the subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publishers may continue to send them till all cash charges are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their papers from the offices to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled their bill, and order their paper discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the paper is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The Courts have decided that refusing to take a paper or periodical from the office, or removing and leaving it uncalled for, is "prima facie" evidence of intentional fraud.

Liabilities of those who take Periodicals.

Thes law declare that any person, to whom a periodical is sent, is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office or persons with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a Post Office, Store, or any other place of deposite,, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the Postmaster, Storekeeper, &c., are responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or informs the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

HYMENIAL.

POETRY.

PRAYERS FOR ALL MEN.

BY VICTOR HUGO.

My daughter, go and pray; see, night is come:
One golden planet pierces through the gloom;
Trembles the misty outline of the hill.
Listen! the distant wheels in darkness glide—
All else is hushed; the tree by the road side
Shakes in the wind its dust strewn branches still.

Day is for evil, weariness, and pain.
Let us to prayer! calm night is come again,
The wind among the ruined towers so bare
Sighs mournfully; the herds, the flocks, and streams,
All suffer, all complain; worn nature seems
Longing for peace, for slumber, and for prayer.

It is the hour when babes with angels speak,
While we are rushing to our pleasures weak
And sinful, all young children, with bent knees,
Eyes raised to heaven, and small hands folded fair,
Say at the self same hour the self same prayer
On our behalf, to him who all things sees.

And then they sleep. Oh, peaceful cradle sleep!
Oh, childhood's hallowed prayer! religion deep
Of love, not fear, in happiness expressed!
So the young bird, when done its twilight lay
Of praise, folds peacefully at shut of day
It's head beneath its wing, and sinks to rest.

Pray thou for all who living tread
Upon this earth of graves;
For all whose weary pathways lead
Among the winds and waves;
For him who madly takes delight
In pomp of sinking mantle bright
Or swiftness of a horse;
For those who, laboring, suffer still;
Coming or going—doing ill—
Or on their heavenward course.

Pray, though, for him who nightly sins
Until the day dawns bright—
Who at eve's hour of prayer begins
This dance and banquet bright;
Whose impious orgies wildly ring,
Whilst pious hearts are offering
Their prayers at twilight dim:
And who, those vespers all forgot,
Pursues his sin, and thinketh not
God also heareth him.

Child! pray for all the poor besides!
The prisoner in his cell,
And those who in the city wide
With crimes and misery dwell;
For the wise sage who thinks and dreams;
For him who impiously blasphemes
Religion's holy law.
Pray thou—for prayer is infinite—
Thy faith may give the scorner light,
Thy prayer forgiveness draw.

GET UP EARLY.

Get up early! Time is precious,
Waste it not in bed;
Get up early! while the dew drops
O'er the fields are spread.
Get up early! when the red sun
First begins to rise;
Get up early! when the darkness
Fades from earth and skies.

Get up early! It is sinful
To be wasting time;
Get up early! while the dear birds
Sing their morning chime;
Get up early! while the flowers
Blush upon the sod;
Get up early! while all nature
Blesses Nature' God.

Get up early! And prepare ye
For the long day's toil;
Get up early! if ye labor
To improve your soil;
Get up early! if a rhymelet
Be your task to write;
Get up early! oh ye lazy,
And feel as I do—RIGHT!

To Paul Pry.

MR. EDITOR:—Please permit me, once more, to address our friend Paul Pry; and say; Br. Pry, you will excuse me, when I inform you, that, you in your last reply to J. H., remind me of a sportsman in search of game, who discovers something move in the bush—says there is a prize, and fires at the lump; but when with hasty steps he approaches, he finds nothing—a leaf, which the wind had agitated, had raised his expectations—nothing else. So I conclude my Br. Paul, you have misapprehended the subject—taken a wrong aim—and acquired nothing.

The first thing to be determined in the matter between us now is, who are members of the Methodist Protestant Church, and who are ministers. If Br. Pry will examine the constitution and discipline, he will find, if I mistake not, there is, throughout, a clear distinction preserved between the ministers and members. In no instance, that has fallen under my notice, is a member called a minister, nor a minister termed a member of this church. The phrases—"members of our church"—"our people," &c., is not known among us. We are, however, apt to be misled by things familiar. Influences sometimes fasten on us from sources little suspected. I do not accuse Br. Pry of knowingly being tinctured with Episcopacy; but may he not, from associations which have insidiously infused into him the idea common in another church, of lay preachers and ministers, in contradistinction to ITINERANT MINISTERS, have been induced to draw the conclusion, that the unstationed ministry and the lay membership occupy the same grounds, while the others, occupy that, more elevated. That what I have said relative to the distinction between the ministers and members of the Methodist Protestant Church, is correct, see the preamble to the constitution, page thirteen. Third edition of the Methodist Protestant Constitution and discipline. See Elementary principles, pages fourteen and fifteen. Items 5, 8, 9, and 10, see constitution, Article 1st, items 2, and 3, Article 3, item 3, Article 4, items 2, and 3, Article, 6—see the whole constitution and discipline, where the voting of ministers and members is alluded unto. The whole demonstrates that the framers of the constitution of the M. P. Church, determined to draw a line between the ministers and the members of the church; and that the unordained persons, associated with her, should not be called ministers; and that those who have been ordained should be known by the appellation, not of members, but of ministers. In no place, either in the constitution or discipline, so far as my acquaintance with them extend, is a minister ever termed a member, except of a Quarterly, Annual, or General Conference, but he is always called by his proper name—"a minister." I here intend no disparagement to the laity—not at all. These things premised, I turn my attention to Art. 12, of the constitution, to which I am, by Br. Paul Pry, respectfully referred; and I there find the precise language, as quoted by Br. Paul—"shall be entitled to vote in all cases." Very extensive—very—Let me see how it will work. If it works well, courteousness will require that I, cheerfully, "acknowledge the corn;" but if it does not, no "corn" for Br. Pry, yet. To test it, say, here is a committee of trial, called to try an accused brother, either lay, or ministerial. That this a "case," or state of things, none, I presume, will, doubt. A minister, or white lay member, other than the committee, of the requisite age, happens to be present. At the moment the committee, by vote, is about to decide the fate, or the "case" of the accused, he steps forward, and says, I vote in favor of the brother under censure! What would the committee think of so great imprudence? Again, here is a Quarterly Conference now in session. Some important "case" is to be determined by vote. A minister from an adjacent circuit, and a white lay member of the same circuit in which the Conference is held, but not a member, are present; they claim that they are "entitled to a vote in all cases," and, as the "case" before the Conference is to be determined by vote, they will cast their votes in favor of the "case." Would not the Conference quickly desire their speedy withdrawal? Once more; here is an Annual or General Conference in session. Some absorbing "case" has been patiently and lengthily argued. The question is now called for: the "case" is now about to be, by solemn vote, decided; when an unstationed minister, not a representation, steps within bar, and reads aloud from Article 12, "Every minister," &c. "shall be entitled to vote in all cases." He continues, none of you doubt that which has been discussed, is a serious "case;" and since I am a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, I have the right "to vote in all cases," I, therefore, will, by my vote, oppose the measure. Would not every person present begin to suspect the mans' sanity? Hence, I conclude, Br. Pry has mistaken the meaning of Art. 12, and that it only means that a minister, preacher, and white lay male member of the age of twenty-one years, shall be entitled to vote in all cases where others of the same station have the right to vote, and in no other cases whatever. Universals contain particulars, but particulars do not include universals is a rule; and notwithstanding this voting "in all cases," may, at first view, seem to be a universal proposition, yet upon a slight examination, if I mistake not, it will be found only to be particular. I therefore conclude, that there is a clear distinction between ministers and members of the Methodist Protestant Church, carefully preserved throughout the whole constitution and discipline; and that the rights of each are clearly defined, so far as voting is concerned; and that no member has a right to vote, only, as prescribed, neither has any minister the right to vote, only, as it is clearly set forth in other portions, besides Article 12, of the constitution. Bearing in mind that "lay member," does not mean a "minister," and that "minister" does not imply a member of last said church, in any portion of the constitution or discipline, I respectfully refer my Br. Paul to the pages of the discipline, viz: 54, and 55, to which he so kindly cited J. H., for proof that Paul Pry is in error.

Br. Paul Pry may save himself his merry mood, by considering how easy a "case" it is for a printer, in setting so many thousands of type, unintentionally to make an author look very ridiculous.

I am pleased, Br. Pry, to discover you are disposed to do ample justice to every department of the church.—I am still of the opinion that all that is requisite to promote the desired change in the formation of the Electoral Colleges, is to convince my brother that the present usage is opposed to the rights of any.

Permit me to subscribe myself the friend of Paul Pry. J. H.

Narrative.

Evil Overcome by Good.

[Extract from "Travels through North and South Carolina, Georgia, East and West Florida, the Cherokee Country, &c., by Wm. Burtram;" a scientific gentleman, who undertook the tour at the suggestion of Dr. Fothingill of London, in 1773.

Among his many interesting adventures, he relates the following, which is strikingly illustrative of the principles of safety to be found among even the most savage, if they are met in a spirit of peace and brotherhood, and not of hostility and defiance.]

"I had now passed the utmost frontier of the white settlements on the border. It was drawing towards the close of the day, and nothing had appeared to ruffle the happy moments of evening contemplation, when, on a sudden, an Indian appeared crossing the path, at a considerable distance before me. On perceiving that he was armed with a rifle, the first sight of him startled me, and I endeavored to elude his sight, by stopping my pace and keeping large trees between us; but he espied me, and turning short about, set spurs to his horse, and came up in full gallop. I never before this was afraid at the sight of an Indian, but at this time I must own that my spirits were very much agitated. I saw at once, that, being unarmed, I was in his power; and having now but a few moments to prepare, I resigned myself entirely to the will of the Almighty, trusting to his mercies for my preservation; my mind then became tranquil, and I resolved to meet the dreadful foe with resolution and cheerful confidence. The intrepid Seminole stopped suddenly, three or four yards before me, and silently viewed me, his countenance angry and fierce, shifting his rifle from shoulder to shoulder, and looking about instantly on all sides. I advanced towards him, and with an air of confidence offered him my hand, hailing him brother. At this he hastily jerked back his arm, with a look of malice, rage and disdain, seeming every way disinterested; when again looking at me more attentively, he instantly spurred up to me, and with dignity in his look & action, gave me his hand. Possibly the silent language of his soul during the moment of suspense (for I believe the design was to kill me, when he first came up) was after this manner: "White man, thou art my enemy, and thou and thy brethren may have killed mine; yet it may not be so, and even were that the case, thou art now alone, and in my power. Live! the Great Spirit forbids me to touch thy life. Go to thy brethren, tell them thou sawest an Indian in the forest, who knew how to be humane and compassionate." In fine, we shook hands, and parted in a friendly manner, in the midst of a dreary wilderness; and he informed me of the course and distance to the trading-house, where I found he had been extremely ill-treated the day before."

On reaching the trading company, and relating his adventures on the road, particularly the last with the Indian, the author goes on to say that the chief replied, with a countenance that at once bespoke surprise and pleasure, "my friend, consider yourself a fortunate man. The fellow is one of the greatest villains on earth, a noted murderer, and outlawed by his countrymen. Last evening he was here, we took his gun from him, broke it in pieces, and gave him a severe drubbing. He, however, made his escape, carrying off a new rifle gun, with which he said, going off, he would kill the first white man he met."

The reflections of the author, on contemplating the behavior of this Indian towards him, so soon after his ill-treatment, are that "the moral principles, which direct the savages, to virtuous and praise-worthy actions, must be innate—they not having the assistance of letters, or those means of education, in the schools of philosophy where the virtues, sentiments, and actions of the most illustrious characters are recorded and exhibited—or they must be under the immediate influence and guidance of a more divine and powerful preceptor, who, on those occasions, instantly inspires them, and, as with a ray of divine light, points out to them at once the dignity, propriety, and beauty of virtue."

What Constitutes an Efficient Ministry?

(A DIVINE CALL.)

Having shown the importance and some of the proofs of a Divine call to the Gospel ministry, we will continue the subject by referring to the nature, or rather the evidences of such a call to the person called. This is the more necessary, as it, like every other truth, is frequently abused, either by ignorance or corruption, and it is of the utmost importance that all who in any way are exercised in mind concerning their duty in this respect should be enabled to judge whether they are moved by the Holy Ghost or some other influence. In this, as well as in every matter pertaining to religious duty, no one need be deceived. The path of duty is plain to him who is willing to know it. "To the upright there ariseth a light in the darkness." But to the nature or evidence of this call.

It is a spiritual call; the Holy Spirit by deeply impressing upon the mind the worth of souls, and then opening the solemn and weighty truths of revelation to the understanding, moves the individual to feel and act for their salvation. So vived and powerful is the impression sometimes, that it absorbs every other interest, so that the person thus impressed feels willing to sacrifice everything else, could he thereby be instrumental in saving his fellow man. If he yields not, the impression weighs on his spirit like a mighty burden, from which he can obtain no relief. It troubles him by day and night, awake and asleep. He seeks relief in prayer, but his unwillingness to yield now assumes the form of guilt, and he finds no access. He resorts to the Bible and the Sanctuary for comfort, but both condemn him for his disobedience; he urges privately his excuses; the Lord removes them, either by his providence, or by a direct impression on his mind; he considers the dangers, crosses and responsibilities of the work, and again shrinks back overwhelmed with sorrow, crying out with Jeremiah, "O, Lord God, I cannot, for I am a child;" or with Moses, "Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel?" God says, "say not I am a child; for thou shalt go to all that I send thee:—I am with thee to deliver thee," &c. In this manner he is stripped of every objection, and left on his own responsibility, either to obey or disobey.—Should he still persist in his unwillingness to obey, he is chastised, either by the withdrawal of the Divine presence, bodily affliction, loss of property, or his way is hedged up in business.—By this course many have been chastised into obedience who had long resisted the influence of the Spirit.

The above are some of the exercises usually experienced by those who are truly moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the gospel. We say some of the exercises; because Divine Providence is not limited to precisely the same form of proceeding in every case, but varies according to the circumstances of the individual, the degree of stubborness to be overcome, &c.

While we contend for a call to the ministry by a divine influence on the mind, we are far from believing that it is safe to yield to, or follow every impulse or impression. These may originate from various causes; such as too great an estimate of our own abilities, a temptation, the desire of friends, a false estimate of the nature of the ministerial office, and a desire to be ranked among the prophets. Thousands, no doubt, prompted by one or other of these motives, have indulged in impressions to preach, until they have persuaded themselves into the belief that they are divinely appointed to this sacred office. Such, generally, are more anxious to obtain authority to preach than their brethren are to authorize them, and far more difficult to deal with, than those who are really called to the work, reminding us of the forcible language of the poet—

"How ready is the man to go
Whom God has never sent;
How timid, diffident and slow,
God's chosen instrument."

Should a person have impressions to preach, he should, first of all, submit the whole matter to God, and seek by faith and importunate prayer the divine direction, and then expect the revelation of God's will, in a manner, too, that will not deceive or lead astray. Whenever the Lord enjoins a duty, he will invariably assure the mind of it. Yet the evidence of a call to the ministry is not generally given immediately. The mind is variously, and sometimes severely tried. This may be for the purpose of giving a more assured evidence, and better prepare the mind for its arduous work.

In seeking an evidence of a call, much dependence should be placed on the leadings and openings of Providence. The God of Providence and Grace is the same, and no impression will be made on the mind by the Holy Spirit without a corresponding call in the Providence of God.

Hence the propriety of observing the call of Providence as confirmatory of the Spirit's call. We should not indulge mere impressions, unless they correspond with the Word and Providence of God: in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established. By a careful comparison of our impression with God's word and providence, we may know assuredly what the mind of the Lord is concerning us. Gifts, grace and fruit, will be necessary to evidence to others that we are not mistaken in our call.

On the above we make two remarks.

1. A divine call, and an assured knowledge of that call, are indispensably necessary to render our ministry efficient. Without this we cannot exercise that fearless, yet humble boldness which is necessary to insure success. Without it we will be timid and vascillating, shunning every thing that is trying to nature. The want of an assured knowledge of a call to the work is the cause of so many men-pleasing, popularity seeking, ease-loving, and cross-shunning men in the ministeral ranks. O, did all who now profess to be ministers of Christ, but preach under a full knowledge of a special, divine appointment, how soon would the Church be aroused from her slumbers! Brethren in the Ministry, let us seek a renewel of our commission, and carry it with us, deeply engraven on our hearts, whenever we enter the sacred desk to administer the word of God to dying men.

2. If a divine call is absolutely necessary to constitute a man a minister of Jesus Christ, how careful should the Church be, in authorising men to handle the word of life. Much harm has resulted by admitting uncalled and unworthy men into the ministry. They have, in many instances destroyed more than double their number can rebuild, besides filling places that might be filled with those who would be useful. The Church should learn from the past to be more careful in licensing men to preach. She neither needs nor wants men in the ministry who are not divinely appointed. No matter whatever else they possess, if they are deficient in this, they lack the first essential element in the formation of efficient ministers, and have no more right to the title of gospel ministers than Dathan and Abiram had to the priest's office in the days of Moses.

A GENTLE HINT.—Some years ago, before the introduction of the Croton water, a wealthy citizen of New York had occasion to send his coachman for a pail of water. John refused to fetch it, alleging that it was not his business, but that of the house-maid.

"And pray, what do you understand to be your business?" rejoined his master.

"To take charge of the horses, and drive the carriage, sir."

"Well, do you harness the horses directly, and bring the carriage to the door."

When the carriage drove up, its owner ordered Mary, the house-maid, to take her pail and get in, and the fastidious coachman was compelled to drive her to the pump—stop for her to fill her pail—and then drive her back again!

The lesson, it is needless to say, was never forgotten.—Anglo Saxon.

Twenty Lives Lost.

Destruction of a Packet Ship by an Iceberg.

The strong, substantial Packet Ship "Eulalia," belonging to St. Sebastian, while on a passage from Havana to Galway, was overwhelmed by an iceberg. She had thirty-seven passengers (a great many of whom were females) on board, with a crew of sixteen, including the master.—She was a fine looking vessel, barque rigged, of three hundred tons burthen, and was laden with a cargo of miscellaneous articles. Her voyage was favorable till she made latitude 42, 18 north, longitude 52, when she met with a heavy field of ice. This occurred on the morning of Friday, the 21st of May. The master, observing the perilous state of the ice, bore the ship round, and attempted to clear it, but this was found impossible, and about nine o'clock a tremendous iceberg struck the ship amidships, cutting her down to the water's edge. The shock was fearful, and the terror and dismay of the passengers painfully great. Not a moment was lost in lowering the boats and placing the passengers in them, for on the pumps being sounded, the ship was found to be fast filling.

The crew lingered on board at the pumps, in the hope of keeping her afloat, but were compelled to make a hasty retreat, the ship reeling over on her beam ends and instantly sinking.—Two boats, containing the captain, fourteen of the crew, and fourteen passengers, succeeded in getting clear of the wreck, but the third, with twenty persons in it, most of whom were women, was drawn down with the vessel, and every soul perished. The boat, it appears, was fastened to the wreck by a rope, which the crew, in their fright, had forgot to unship, and it was impossible to cut it, the passengers having no proper implement. On the following day, at five o'clock in the evening, the remaining boats were picked up by the schooner "Newport," belonging to Stockton, and their crew taken on board, which vessel reached Galway on Monday last. The loss of the "Eulalia" and cargo is estimated at £25,000.—Phil. Dol. News.

DROWNED.—On Saturday, the 3d inst., a Mr. John Stahl, a resident of this county, about 6 or 7 miles east of this place, was drowned in the Scioto river, at Chillicothe, as we learn, in a state of intoxication; a vice to which he had formerly been addicted, but from which he had been reclaimed for some time back. On the day of his death he was enticed by a son of Bachus to Chillicothe, and there persuaded to drink, was overcome, and his death was the result. When will the community learn to cease licensing men to murder their fellow-men? The man that enticed him to drink, and the one that sold him the liquor, must both appear before the bar of God as partakers in the guilt of that man's death.—Religious Telescope.

WAR STEAMERS.—The keel of one of the large Government war steamers was laid at the Brooklyn Navy Yard on Saturday. Her length between perpendiculars will be two hundred and ten feet breadth of beam twenty-seven feet, depth of hold twenty-three feet. Messrs. Brown & Bell, one of the most famous ship builders in New York, are now constructing a steam ship-of-war for the Peruvian Government. She is seven hundred tons burthen, and will be supplied with an improved marine engine of five hundred horse power. Her armament will consist of two sixty-four pounders, and four twenty-four pounders, which our government has been wanting. Our countrymen have built five steamships for Russia, Mexico, and other nations, and before the last four new ones are done, we shall have a specimen in the Pacific.

CHURCH DESTROYED BY LIGTNING.—On Sunday at 4½ o'clock, during the thunder shower, the German Lutheran Church, (St. Paul's,) at the corner of Brown and St. John streets, was struck by lightning and destroyed. The electric fluid, attracted to the steeple, passed into the interior of the church at its base, and the fire communicating with the organ, which was situated immediately under it, the whole of the southern portion of the building with the steeple, was in a blaze in a short time. The wind at that time blew violently, and the roof, with the steeple, was soon enveloped in a mass of flame, the latter falling into the church, adding greatly to the conflagration and to the destruction of the interior. Very little of the inside has escaped injury or entire destruction, and of the very handsome church, with its bells & clock, but little remains except the walls.

Two organs, with the greater portion of the Church furniture, were destroyed. There had been Divine service during the afternoon, the congregation having been dismissed some ten or fifteen minutes previous to the catastrophe. We were informed that several persons, with the sexton, lingered behind, and had only quit the place a moment or two before the fluid took effect.

The Church, with the furniture and the organs, cost between twenty-one and twenty-two thousand dollars. The loss is, however, partly covered by an insurance for $8,00 on the building, and $1,-200 on the clock and bell.—Philad. Doll. News.

GREAT FLOODS SOUTH.—The region around Natchez was visited by the most destructive flood on the 11th inst. which ever occurred there. The damage cotton sustained by it in Mississippi and Louisiana is immense. The countries east of said Places to the Carolinas, were also visited by tremendous floods about the same time.—Cincinnati Commercial.

MARINE DISASTERS.—The New York Journal of commerce has been favored by Capt. Wm. Thompson, Marine Surveyor, with a list, carefully compiled by him, of vessels which left this country for Europe between October 1st, 1846, and July 23d, 1847, and which were either lost, abandoned at sea, or compelled to return or put into some port for relief. It does not include those that threw overboard a part of the cargo, or which were so slightly damaged that they were able to pursue their voyage. They number 133, among which we find the names of 24 from Baltimore and 5 from Norfolk.—Baltimore Sun.

HEALTH OF THE CITY.—As we have frequently before stated, there has been no foundation for the alarming rumors of the existence of Asiatic Cholera in this city. An eminent physician informs the Signal that the city is unusually healthy at this time—and that it is free from cholera, small pox, or "any other itemized epidemic."—Cincinnati Commercial.

FACTORIES BURNED.—An India-rubber factory in Roxbury, Mass., was struck by lightning during Thursday afternoon, and mostly consumed; damage about $2,000. Lewis & Co. occupied the upper stories of the building for the manufacture of hosiery, gloves, and other woollen goods. Their machinery and stock was damaged to the amount of about $4,000 to $5,000. On Tuesday evening last, the woollen factory belonging to Meacham & Taylor, in the village of Marcellus, New York, was consumed by fire, together with some 10,000 lbs. of wool. The whole loss is estimated at $10,000—some $4,000 of which was insured in the Onondaga Company Mutual.

CHURCH STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.—Singular Preservation.—The Unitarian Church, recently erected in Ware, Massachusetts, was struck by lightning during a shower about 5 P. M. on Wednesday. The fluid struck the spire, which converged to a point more than a hundred feet high—shattered it to fragments, ran down the inside post of the tower, splitting it throughout, entered the basement, and followed the stove pipe its whole length, and went out at the opposite end of the building. In the basement, which is used as a vestry, were some eight or ten ladies, who had met as a sewing circle, and though the fluid passed the whole length of the room, and within eight feet of them, none of them were seriously injured.

FATAL CATASTROPHE.—Alderman Fletcher, for the Coroner, on Thursday of last week, held an inquest two and a half miles below Gray's Ferry, on the Baltimore Railroad, on the body of an unknown white man, supposed to be about 35 years of age, who was run over by the train of cars from Baltimore and killed, about two o'clock in the morning. His right leg was cut off below the knee joint, and also the toes of his left foot. The crown and right side of his head and the cheek below the right eye were cut, bruised and larcerated, and his body dragged by the cars the distance of fifty yards. He was dressed in summer cloth drab coat and pantaloons, blue mixed vest, white shirt, flannel undershirt, black cloth cap, neckerchief of white and purple stripe, and long boots. A small amount of American coin, and an Ein Thaler piece were found on him, and a card, upon the back of which was written, "T. Williams, Buttonwood street, between Ninth and Tenth, No. 132." One or more of the passengers thought his name was McLaughlin,—and that he was from Pittsburg. It is stated that he jumped from the cars, previous to which he said to a passenger, that he was afraid some one would injure him, from which, and his manner, it was supposed that he was laboring under derangement of mind.

The body was subsequently identified by his brother to be James McLaughlin, of Pittsburg.—The deceased was a trader, and was returning from Baltimore, whither he had been on business, for the purpose of making arrangements to settle permanently in this city. His wife and three children are living at Pittsburg, and were momentarily expecting to be summoned to join him here.—Philadelphia Dollar Newspaper.

Cadets of Temperance.

The above is the name of an order now in existence, intended for boys between 12 and 18 years of age. Mr. Johnston, editor of the Hillsborough Gazette, has written to the Deputy Grand Patron of the State, and has obtained some of the general features of the order. It is calculated to act in connexion with the order of the Sons of Temperance. The general features are these:

"We will neither make, buy, sell, or use as a beverage, spirituous or malt liquors, wine or cider, nor will we use tobacco."

Nine officers are elected from their number. They elect from the Sons of Temperance a Worthy Patron, who appoints two deputies, to preside at the meetings, and see that the business is done in a proper manner. They have their own passwords, initiatory ceremonies, &c. The initiation fee is from 25 cents to $1,50, according to the age of the applicant.

When a person arrives at the age of 18 and becomes a regular Son of Temperance, he is entitled to $2 from the Section. The dues are regulated by the Section, but cannot be less than two cents a-week. No person can become a member without the written consent of his father or guardian, or who uses profane language.—Clermont County Sun.

What a Pair of Andirons Cost.

BY PETER PIPER, JR.

Peter, said my uncle, knocking the ashes from his pipe and laying it on the corner of the mantelpiece, and then fixing his eyes on the andirons, Peter, those andirons cost me one thousand dollars.

Dear me! exclaimed aunt.

Oh, Father! cried the girls.

Impossible! said I.

True, yes, every word true. One thousand, did I say? yes—two thousand—full two thousand dollars.

Well, well, said my aunt, folding up her knitting for the night. I should like to know what you are about.

My uncle bent forward and planting his hands firmly on his parting knees, and with a deliberate air, which showed that he had no doubt of being able to prove his assertion, he began:

Well—you see, a good many years ago, we had a pair of common old iron andirons. Your cousin Letty said one day, Father, don't you think those old andirons are getting too shabby? Shabby or not, I thought they would hold the wood up as nicely as if they were gold. So I paid no attention to Letty. I was afraid she was growing proud. Soon after that, Peter, continued my uncle, turning to me, your aunt took it up—

There goes, interrepted my aunt, you can't get along without dragging me in.

Your aunt took it up, Peter, and she said our neighbors could afford brass andirons, and were no better off than we were. And she said Letty and her sister Jane were just getting old enough to see company, and the stingy looking old andirons might hurt their market. I knew that women would have their own way, and there was no use in objecting, and so I got the andirons. The price of them was four dollars and a half—

Ah! that is more like it, cried my aunt. I thought you said two thousand!

Four dollars and a half. Well, the first night after we got them, as we all sat by the warm fire, talking over the matter, Letty called my attention to the hearth, the stones of which were cracked and uneven. The hearth was entirely out of keeping with new andirons and I thought I might as well have it replaced first as last. The next day, a mason was sent for to examine it. He came in my absence, and when I returned home, your aunt and cousins all beset me at once, to have a marble slab. The mason had convinced them the hearth would not look decent without a marble slab, and they put their heads together—

La me! exclaimed my aunt, there was no putting any of our heads together about it. The hearth was a real worn out thing not fit for a pig pen.

They put their heads together, Peter, as I was saying, and continued till I got a marble hearth, which cost me twenty dollars at least. Then I thought I was done with expenses, but I thought wrong. Pretty soon, I began to hear sly hints thrown out about the brick work round the fireplace not corresponding with the hearth. I stood out for a month or two against your aunt and the girls, but they at length got the better of me and I was forced to have marble instead of brick. And then the old wooden mantelpiece was so out of character that it was necessary to have a marble one. The cost of all this, was nearly one hundred dollars. And now that the spirit of improvement had got a start, there was no stopping place. The new marble mantle put to shame the old white-washed walls and they must be papered. The wood work had to be painted, of course and to prepare it for paint, sundry repairs were necessary. While this was going on your aunt and the girls appeared to be quite satisfied, and when it was done, they had no idea the old parlor could be made to look so spruce. But there was only a short respite. The old rag carpet began to raise a great dust, and I found there would be no peace—

Now my dear! said the old lady, with a pleasant smile, accompanied with a partial rotation of the head—

Now Father! exclaimed the girls.

Till I got a new carpet. So the new carpet was got. That again shamed the old furniture and it had to be turned out, and replaced with new. Now Peter, count up, my lad—twenty dollars for the hearth, and one hundred for the mantle, and thirty for repairs. What does that make?

One hundred and fifty, uncle.

Well, fifty for paper and paint—

Two hundred.

Then fifty for a carpet, and one hundred and fifty for furniture—

Three hundred and fifty.

There's that clock, too, and the blinds—fifty more—

Four hundred dollars exactly.

My aunt and cousins winked at each other and steadily in my uncle's face, as if to say you have not made out your case after all.

Now, continued my uncle, so much for this one room. No sooner was the room finished, than complaints came from all quarters about the dining room and entry. Long before this I had surrendered at discretion, and handed in my submission. The dining room cost us two hundred dollars, and the entry two more. What is that, Peter?

Eight hundred, uncle.

Then there were the chambers—at least four hundred more, to make them rhyme with those down stairs.

Twelve hundred.

The out side of the house then had to be repaired and painted of course. Add two hundred for that.

Fourteen hundred.

Then a piazza in front. That cost two hundred.

Sixteen hundred.

Here, aunt began to yawn, Letty to poke the fire, and Jane to twirl over the leaves of a book.

A new carriage came next. That cost two hundred dollars.

Then there was a lawn to be laid out, and neatly fenced—a servant to be hired—parties to be given occasionally—bonnets and dresses at double the former cost, and a hundred other little expenses in keeping with the new order of things. And all this grew out of those very andirons. Yes, Peter, I was entirely within bounds when I said it was two thousand dollars.

The opposition was silenced. My aunt immediately rose and guessed it was bed time. I was left alone with my uncle, who was not inclined to drop the subject. He was a persevering man, and never gave up what he undertook until he had done the work thoroughly. So he brought out his books and accounts, and set about making an exact estimate of expenses. He kept up until after midnight before he got through. His conclusion was, that the pair of andirons had cost him twenty-four hundred and fifty dollars.

LINES,

Suggested by hearing the Death of Edwin M. Langdon.

Ever varying, ever fleeting,
As the visions of our sleep,
Are the scenes that o,er life's pathway,
Cast their lights—and shadows deep.

Now, the brilliant prospect flatters,
And we hope life's sorrows few;
But the storm, as it darkly gathers,
Proves hope's promises untrue.

To-day fair forms are gliding round us,—
Loved ones cheer our hearts and homes;
But another day may find us
Bowed in sorrow o'er their tombs.

Dear Edwin's friends—thus have they bowed,
In sorrow, o'er his early bier:
O, keenly have their full hearts felt
The grief that prompts the burning tear.

Well may they weep for one whose youth,
For future years promised so much:
With aim unerring often thus,
Death's fatal arrow points to such.

We knew him well—we weep with those Whose hopes are crushed, whose hearts are riven;
Twice have they drunk from sorrow's cup,
The bitter draught to mortals given.

But tho' they weep, their grief is not
The dreary sadness of despair;
For they've a mansion in the skies,
And their loved ones are garnered there.

They'll meet again—in that bright world,
Where sorrow's tear no eye shall dim;
There mingle with the heavenly hosts,
And songs of praise together hymn.

Discord in the Church.

Mr. Editor:—To undertake, in this day of light, to prove that slavery is a sin against God, and a plain violation of the Divine law, appears to me, would be an insult to common sense. For, almost every page of the Bible, either condemns oppression, or sins that grow out of it, or are concomitant with it. The very policy by which God governs the world, is sufficient proof of his abhorance of the present system of slavery: equal justice to all, peculiar lenity to none, the high, as well as low, rich and poor, white and black, stand alike responsible to Him; except as their situations alter their circumstances. Yes, says Peter, "Verily now I perceive, that God is no respector of persons; but in every nation, he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him." And how men, with the Bible in their hand, and the love of God in their hearts, can plead, or apologize, for such a system of wickedness; or remain silent, and by so doing encourage the unrighteous difference that is made in many churches, between their white and black members: is a problem too hard for me to solve.

But is it not equally as strange, that men, with the teaching and example of our Saviour before them, can leave the (in other respects) church of their choice; and especially, when they are allowed the liberty of conscience, and secured in the right of expressing their opinion?

Now I admit that the position the Methodist Protestant Church stands in to slavery, is no very enviable one, but the broad foundation of Gospel liberty is there laid, and if the superstructure, that is built thereon is not in every respect right, why not tear it down, and make it so? And besides, that very instrument, makes it the duty of every one to oppose all moral evil. What, is it more corrupt than the Jewish Church was when Christ came? And did Heaven secede from it? If so, when and where? Nay, he only re-established it on its former foundation, the Prophets, and Apostles, himself being the chief corner stone. Did he remain silent amidst the corruptions of the Church, or sanction their wicked practices? (What a bright example for a Christian Minister.) He stands unmoved, plainly, yet kindly, pointing out their sins and consequences. But again, does their secession loose the oppressors chain or restore the slave to his rights? If so, I would say, Amen, but it is evident they only tie their own hands, and lose their influence over the slave holder. Now, if all would remain and candidly discuss the question, from present appearance we soon would have a sufficient number in favor of a change in our black laws, and we could then move on. It would be well for those who talk of leaving, to consider whether or not, that step, would not retard the very object they wish to advance. United we stand, divided we fall, (the friends of the slave.) And certainly no one can think of shifting off responsibility, by such a step: nay, every member of the church, and nation too, is responsible before God for the continuation of this sin, and we can only clear our skirts by standing to our posts, and discharging our duty. Oh! if the church would but unite her efforts, slavery, war, and every thing that militates against the Redeemer's Kingdom, should be put down. And then would the inhabitants of the rock sing, and their shout be heard from the top of the mountains.

Yours, for the truth,

S. DILLEY.

Things, I don't like.

Mr. Editor:—I have observed in your paper, articles under the head of "Things I do not like." I am disposed, also to mention some things I do not like; and which have, I have no doubt, annoyed you, as well as others; for I think they are not confined to one house, or are local in their exhibition, and that the abandoning of the practices, would contribute to the comfort of society. I do not like to see people in a house of worship, take the first seat in a slip, nearest the aisle, and make every other one clamber over their persons, who may want to occupy a seat in the same slip. This, I am sorry to say, is a very rude, and selfish practice; too common in houses of worship, especially by females, to whom it is more inconvenient than to the male part of the congregation, because of the extravigant breadth of their clothes at present. I have seen a whole slip filled, by each one in succession, taking the nearest unoccupied seat to the aisle. How can people call themselves polite, who do such things?

I dislike very much to see MEN or boys defile the place which they occupy in a house dedicated to the worship of GOD, by spitting their tobacco juice over the floor, to the manifest discomfort of all around them, and the injury of the premises, as well as making additional labor for the sexton. Surely if people knew how much they annoyed their neighbors, they would omit the filthy practice while in such a place.

I do not like to see fashionable LADIES stop in the door, or on the steps, to salute, or converse with their acquaintances, while the congregation is coming out of the house; and all behind them must wait for their movement. Certainly people may be called genteel who do such things, but can hardly be said, to be polite.

At some future time, I may mention some other things. AN OBSERVER.

Sketches by Rev. A. McGuire.

NO. VI.

Having returned home from Dayton the 6th of July, 1828, I got ready to start for Madison, Ia., by Thursday the 19th. I had but 37½ cents at my command. When I was about to start, my wife insisted that I should leave her 12½ cents; I did so: and after commending my affectionate companion and children, in prayer, to the care of our heavenly Father, I started, with humble confidence that the Lord would provide for, and take care of me and mine. I reached Cincinnati that day, preached there in the evening, and went home with Brother Shinn, and in conversation with Sister Shinn, I made known to her that I had but 12½ cents to bear my expenses, for I had paid one-half of what I started with for horse feed, and ate no dinner that day. Next morning Brother Shinn came into my bed-room early, and said, "Brother, my wife tells me that you have only 12½ cents to bear your expenses to Madison. Here is three dollars and a half, which the Madison brethren gave to pay my passage up in the steamboat, and the Captain would not charge me any thing; and now I will give it to you, (putting it on my knee,) it will bear your expenses down." I did not want to take it, but he insisted: and thus the good Lord provided for me.—O, thought I, if the brethren could only sympathize, and feel for the cause of God, as the ministers do, how easily and pleasantly we could get along. O, Lord, save us from covetousness, which is idolatry. On Friday, 10th, rode to Lawrenceburgh, intending to preach there, provided I could get a congregation,—was recommended to call at old Brother Gibson's,—did so, and told him who I was, and what I was. He said it made no difference with him; if I was a servant of God, I was welcome to stay with him. I proposed to him to have an appointment. He thought it was too late, but said he, there is a large class to meet to-night, and we will go to that and I will introduce you to the leader, as a travelling preacher, and he will give you the hymn book and class paper, and, go ahead. So I met the class, and we had a glorious, happy meeting. Set off the next morning, rode forty miles, and put up with an E. Methodist, whose name was Kerns, and whose son-in-law was a travelling preacher, and was absent on his circuit; his name is Cornelius Ruddle, with whom I was well acquainted; yea, he was my nursing father, when I first embraced religion. He is one of the excellent of the earth, a son of thunder; I met with him at one of his meetings while on this mission, and he told me that he intended to leave the Methodist Episcopal Church and join in with us, so soon as his year was up; and so he did. Next morning I asked for my bill, and it was 43¾ cents, the amount of the books I had let him have the evening before; this was the first time I had been charged for a night's entertainment by a Methodist, but it was not the last. I set off and reached Madison about 11 o'clock. I enquired for Mr. McIntire, and was told that he was at the Presbyterian Church; I rode on and went in, and found a seat near the pulpit. The minister, Mr. Johnson, preached a short sermon, and while they were singing the last hymn, I stepped up the pulpit stairs, and told him who I was, and requested him to give out for me to preach at four o'clock, if the house could be had; he cheerfully complied. I then was introduced to Brother McIntire and several other brethren, who expressed great joy that I had come, for they were indeed as a flock of sheep without a shepherd, and said they had been anxiously looking for me, ever since they had been informed of my volunteering in their behalf. The time arrived—the church was full—the Presbyterian minister and two or three Methodist ministers and a Restorationist preacher were in attendance. I had the divine aid in a good degree, while I tried to preach from, "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." Great attention was paid, and I believe the word was not in vain. I was so unwell I had to cease laboring until Thursday 16, there was an appointment made for me ten miles from town. Being some little better, I set off in company with Brothers McIntire, Wilson, and T. Doyle. I preached with liberty to about fifty or sixty, then read the Articles, and compared them with the old Discipline, and gave out to preach there again on the next Thursday, and requested the people to reflect on what they had heard, until then, and make up their minds, for I intended to beat up for volunteers to enlist under the banner of Christian Liberty. Brother Chitwood a local preacher, agreed to give out a train of appointments for me to attend the next week; so we returned again to Madison, and on Friday night, we had a general class-meeting. I rested on Saturday, and on Sunday 19, rode out four miles, and preached to a very attentive audience. Preached again in the evening, in town, in the M. E. Church.

Ministers' Department.

A Reproof.

The officiating clergyman of a certain congregation in this city was absent some years ago from his usual place of ministration, but had secured the promise of a sermon from a brother preacher in his stead. At the time of service the congregation assembled, and the strange brother, instead of taking his seat in the pulpit, occupied the pew of the regular pastor. Presently a veteran brother in Christ, who had suspended preaching for some years, being superanuated, came in, and surprised at finding the pew occupied instead of the pulpit, went to the preacher who was to officiate, and inquired why he was not in his place. The young man hesitated a moment, stammered out an apology, and said that the truth was, he had been hindered by circumstances from making satisfactory preparation, and felt ashamed to preach before such an audience unless he were more fully prepared. The old man said not another word, turned away and slowly walked to the pulpit, went through the usual preliminary services, and announced his text in a clear and distinct voice—"I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, &c." The sermon was one of great impression, and the young minister learned a lesson which he probably never afterward forgot.—M. Protestant.

Dont Flatter a Minister.

Every one remembers the story of the preacher who upon being told that he had preached a fine sermon, said to the person who complimented him,—"Brother, the devil told me that, before you did." Dr. Fuller has an improved version of it or something that very forcibly illustrates the same idea, which he told in an admirable manner. A minister having preached effectively, was accosted in very complimentary language by several leading members of his congregation—

"That was strong doctrine," said one.

"Very faithfully set forth," said another.

"An excellent sermon you gave us to-day," said a third.

The good man lifting his hand in a beseeching manner, said with earnestness "Cast no more sparks this way, brethren—I carry gun powder here," at the same time laying his hand upon his heart. It would be well for us all to remember the moral—both preachers and people.—Ib.

The Gay Young Sportsmen.

On one occasion, when Rev. Mr. Brown, and others, were assisting a brother minister in services preparatory to the celebration of the Lord's Supper, which services in Scotland usually take place on the last day of the week preceding the "sacramental Sabbath," and are frequently held in the open air, a couple of gay young men had been out hunting, and on their return drew near to the large congregation who were listening at that moment to the preaching of an eloquent, but somewhat showy divine. After standing a few moments, the one said to the other, "Did you ever hear such preaching as that?" 'No,' he replied with an oath, "but he don't believe a word of it." After this preacher had closed, there stood up in the "tent," (a temporary pulpit erected in the open air for the accommodation of the ministers,) an old, humble-looking man, who announced his text in a trembling voice, as if he were afraid to speak in God's name. He went on, and became more and more interesting, more and more impressive. The young men were awed, and listened with reverent attention to the close, when one, turning to the other, said, "And what d'ye think of that?" "Think of it," he replied, "I don't know what to think. Why, didn't you see how every now and then he turned round in the tent as if Jesus Christ were behind him, and he was asking, "Lord, what shall I say next?"" This preacher was John Brown, the secret of whose pulpit eloquence was, the inspiration of an humble and contrite heart, touched by the finger of the Almighty: an eloquence as far transcending that of the mere orator, as the divine and heavenly, transcends the human and earthly.

Luther's Marriage.

Catharine Von Bora, was a beautiful girl, of noble birth, who having fallen in love with a poor student of Muremberg, had been condemned by her parents to the cloister. Escaping, with eight of her companions, after some years, she took refuge at Wittemberg. Here, Luther, became attached to her. Yet, with a sense of justice, rather unusual in a lover, he wrote to the Nuremberg student—"if you desire to obtain your Catharine Von Bora, make haste before she is given to another, whose she almost is. Still she has not yet overcome her love for you. For my part I should be delighted to see you united."

The student not responding to this offer, Luther married her. In this union he was most happy—the details of his domestic life are full of sweetness and tenderness.

GREECE.

From a letter of Mr. King, dated April 16, the following extract is taken:

A week ago last Sunday was the Greek Easter. On that day, the Greeks have been accustomed, I am told, to burn in effigy the traitor Judas. Out of respect to the feelings of one of the Rothschilds who happened to be here, or for some other reason, the government gave orders that this should not take place. In consequences of this it was reported among the people that a Mr. Pacifico, a Jew residing at Athens, and who was formerly Portuguese Consul in this place, had paid a certain sum of money to the police in order to prevent the burning of Judas. This so enraged them that a mulitude rushed to his house, broke his doors and windows, entered his house, broke his furniture in pieces, and threw it unto the street, seized as a prey his money and plate, while his family in vain implored their pity. Mr. Pacifico himself contrived to make his escape, and found refuge in the house of the British Ambassador. This took place about three o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Pacifico is mentioned in the Minerva as a peaceable honorable old man.

During the feast of Eastor it is customary for the Greeks to fire guns and pistols, day and night, in every part of the city. This gives an opportunity to evil-minded persons to do harm undiscovered, and even to take life. This year three were killed, one man and two women, as is stated in some of the papers; and others were wounded. In my own house a person standing at the window was wounded in the shoulder by some one who, passing by, fired a pistol.—The wound was apparently from the wadding, and not from a ball. An order from the government was, I believe, publicly read, prohibiting the firing of guns and pistols at Easter; but no other means were used, that I know of to pevent it. The firing usually commences on Friday, continues on Saturday, but is greatest on Saturday night and on Sunday. On Tuesday it ceases.

Broosa.

Mr. Schneider has recently made a visit to the infant churches at Nicomedia and Ada Bazar. He was much encouraged by what he saw and heard, particularly at Nicomedia. In respect to the latter he says, "Taking into view the Armenian population of the place, the progress of the truth has been as great, if not greater, than at the capital. God will doubless perfect what he has begun in a manner so promising."

Syria.

The admission of John Wortabet, a pupil in the former seminary, to the church at Beirut was mentioned in the last Herald. Under date of April 12, Mr. Thompson says: "He is a promising young man, and we hope to see him a preacher of the gospel before a long time shall have elapsed. He has given up the practice of medicine, in which he has been engaged during the last year and a half at Tripoli, and has commenced the study of theology. We hope he may be ready to accompany any new missionaries to Aleppo, or wherever a new mission shall be established." Mr. Thompson also states that several other persons are candidates for admission to the church. The Arabic congregation at Beirut is represented as quite interesting.

Ceylon.

Mr. Meigs, in a letter dated March 10, says that the government agent of the province is very friendly to the mission. "He has lately made a donation of thirty pounds to Mr. Poor, to build a new school room at Tillipally for a select school of girls; and he has offered twenty-five pounds to assist in erecting small village churches." He also subscribes ten pounds a year to the Bible Society."

Another letter of Mr. Meigs, March 19, announces the death of Mr. Whitlesey. This painful event occurred at Dindigul, March 10, after an illness of only a few days. Mr. Whitlesey had been in feeble health for some time, and had gone to the continent for its improvement; at Dindigul, however, he was seized with an inflammatory fever, which terminated his life. "The mission," says Mr. Meigs, "has sustained a great loss; and so has the cause of missions to the heathen."

Choctaws.

From a letter of Mr. Wright, dated at Wheelock, May 18, it appears that seventy persons were added to the church at that station by profession, in 1846.

Cherokees.

Mr. Willey, writing from Dwight, April 30, says that seven persons were admitted to the church at that place on profession within about a year preceding the date of his letter; and two others were candidates for Christian fellowship.

Abenaquis.

A letter from Mr. Osunkhirhine, May, 22, states that two persons had been examined for admission to the church, and two backsliders had been reclaimed. There are twelve or fourteen children in the school who are making commendable progress in their studies.

Miscellaneous.

The Prayer of Habakkuk.

It is said of Dr. Franklin, that during his long residence in Paris, being invited to a party of the nobility, where most of the court and courtiers were present, he produced a great sensation by one of his bold movements and gained great applause for its ingenuity.

According to the custom of that age and country, the nobles, after the usual ceremonies of the evening were over, sat down to a free and promiscuous conversation. Christianity was then the great topic. The church was always ridiculed, and the Bible was treated with unsparing severity. Growing warmer and warmer in their sarcastic remarks, one great lord commanded, for a moment, universal attention, by his asserting, in a round voice, that the Bible was not only a piece of arrant deception in religion, but totally devoid of all literary merit. Although the entire company of Frenchman nodded a hearty assent to the sentence, Franklin gave no signs of approval. Being, at that time, the court's favorite, his companions could not bear even a tacit reproof from a man of his weight of influence. They all appealed to him for his opinion. Franklin, in one of his peculiar ways, replied that he was hardly prepared to give them a suitable answer, as his mind had been running on the merits of a new book, of rare excellency, which he had just happened to fall in with, at one of the city book stores; and as they had pleased to make allusion to the literary character of the Bible, perhaps it might interest them to compare with that old volume the merits of his new prize. If so, he would read them a short section. All were eager to have the doctor read a portion of his rare book. In a very grave and sincere manner, Franklin took an old book from his coat pocket, and with great propriety of utterance, read to them the following poem:

"God came from Teman,
And the Holy One from Mount Paran.
His glory covered the heavens,
And the earth was full of his praise.
And his brightness was as the light;
He had horns coming out of his hands;
And there was the hiding of his power.
Before him went the pestilence;
And burning coals went forth at his feet.
He stood and measured the earth;
He beheld, and drove asunder the nations;
And the everlasting nations were scattered:
And the perpetual hills did bow;
His ways are everlasting.
I saw the tents of Cusham in affliction;
And the curtains of the land of Midian did t remble.
Was the lord displeased against the rivers?
Was thy wrath against the sea,
Was thine anger against the rivers?
That thou didst ride upon thy horses,
And upon thy chariots of salvation?
Thy bow was made quite naked,
According to the oaths—thy word;
Thou didst cleave the earth with rivers;
The mountains saw thee and tremblel;
The overflowing of the water passed by;
The deep uttered his voice,
And lifted up his hands on high.
The sun and the moon stood still in their habitations;
At the light of thine arrows they went,
At the shining of thy glittering spear.
Thou did'st march through the land in indignation;
Thou did'st thresh the heathen in thine anger.
Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people,
Even for the salvation with thine Anointed;
Thou woundest the head of the house of the wicked,
By making naked the fountain to the neck.
Thou didst strike through with thy staves the head of his villages;
They came out as a whirlwind to scatter me;
Their joy was to devour the poor secretly.
Thou didst walk through the sea with thy horses,
Through the deep of great waters!
When I heard, my bowels trembled;
My lips quivered at the voice;
Rottenness entered into my bones,
And I trembled in myself,
That I might rest in the day of trouble;
Then he cometh up to the people,
He will cut them to pieces with his troops.
Although the figtree shall not blossom,
Neither shall fruit be in their vines;
The labor of the olive shall fail,
And the fields shall yield no meat;
The flocks shall be cut off from the fold,
And there shall be no herd in the stalls;
Yet, I will rejoice in the Lord,
I will joy in the God of my salvation.
The Lord God is my strength,
And he will make my feet like hinds' feet
And he will cause me to walk in high places."

The poem had its effect. The admiring listeners pronounced it the sublimest thing they had ever read or heard. "That is pretty," said one. "That is sublimity," said another. "It has not its superior in the world," was the unanimous opinion. They all wished to know the name of the new work, and whether that was a fair specimen of its contents.

"Certainly, gentlemen," said the Doctor smiling at his triumph, "my book is full of such passages. It is no other than your good-for-nothing Bible, and I have read you the prayer of the prophet Habakkuk."

Let every reader learn wisdom from this incident, and learn to appreciate the unequaled sublimities of the Bible.—Ladies' Rep.

STELLAR ASTRONOMY.

American Institute, May 20, 1847.

The following extracts are translated by M. Meigs, Esq., of New York, from the Lecons Professees of the distinguished astronomer, M. Arago.

M. Arago has designed to publish these Lessons in the Revue Scientifique et Industrielle, and their appearance was awaited with great solicitude; for no man, now existing, is believed to be more capable than M. Arago, to delight mankind by the exactness, as well as high reach, of his knowledge.

As soon as his design was known, he was offered fifty thousand franks for the copy-right; but he has declined this, and now intends to perfect his Lessons and leave them as a precious inheritance to his heirs.

Therefore, the present Lesson is the only one to be expected for some time, and this is just published in the Revue Scientifique for April, 1847.

Mons. Arago's Lessons are dated at the Observatory of Paris, and this one is edited by F. Moigno, by the consent of M. Arago.

"Lesson—Stellar Astronomy.

We count, in the northern hemisphere, 3,400 stars, visible to the naked eye. And, for the purpose of counting, we proceed in this way: thro' a narrow slit, corresponding with the meridian of the place of observation, we look attentively and note the stars as they gradually appear. The following approximate calculation will give an inferior limit to the number of stars visible with the powerful instruments of which we have the use.

Observation has demonstrated, that the number of the stars of the second magnitude is triple that of those of the first magnitude; that those of the third magnitude is triple that of those of the second magnitude. In a word, that in general to obtain the number of stars of any given magnitude, we must multiply by three the number of stars of a preceding magnitude.

Let us, then, admit this law to the fourteenth magnitude—to stars which the most powerful instruments render visible: as the number of stars of the first magnitude is eighteen, then the number of stars visible by the naked eye, and with telescopes as far as the fourteenth magnitude, will be about twenty-nine millions; and if to these twenty-nine millions we add those of the thirteenth and twelfth magnitudes, &c., we obtain the number of forty-three millions of stars.

Herschel, in that part of the heavens occupied by the knee of Orion, in a band of fifteen degrees long by two degrees wide, has distinctly counted fifty thousand stars. And as that band is only the three hundred and seventy-sixth part of the celestial vault, the entire surface of the heavens must contain fifty-eight million seven hundred and fifty-five thousand visible with the telescope. And as we must remark, in a great many regions of the heavens the stars are much closer together, and that, with our telescopes, we only reach the least distant celestial spaces and the stars least remote, we must recognize the fact, that the first estimate of their numbers is infinitely far from the truth; and that, admitting one visible star in each square minute, we must have a number of distinct stars amounting to one hundred and forty-eight million five hundred and seven thousand two hundred stars, and yet remain much below the truth. There are, then, one hundred and forty-eight millions of stars, and our sun is one of them only. The mass of our earth is but the three hundred and fifty-fifth millionth part of that sun; that we are but an atom in relation to the earth; that the place we occupy then is infinitely small, and we more than infinitely little.

Comparative Intensities of the Light of Stars of Different Magnitudes.

There is in science a great and much to be regretted blank; photometry, or the art of measuring the various intensities of light, is still in its infancy; we have hardly taken the first step.

The division of the stars by the order of their magnitude, was made by the astonomers of antiquity in an arbitrary manner and without any pretension to exactness, and this vagueness is continued in our modern charts. Those which are accredited now, present a total table of eighteen stars of the first magnitude for both hemispheres. Why eighteen, and not nineteen or twenty? The stars of the first magnitude are far from having all the same intensity. The sixth order composed, among the ancients, the last visible to the naked eye; and, in our day, those of the seventh magnitude constitute the demarkation between the stars visible to the naked eye and the telescopic stars.

We may affirm that there are certainly stars in the firmament whose distance from the earth is three hundred and forty-four, and even nine hundred times greater that of the stars visible to the naked eye. See what conclusion this leads us to! It is admitted that light, with the velocity of seventy-seven thousand leagues a second, takes three years to reach us from the nearest stars. And there are stars three hundred and forty-four, and even nine hundred times more remote. Then there are stars whose light does not reach us until after two thousand seven hundred years—an infinity in distance as it is in numbers.

Stars of Variable Intensity of Light.

Eratosthenes, in the year 275 bejore Christ, says of the stars in the constellation of the Scorpion: "They are preceded by the most beautiful of all the brilliant of the northern gems." At this time this is less brilliant than the southern, and, above all, than Arcturus. Then there have been changes since the time of Eratosthenes.

When Newton pronounced the sublime words —"Universal Attraction," there was an outcry at its novelty; it was a neologism; it had occult qualities, &c. Now the words fill the world, of which they are its greatest reality.

Diameters of the Stars.

Great diversity of opinion exists on this point. If we should take for their discs such as they appear to the naked eye, certain stars would be nine thousand millions of leagues in diameter, (equal to twenty-seven thousand times greater diameter than the sun—H. Meigs,) and the most moderate calculations would be seventeen hundred millions. Herschel's last calculation was, that Arcturus had a diameter of nearly four millions of leagues, (twelve millions of miles.) If the apparent diameter of two seconds and a half, assigned by Herschel to the Goat, was real, the mass of that star must be more than fourteen millions times greater than that of our sun. But there is no certainty in this, nor any thing to question that our sun is a star.

The sublime idea in the Holy Scriptures, that the Creator has made all with number, weight, and measure, is followed by Plato, who called it the geometry of the heavens. Halley, the friend of Newton, believed that all the stars were of the same magnitude—that of our sun—and difference of distance only caused the apparent difference of size.

Number of Stars.

The number visible by means of a telescope of twenty feet focal distance, may be more than five hundred millions.

Distance of the Stars of Some Nebula.

We have supposed that the nebula of which we form a part, is not the largest of the three thousand nebula known to astronomers. Is it not very natural? Is it not a million to one that it is so? When, therefore, on this hypothesis, and the facts stated by Herschel; that there are, at a medium, in the direction of our nebula five hundred stars, that many nebula subtend an angle of ten minutes, and the very natural hypothesis that the distance between two consecutive stars among the five hundred is the distance of the earth from the nearest star, we must arrive at the conclusion, that there are nebula so distant from us, that light, moving at the velocity of more than seventy-seven thousand leagues in a second of time, would take more than a million of years to reach us!

These few words are enough to prove, as it seems to me, that we must admit our imaginations frighted at the infinite number and distances in question." H. MEIGS, Rec. Sec.

Paper Glass.—Prof. Schœnhein of Basle, who invented the gun cotton, has lately, to a certain point, discovered Malleable Glass! He renders paper paste (paper mache) transparent by causing it to undergo a certain metamorphosis which he calls Catalytic, for want of an intelligible term. He makes of this new paper panes of glass, vases, bottles, etc., perfectly impermeable to water—and which may be dropped on the ground without breaking—and are perfectly transparent. He also renders paper impermeable, and perfectly suitable for bank notes.

New Propellers.—A new method of propelling ships, boats, &c., has been invented by S. R. Parkhurst, consisting of a series of upright wheels ranged along both entire sides of the vessel, and impelled by the direct action of a steam engine. The invention has been approved of in England by scientific and practical engineers, and a company formed there to buy the patent and apply the machinery to vessels. A set of these wheels for a steamboat is now in process of construction in New York, and is expected to be in operation before the end of August.

HISTORICAL.

Now that we are at war with Mexico, we do not know that we can do our readers a better service than to lay before them the annexed brief history of that country, as given in the 'Treasury of History.'

The History of Mexico.

This rich and interesting country may be regarded as altogether a Spanish colony, though it is no longer dependant on Spain, having become a federal republic. Discovered by Fernando Cortez, A. D. 1519, it was by him taken possession of in the name of the Spanish Government. The exploits by which he made himself master of the country, seem rather to belong to romance than history; the circumstances of the age, and the nature and character of the opposing powers, throw an air of universal interest over operations so multiform and diversified—as the conquest of a great and powerful state by a body of men hitherto unseen by them, possessing all the advantages of skill and experience in war, and resolution and enterprise in action.

The first conquest made by Cortez was on the river Tabasco; after which, landing at St. Juan de Ulloa, he erected a fort, where he received two ambassadors sent by the emperor of Mexico with offers of assistance. A haughty answer was the reply of Cortez; and gifts of the most costly character were heaped upon him by the natives, in the hope of conciliating peace and preventing his further advance. Dangers, however, encompassed his steps. Sedition broke out in his own camp, which he had the address not only to quell, but turn to his own advantage. A new town was founded, called La Villa Rica de la Vera Cruz. Still a more alarming mutiny showed itself, which he again converted into the means of executing a measure fraught with imminent risk, but calculated to superinduce the deadly courage of despair. This measure was the destruction of the fleet. Soon after this, being joined by one of the native caciques, with a force of little more than one thousand men, fifteen horses, and six cannons, he entered the state of the Tlascalans, whom, after a desperate resistance of fourteen days, he subdued, and converted into allies. At Cholula he massacred six thousand of the natives in revenge for their treachery. Success now wafted his banners, and the capital of the empire lay before him. Received by the emperor Montezuma at the head of his nobles, Cortez was conducted to a house in the city, which he fortified in the strongest manner possible. It appears there was a prediction among the Mexicans, that a strange people should come to chastise them for their sins—a piece of superstition of which Cortez availed himself. By treachery he obtained possession of the person of Montezuma, whom he kept a prisoner for six months. Worn out at length, the Mexican emperor acknowledged himself a vassal of the Spanish throne. In the meanwhile Cortez lost no opportunity of strengthening his power, by surveys of the country, and dividing the spoils among his followers.

He was again on the point of losing the fruit of his exertions; for Velasquez, who commanded the expedition from which Cortez had been despatched from Cuba, hearing of his success, sent out a large force under Narvaez, to seize him, and take possession of Mexico. This formidable danger Cortez frustrated, as well by bribes as the rapidity of his movements, almost without bloodshed.—But this he observed gave fresh spirit to the Mexicans who attacked him on his return, and wounded him in his fortress. The wretched Montezuma, who had been placed in the van to deter the assailants from prosecuting their attacks, was wounded, and died of a broken heart. Cortez was compelled to evacuate the place secretly, but only to return with a larger body of forces at the expiration of six months. We shortly afterwards find his head quarters at Tezcuco, where, with the assistance of the Indians, he built a flotilla of thirteen ships. Reinforced with two hundred men, eight horses, and some military stores, he renewed the seige. Gallantly was the capital defended by Guatimozin, the new emperor, and Cortez was once taken prisoner, but rescued at the expense of a severe wound. Seventy-four days did the city hold out, although the ranks of Cortez were augmented by one hundred thousand Indians. August 12, 1521, beheld Gautimozin a prisoner, and his capital in the hands of merciless invaders—merciless to him they were, for Cortez stained the lustre of his glory by putting the brave but ill-fated monarch to the torture.—But there is even in this world a retributive justice; and worldly minds, however sublimed by courage and enterprize, generally encounter reverses similar in character to their own conduct. Success had excited envy; and Cortez was doomed to find that no courage and enterprise can be altogether free from reverses. Created captain-general of New Spain (the name he had given to his new conquest) even after an order had been issued, but not executed, for his arrest—established in high favor and honor with the emperor, his native master—endowed with a grant of large possessions in the New World—he had the mortification to find himself possessing only military command. The political government was vested in a royal ordinance. His enterprizing spirit led him to the discovery of the great California gulf, but his glory was on the wane; irritated and disappointed he returned to Europe to appeal against the proceedings of the royal ordinance, but without success; and he, who had barbarously tortured the gallant emperor of Mexico, died twenty-six years afterwards of a broken heart, A. D. 1547, in the 62d year of his age.

Abstracting the interest which attended the discovery and first conquest of Mexico, or New Spain, the historian finds a tame succession of events, which claim but a very vague notice.—From the year 1535 to 1808, there was a succession of fifty viceroys, one alone an American by birth. At the latter period a spirit broke forth, elicited by centuries of oppression and exclusive favor to Europeans, which led the Mexicans to offer resistance to the disunion of Spain. The dissensions were headed by Hidalgo, an enthusiastic patriot, who was proclaimed generalissimo, September 17, 1810. He unfortunately halted in his advance towards the capital, which gave the royalists time to rally, and enabled them to defeat his intentions a few months, and put him to death. But with him the spirit of independence vanished not. Morelos, a priest, assumed the command, and several princes were completely ensured to the side of liberty. A congress of forty members was called, but after the defeat and execution of Morelos, it was dissolved by General Teran, who succeeded him. After languishing for some time, the revolt was entirely quelled in 1819.

The change of system introduced into Spain by the cortes alarmed the ecclesiastics in Mexico, who, for their defence, elected Iturbide, under whom a bloodless revolution was effected, and Mexico maintained in all its rights, independent of the Spanish dominion, A. D. 1822. After an usurpation of the title of emperor for little more than one year, Iturbide was compelled to lay down his usurpation, and he retired to Leghorn.

A federal government was now formed, and sworn to, February 24, 1824. Still commotions arose, in one of which Iturbide, who had been induced to return, lost his life. Thenceforward the government has been almost in a continual turmoil, adverse parties fighting for the rule, and alternately overthrowing each other. The Generals Pedrazzo, Guerrero, Arenas, Arista Urrea, and others, rapidly succeeded in grasping after the shadow of power, were exalted and debased. Bravo, Bustamente, and Santa Anna, more successful because more unscrupulous tyrants, managed for a time to monopolize what there was of authority. Each of them being in turn banished, General Herrera was, in 1845, elected president.

WESTERN REGORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, AUGUST 19, 1847.

Correspondents.—Poetry by C. H. W., next week. "A Virginian" should have sent us his proper name, and we would have published his article at once. How many times have we given notice that those who do not entrust with us their names, need not expect their articles to appear. This is the rule with all editors.

Absence.—The Editor leaves home to-day, (Tuesday 17th,) for the Pittsburgh Conference at Waynesburg, Pa. It is probable that he will also, before his return, attend the session of the Muskingum Conference, at Youngstown, Ohio, which meets within a few days after. On his return, if spared, he expects to go soon to Cincinnati, to attend the Ohio Conference. Meanwhile, our printer pledges himself to render faithful attention to the paper, as editor pro-tem. Our readers, may also expect to hear from the editor, each week, during his absence.

To the Readers of the Western Recorder.—We are one of those who seldom offer apologies; always being guided by the old adage, 'Look before you leap.' But our inexperience renders it necessary to say a word or two in our own defence. During the absence of the editor, our best endeavors will be to make the Recorder what we have always considered it to be, since our first acquaintance with it, a welcome, interesting, and useful visiter in every family. Should we fail in this, we beg the indulgence of its numerous readers. One thing will be left to console us; which is, all that can be, will be done, to please. If, however, an error should occur, impute it to the head, and not the heart.—Ed. pt.

Otterbein University.—This new institution under the patronage of United Brethren in Christ, we learn by the Religious Telescope, goes into operation, on the 1st of September, under the care of Wm. R. Griffith, as Principal. Its location is at Westerville, Franklin County, Ohio, north of Columbus.

Rev. T. Mapel.—We insert the communication of this brother with some reluctance, because we do not like to give currency to any misunderstanding between christian brethren of different orders, and because we have no intention to interfere or participate in any controversy between our old friend M., and the gentlemen to whom he refers. We publish it at his request, as he professes to be aggrieved by misrepresentations of a writer in the "Cumberland Presbyterian," and has not the privilege of reply through the columns of that paper, as we infer from his sending the article to us, so long after the day of its date. We exchange with the "Cumberland Presbyterian," and have ever been in good and fraternal understanding with its editor, and with the ministers and people of the denomination he represents. We trust that nothing shall occur to interrupt this good understanding. Individual ministers or writers may have done, or spoken, or written imprudently, or even unfairly, upon either side, but we are not bound to enter such minor differences, nor are they, for the most part, worthy of being noticed. They should never be deemed sufficient moment to produce alienation of feeling between churches, or denominations of Christians. Furthermore, we desire no controversy at present, in reference to the point of doctrine referred to in the communication of Brother M.

The Snake.—The last number of the Clermont County Sun, speaking of the monster said to have been seen in a mill-pond in said County, says that the "snake stock" is still depreciating daily,—and that the man who made the affidavit in the Cincinnati Commercial, must have had on his magnifiers, while looking at a muskrat, or something else, floundering in the water.

☞ We learn that a Telegraph Office is to be opened at Wellsburgh, Virginia, this week.

Qualifications of Editors.—Mr. Cist, of the Cincinnati Advertiser says: "No person is fit to edit a paper, who has not attained two steps towards perfection, to get angry at nothing, and surprised at nothing." He says he has taken the first step, and expects shortly to take the second.

Affliction.—We regret to learn by private letter from Br. J. B. Peat, of the Ohio Conference, dated Richwood, August 12, that he is just now laid up with a serious spell of sickness, by which he is prevented from fulfilling his intention, to visit the Pittsburgh and Muskingum Conferences. We have been looking for Br. P. this way for several days.

☞ Rev. James R. Williams, of Baltimore has stated to us his intention to send us, in a series of short numbers, for publication in our paper, his reply to Rev. A. M'Caine's Defence of Slavery. As our volume is near its close, however, he prefers to have the numbers commence with our coming volume.

Another Departed.—A private letter from our old friend and Br., Wm. Randall, of Dillsborough, Ia., acquaints us with the death of sister Randall, his companion. She was a pious and kind woman, a worthy member of the Methodist Protestant Church, and we have many times in years past, participated in the hospitalities of her house. Br. R. expresses a confidence that our loss is her gain. May Heaven preserve her surviving companion and children.

Secret Societies Once More.

We have at last settled down upon a conviction that it is impossible to please every body. Some months ago we were requested to insert an article approving the institution of Masonry. We did so, as we deemed the article inoffensive, and as we knew the writer to be an estimable brother, a subscriber for our paper. The insertion of that article however gave offence to some two or three brethren, opposed to Masonry, who were also subscribers, but not personally known to us, and chiefly on this account, they ordered their paper discontinued. We thought their course, a hasty and unreasonable one. In process of time some one or two writers desired to express their views in opposition to secret confederations, and challenged us in reference to the freedom of our press, forasmuch as we had inserted something on the other side. With the most innocent and unsuspecting intentions, after some deliberation, we determined to give place, for a time, to temperate articles on the subject, and gave notice that either party should be treated with equal fairness. Several articles have been inserted in opposition to secret societies in general, and some two articles (previous to this week) in opposition to Masonary in particular. A third, appears in the present number. The insertion of these has given offence, we find, to several brethren connected with the Masonic Fraternity, and residing at the goodly city of Steubenville; and without first warning us of the error of our ways, or giving us a moment's chance for repentance or reformation, or even allowing us the 'benefit of clergy,' they have most summarily cut us off, as will be seen by a letter which we have just received from them, and which we here subjoin. It was not professedly written for publication, nor yet was it endorsed as private. Without intending to take improper liberties, we think best to publish it. We do so, chiefly because it contains testimony in behalf of the Masonic institution, and we have felt bound for the time being, to publish what comes to us on either side that is temperate and fair. The brethren are respectable, and worthy and credible men, and they give testimony that they know the institution to be a good one. We regret however, that the letter evidences, that the brethren have fallen into a hasty indiscretion, which we doubt not, in their reflecting moments, they will retract. Here is the letter:

Steubenville, August 11th, 1847.

Sir:—The undersigned have been looking for some time, for a discontinuance of the anti-masonic pieces in the Western Recorder, but they see in the last number that they are to be continued for some two months to come; and on account of the church, regret it, as they have been regular subscribers ever since it was started by Br. Springer. And on account of its connection with the Methodist Protestant Church, they would still feel the same interest, if its columns were devoted to the object as formerly, but since it has become to some extent, an anti-masonic paper, and as the undersigned were members of the Masonic Institution for years before the organization of said Methodist Protestant Church, they are unwilling to support a paper that publishes slanderous articles against that Institution," &c. We shall ever scorn to publish a slanderous article against any man, or against any institution. And we are sorry that the brethren, on the appearance of any article they considered such, did not designate to us the slander, and furnish us a refutation of it. We are sure that we would have published it for them, with promptness and with pleasure, whilst our columns were open to articles on the subject. The brethren have not seen proper to do this, but have ordered a discontinuance of their paper. We regret, of course, to lose their patronage, for we have ever respected those brethren, but we are conscious of having done them no wrong. And we feel confident that upon reflection, they will continue their patronage of our paper after the expiration of the volume. If not, they only serve us as did a few anti-masons before them, from grounds, either similar, or opposite, as you please to have it. Yet we have a better opinion of those brethren than to conclude that they will persist in their intention to decline taking the paper. We should not thus far, have noticed this matter, but that we felt that their charge against our paper was a severe one, and without foundation, and we considered that justice to our paper required a few words of reply from us.

In discussing this subject, we cannot refrain from expressing our surprise that brethren on either side should be so sensitive in reference to the discussion of any question in a fair way. We receive in exchange, the Western Christian Journal, which is the western church organ of the Baptist denomination. It is one of the most respectable of religious newspapers, and represents a denomination much more numerous than ours. We have observed occasionally for many months past, that the merits of secret societies, and of Free Masonary in particular, have been freely discussed in the columns of that paper. Yet we have seen no notices of any persons complaining of the discussion, or withdrawing on this account, their patronage from the paper. Perhaps the Baptists are a more patient set of folks than we.

Finally, we would only further say, that before the letter of our Steubenville brethren came to hand, we had made up our mind, with the present number to dismiss the controversy on secret societies, forasmuch as we are expecting now to be absent several weeks in attending the sessions of two or three Annual Conferences, and would not have opportunity of inspecting personally, papers which may come to hand in our absence on the subject. We have in hand two more communications from our friend "A. C.," and one has just now been handed to us as we were writing, from "A. D." These brethren will excuse us, that we think best, and believe that it would best suit the majority of our readers, that we publish no more articles on the merits of secret societies.

M. E. Church South.—We learn by the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, that the Minutes, lately published, show, that there has been a decrease in the M. E. Ch., South, the year past, of 3,282 members, mostly whites. The decrease in the northern section of the Ch., is much greater, as we learn from the same paper. We do by no means rejoice at this falling off amongst our ecclesiastical cotemporaries.

Columbus.—The last number of the Ohio Statesman, gives some account of the prosperity of Columbus. In 1840, the population numbered 6,048. In 1846, it was 10,016. In every street, fine brick houses are going up. In the last year, three brick school houses were erected, and are now in service. The number of churches is sixteen, as follows:

Presbyterian, (including one Welch,)	3
Methodist, (including 1 Germ. & 1 Col'd)	4
Episcopal,	2
Baptist (including 1 Col'd,)	2
German & Eng. Lutheran & Reformed,	3
Universalist,	1
Catholic,	1
Total,	16.

Accident in Dresden.—We learn from the "Zanesville Daily Courier," of the 13th instant, that while the citizens of Dresden were engaged in firing a salute, in honor of Gen. Scott's supposed victory in Mexico, a premature explosion of the gun took place, by which Messrs. Joseph Jonas, and George Allen were severely burned.

It is painful for us to record, or even to read of the accidents which befall our fellow-men. But candor compels us to acknowledge we do not feel that sympathy we should, when we hear of such calamities befalling those who are exulting over scenes which have rendered desolate many a family hearth,—caused the burning tear to flow from the bereaved widow, mother, or hapless orphan, and hurried hundreds of their fellow-beings into the presence of their God,—probably, without any preparation.—Ed.—p. t.

Dont Forget.—Those who are indebted for the Western Recorder, will greatly oblige us, by paying up before the close of the present volume. It will be a convenient opportunity to send by the preachers or delegates to the approaching Conferences. We need to receive, about this time, several hundred dollars, to enable us to meet claims against us which have grown out of our publishing enterprise. Dont forget. We shall have to discontinue many at the close of vol. viii, if they do not pay up.

A Great Dependance is also placed in the liberality of those true friends of the paper, who pursue the good old custom of paying in advance. From them we trust we shall have some essential aid in entering upon our next volume. Read the next paragraph.

Annual Register, M. P. Church, 1848.—This little publication, so much demanded by the Church, is now in press, and will be issued at an earlier date than heretofore. An edition of 6000 copies of the first half of the pamphlet, including the Calendar, is already worked off from the press. And we only wait to obtain the statistics of the several Annual Conferences to be held within a few weeks, when we expect to make up the remaining part of the publication. Every subscriber for the Western Recorder who pays $2 in advance for vol. 9, shall have a copy of the Register sent him by mail, so soon as it is issued.

Information Wanted—Statistics of Conferences.—We are about publishing the Annual Register of the M. P. Church, for the year 1848, and are anxious to obtain, in view of this publication, the statistics of those Annual Conferences which have not published their Minutes in full. We desire to have the name of the President of each Conference, the number of Stations, Circuits, Missions, Itinerant ministers and preachers, Unstationed ministers and preachers, Members, and houses of worship in each District. Also, the time and place of the next session of each Annual Conference. If the secretaries, or any other having the information, will communicate it to us without delay, we shall be greatly obliged, and will be pleased to reciprocate the favor in any possible way.

☞ The account, published last week, under the head, "Important News from Mexico," that General Scott had encountered the Mexican forces, eight miles distant from the city of Mexico, are untrue. Letters and dates have been received from New Orleans, by the editor of the "Louisville Courier," which says that "the rumors are entirely unworthy of belief."

Godey's Lady's Book.—The September number has reached us in good time, accompanied with the Reprint of the London World of Fashion. The "Book" contains a charming mezzotint, representing Purity, and a fine view of the Bay of New York. Also, Model Cottages, Ladies' Work Department, and Fine Arts, nine engravings in all. Mr. Godey keeps fully up with the times, in all the fine things, for the ladies. Terms, $3 per year. Two copies for $5,00. L. A. Godey, Philadelphia.

Correspondence.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Br. Bassett: In a late number of the Methodist Protestant I saw a piece signed by Brother P———, Iowa, giving general intelligence. I was surprised and pained to read one item—viz: He knew a President of an Annual Conference, who had been under the necessity of chopping cord-wood to support himself and family. The reasons of my surprise, &c., will appear in the sequel. I saw another piece of a similar stamp in a late number of the Recorder. In fact there has been much complaint lately not unlike the above. That there is a wrong somewhere is obvious. These things ought not so be. To ascertain and rectify the wrong may not be as easy as to make a wry face. The members of the church have been blamed, yes, severely blamed. That there are many delinquents I have no doubt.—But may we not look still farther to find the difficulty? Are not ministers to blame? Yes, to blame. I apprehend they are. I have cases now in mind where through the impolicy of the minister, noble-hearted, whole-souled members have been driven from the church or caused to cease their liberality because the cry was, give, give. The Bible proceeds on the principle that the laborer is worthy of, and will receive his hire. When Christ sent his disciples out at first, lacked they anything? Certainly not. Does He not still send out? If so, will He not (if they do their duty) open the purses of the people to sustain them? To answer in the negative would be to impeach the wisdom and goodness of the Divine Being. You recollect the story of Jonah, called of God to deliver a message faithfully to to Nineveh? Instead of performing, he went down into a boat and went to sleep. I fear there are many Jonahs now-a-days. If they are not swallowed by the whale, they may expect difficulty. If they get off by chopping wood they'll do better than I expect. Now what are the facts in the case? 1st. God has called us to preach the gospel. 2d. He has sent us out. 3d. We distrust Him and neglect duty and hence the evil complained of. The duties of ministers are twofold. 1st, public. 2d, private. To perform public duties correctly, much grace is needed. Private duties (if possible) require more. Is it because ministers do not receive their support that these duties are neglected, or is it because these are neglected that their wants are not supplied? I fear the latter generally. "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you," says our blessed Lord. My settled conviction is—if instead of complaining publicly, farming a little, chopping wood a little, and the like, brethren would study to make their discourse more spiritual, interesting and edifying, visit from house to house, encourage and feed the flock of Christ, and warn sinners night and day with a sincere regard for their welfare, the cause of complaint would disappear like ghosts before the march of intellect. If brethren have not religion enough to do duty in the love of it, I suggest that they spend more time in prayer to God, and less in public complaint. Come, brethren in the ministry, let us be more faithful. The best, I fear, are not doing half what might be done. They need to be more given up to the work of God. The harvest is great.—Sinners are falling into hell, and shall we cry aloud, and spare not? May God give a pure, holy, devoted ministry. DANIEL BAGLEY.

Princeton, Ill., Aug. 4, 1847.

Poisoning Americans in Mexico.—We mentioned some time since, the rumor, not our own, that the Mexicans at Jalapa and elsewhere in Mexico, were poisoning the milk and other products, and selling them to the Americans. That this infamous course was attempted to kill our soldiers there is the best evidence.—We have taken some pains to gain the history of the matter, says the New Orleans National of the 23d ult., and find them to be as follows:

In Mexico there grows a small bean called Pinon lillo, (pronounced peno-leo,) which, when infused in milk and drank, causes a chronic disease that soon carries off its victims, they the while unconscious of the real cause. This bean it is said, was used in Havana, many years ago, with considerable success in destroying the English. The Mexicans use an herb called the Huaco, pronounced wha-co, to relieve them of the poisonous effects of the pinon-lillo and the bite of poisonous reptiles, by chewing the weed and swallowing the extract. The extract is also used to put in the place of a bite of a poisonous reptile, and always with success. A Mexican never travels, if it can be avoided, without a small package of the huaco weed, to be provided for against accidents. —Cin. Commercial.

Interesting Investigation.—A case of more than ordinary interest is in process of investigation at New Haven, before a committee of the County Ecclesiastical Association. The parties belong to the most cultivated circle of society, and the affair, we understand, brings some eminent men of the clerical profession in that city into painful collision with each other. The lady is a sister of a distinguished Orthodox clergyman, and the young gentleman is a candidate for the ministry. There is no attempt to fix the charge of breach of promise, but the allegation is that her character has suffered from caluminous and false representations made by him since the amicable termination of their intimacy and friendship. The affair has occupied public attention for some months past in that city, and it is now in process of investigation, by the Association, to which he is amenable for Christian deportment.

The French in Algiers.—Horrors of War.—Sad stories are told in some of the letters from Algiers, of the horrors of war. A correspondent of the Paris National, describing Marshal Bugeaud's invasion of Kabyle, says that a battle lasted from five in the afternoon till the following morning. Several villages were taken, some of which had a population of 6,000, and the writer adds:

"The troops, excited by the heat of the combat, rushed headlong into the villages, and completely sacked them. Jewels, rich stuffs, carpets, provisions of all kinds, a quantity of arms, and a profusion of gold and silver, fell into the hands of our soldiers. The booty was immense. Numerous jars, filled with olive oil, were broken, and their contents allowed to flow about the streets and the fire from the burning houses gaining this liquid, a horrible spectacle presented itself. All the inhabitants who came within reach of our soldiers were put to the sword. In the midst of this frightful melee, a Kabyle chief, of athletic form, was seen forcing his way to the marshal, and having come up, entreated him, in terms of humble supplication, to put a stop to the devastation, and he and his people would immediately make submission. In the accents of his voice, and in the expression of his countenance, there was so much sincerity as well as grief, that the marshal ordered the three cannon to be fired, and the destruction and plunder at once ceased.—This was to the great regret of the marshal, who said last evening, when on the terrace, that he wished he had been more violently attacked, in order that the destruction might have been more complete, and the lesson more severe. This is no calumny; it is the truth, and nothing more than the truth."

Conformity to Custom.—But the way in which the human body shall be covered is not a thing for the scientific and learned only; and is allowed on all hands to concern, in no small degree, one half at least of the creation. It is in such a simple thing as dress that each of us may form some estimate of the extent of conformity in the world. A wise nation unsubdued by superstition, with the collected experience of peaceful ages, concludes that female feet are to be clothed by crushing them. The still wiser nations have adopted a swifter mode of destroying and creating angularity, by crushing the upper part of the female body. In such matters nearly all people conform. Our fellow man is seldom so bitter against us as when we refuse to adopt at once his notions of the infinite. But even religious dissent were less dangerous and more respectable than dissent in dress. If you want to see what men will be in the way of conformity, take a European hat for your subject of meditation. I dare say there are twenty-two millions of people at this minute, each wearing one of these hats in order to please the rest.—"Friends in Council."

Strange Animal.—We saw, on Sunday, at the Mansion House, a black bear, three years old, that had no fore legs!—the deformity being one of Nature's wild freaks. It walked upright like a man, and in its movements, seemed to experience no inconvenience from the deprivation. Where the legs should have been, there were short stumps of no avail in locomotion, hugging, climbing trees, or anything else. The natural attitude of the animal was perpendicular.—Cin. Commercial.

Horrible Murder.—On Sunday week last, at the ferry boat landing in Covington, a difficulty occured between an omnibus driver and a man named Patrick Balfe, which resulted fatally to the latter. Balfe, as the story goes, endeavored to get into the omnibus, which was filled with ladies, but his entrance was resisted by the driver and others. A fight ensued, in which Balfe was knocked into the river and barely saved from drowning by the timely exertions of some persons present. When taken out of the water, it was discovered that his bowels had been opened, from a kick! He died on yesterday morning. We have not heard of any arrests being made.—Cincinnati Commercial.

George Rapp, the celebrated founder and patriarch of Economy, Pa., died on Monday last, at a very advanced age, leaving his neice heiress to his immense estate. He was a most singular character, and his life has been chequered with many adventures and changes of fortunes. His government of the town of Economy, was by a singular system of social and political despotism, heretofore unknown in this country, as it is to be hoped it may never be known again. The nature of this system is probably referred to by Grace Greenwood, when she calls Economy an "unique town" and says she saw no "bustle" there. We heartily coincide with Miss Clarke in her opposition to all such regulations.—Pitts. Journal.

Postage on Foreign Letters.—Hereafter letters received from Europe will be taxed for the postage by the American line of steamers, ocean as well as inland, at the place of delivery. Letters mailed for Pittsburgh in Bremen or Southampton, by the same line of steamers will be paid here, and the postage will be 34 cents, 24 for ship and 10 inland.

Postage on letters mailed for Europe must, as usual, be pre-paid here, to the port whence the ship sails, and this whether by the Cunard or New York line.

French Opinions of the Mexican War.

The Journal des Debats, in alluding to opinions expressed in England on the subject of the invasion of Mexico, remarks: "It is said this immense conquest will be an immense incumberance to the United States, and that when they get Mexico on their hands they will not know what to do with it. We admit that there is truth in this opinion. It is certain that what has rendered Mexico easy to conquer will make it difficult to keep. It is an empire which is falling to pieces. On all sides it is dissolving from old age and weakness. They are obliged to take it by morsels, but it is precisely on account of this universal dismemberment, that it escapes from all solid and durable restraint."

Again the same journal remarks, that "when the Americans of the Union shall reach Mexico, and they will arrive there, they will perceive the difficulty of retaining possession of the fragments of this dissolving empire. But then when they will be obliged to abandon their conquest to its own dissolution, as one abandons a dead body to corruption, they will leave an ineffaceable impression—that of their own moral superiority.—This descent of the men of the North on the population of the South has been as rapid, as terrible, almost as much like fable, as the first conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards. General Scott, with his phalanx, seems hardly to find more resistance, than Fernando Cortez met, with his cannons."

"When the Americans shall have taken Mexico, what will they do with it? It is a problem very difficult to solve. There are those who think that the United States will follow, with regard to Mexico, the same system which they have pursued with regard to the Indian tribes; that they will make them cede at a nominal price the best portion of their territory, and will make them withdraw themselves to the desert parts, where they will at last become extinct as a nation.—This solution is perhaps the most probable, but it cannot be a very speedy one."

In reference to the rumored negotiations for the cession of New Mexico, California, and the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, it is remarked that, to be able to treat, it is necessary that there should be a government of some sort in Mexico. "This government the Americans will be obliged to create themselves. Until it shall be established, they will occupy the capital, and all the ports of Mexico, collecting all the duties of customs, all imposts, all the revenues of the mines, and will exercise a kind of control, for their own profit, over the Mexican republic."

MORALS OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.—There is now living, in one of the chief towns of New Hampshire, a woman who has had ten husbands, all of whom are now living, upon the best of terms with her and each other. The woman is highly respected among her neighbors, who see nothing to censure but much to approve. Strange as it may seem, an action for bigamy could not be sustained against her.—N. Y. Exp.

COTTON FACTORIES STOPPED.—The Pittsburgh Chronicle of the 9th, learns that all the cotton factories in Allegheny city, with the exception of the Penn and Blackstock's, have stopped operations. The proprietors, in consequence of the fall in yarns, had resolved upon this, unless their hands would submit to a reduction of their wages. This the operatives refused to accede.

SOMETHING NEW.—The Cincinnati Commercial is informed that a block of three-story buildings is to be erected in that city, the entire front to be of cast iron! The plates for the same are already being cast.

DROWNED.—Wm. B. Dennison, mate of the steamer American Star, was drowned in the Ohio last Saturday night at Goal port. He was endeavoring to make a line fast from the stern to the shore. The night was dark, and it was found impossible to recover the body.—Pitts. Jour.

CONSEQUENCE OF A HOAX.—On Saturday last, a notice of marriage was handed to us for publication, and, having no doubt of its authenticity, as we knew the person who brought it, we complied. On Monday morning, however, the principal in the affair met us on the street, and demanded the reason why we brought his name before the public so unwarrantably. We soon satisfied him that we were imposed upon, by exhibiting the copy, and naming the person who handed it to us. For a moment he seemed petrified with amazement; but presently his limbs shook with a convulsive action, and he dropped down in a dreadful fit, a sad spectacle of suffering. A large crowd assembled, and were the author of the distressing scene present, though his heart might be as hard as flint, and though he might live a century, the scoundrel's memory would ever after be haunted with gloomy and bitter reminiscenses of his wanton, witless, mean, dastardly trifling with the feelings of the unhappy man.—Halifax Recorder.

MILLS BURNT.—At St. Louis, on the night of the 2d inst., the large Genesee mill, belonging to Mr. Lacy, was consumed by fire, with most of its contents, and three or four adjoining frame buildings. The second house and furniture store of Mr. Gray was among the latter. Mill insured $1800; contents in full. An extensive mill and distillery, at Aquakwa, Illinois, was entirely destroyed by fire last Wednesday week. A large amount of corn—some 10,000 bushels—together with other grain, was consumed.

HEALTH OF NEW ORLEANS.—Passengers who came from New Orleans, on the Old Hickory to Cairo, and thence to this city on the Palestine, report that the yellow fever is on the increase in that city, and when they left on the 31st ult., one hundred and fifty new cases had been reported. We have New Orleans papers up to the evening of the 31st ult., none of which, however, say a word in relation to the health of the city.—Louisville Courier.

AN UNPROFITABLE SALE.—It is customary with business men, on closing their stores at evening, to take from the till what funds they may have over after making their deposites, and store it in some out of the way place for safety. The Signal relates a case which recently transpired in a hardware establishment on Main Street, which proves that the most obscure place is not always the safest. It happened that the clerk, upon closing the store at night, found some hundred and fifty dollars in the till, and not having the key of the fire-proof, deposited the funds in an empty tea kettle. The proprietor happening to be in the store early in the morning, in the absence of the clerk, sold the identical tea kettle in which the treasure was stored, to a countryman, for seventy-five cents; and all efforts up to the present writing have been ineffectual in discovering who the fortunate purchaser is.—Cin. Atlas.

A PATRIARCH GONE.—Geo. Rapp, the founder of Economy, Pa., and the greatest communist of the age, is dead. He departed this life on the 9th instant, aged 92 years. He was a native of Germany, and emigrated to this country half a century ago with a band of followers, with his own peculiar religious, political and social views. His neice is his heiress, but as celibacy is a peculiarty of their creed, the stock will of course soon run out.

SINGULAR AFFAIR.—Supposed Murder at Millville, West Jersey.—The West Jersey Telegraph, printed at Bridgeton, has the particulars of an occurrence, which is singular from its fatal result and the extreme youth of the parties concerned. On Saturday morning last two lads, one named Polston and the other Dilks, left home together, for the purpose of going out of town a short distance, to gather blackberries. Polston returned home some time during the day, and when questioned as to the whereabouts of Dilks, said they had some dispute and separated before reaching the blackberry field, and he knew nothing of him afterwards. No search was made for the boy until Sunday afternoon, when a number of persons commenced searching and dragging the river, supposing that he had probably been drowned, but finding no tidings of him, they proceeded to search the surrounding country, but did not find the body until Monday evening, about one and a quarter miles from town, and near where the two boys were seen together. He had been shot—several shot having entered the face and head; he had been beaten and otherwise seriously injured. It would seem almost impossible, from Polston's age, (he being only about ten years old) that he should commit the horrible deed, but the evidence is much against him. The deceased was about eight years of age.

SLAVE STEALERS SENTENCED.—On Saturday last John Robinson, mate, and Cato Rickets, seamen, (both colored) were convicted at Norfolk, Va., of the attempt to carry out of the State the two negro slaves lately found secreted on board the Schooner Mary Agusta, at that port. They were both sentenced to seven years imprisonment in the penitentiary.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—On Wednesday morning, about two o'clock, a man named Morris, was knocked down in Southwark, Philadelphia, by two men whose faces were painted black; one of the two villians presented a pistol to his breast and demanded his money. He forked over $10 and a ring

RAIL ROAD ACCIDENT.—A very serious accident occurred on the Columbus Rail Road, last week, by the breaking of an axletree of a section boat truck, while the train was in full motion.—Two men named Edward Edwards and Thomas Williams, both of Ohio, were killed. One of the sections of the boat was thrown over upon the north track, and the up-train within a few minutes subsequent to the accident, came so near, before discovering the obstruction as to be unable to avoid a collision. The engineer and firemen stuck to the Locomtive although the concussion was so great as to break it to peices. We are glad to learn they were not seriously injured, nor were one on their train.

The bodies of the killed were buried in the neighborhood of the accident; and the employers of the road raised sufficient money for the widows, who were left in rather destitute circumstances, to place them above present want.—Pitts. Gazzette.

FIRE.—About two o'clock on Monday morning last, the large frame Grist Mill, a few hundred yards west of town, owned by the Jackson Mill Company, was discovered to be on fire.—When first discovered, the flames had made such progress as to entirely shut out the hope of saving either the building or its contents.

The fire was the work of an incendiary, as there had been no fire kept about the mill for a couple of months. The loss to the company was about $10,000. No insurance.—Millersburg Whig.

EARTHQUAKE.—A correspondent of the Boston Journal, dating from that city, says: "A smart shock of an earthquake was distinctly felt in this city, and in the adjoining towns of Cambridge, Roxbury and Dedham, yesterday (Sunday) forenoon, about ten or eleven minutes before ten o'clock." The editors add:

"This carthquake we felt distinctly in Roxbury. It agitated our habitation considerably, but we heard not the rumbling noise which usually accompanies this phenomenon."

Extract of a letter, dated

NANTUCKET, Aug. 8, 1847.

We have had for a few days past delightfully cool weather, and this morning a shock of an earthquake between the hours of 9 and 10, which quite alarmed the Islanders.

SUFFERINGS OF THE IMMIGRANTS.—A Quebec correspondent of the Montreal Herald, writes under date of the 3d inst. as follows: "The steamship St. George has just arrived from Grosse Isle, and brings up 66 convalescent immigrants. The sickness has not abated, and the mortality is much the same, viz: between 30 and 40 per diem. Hospitals all full. I learn that 200 of the passengers of the Virginius have died since her sailing, and it is said that very few of her whole number (upwards of 500) will recover." This is horrible. The sufferings and deaths in the slave ships in the worst era of that traffic did not exceed this.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.—The steam propellor Baltimore, one of the "Erricson line," when opposite Still Point, about thirty-five miles from the city, on the way to Philadelphia on Monday evening, broke one of her connecting rods, which caused such derangement to her engines as to prevent her proceeding on her trip. Fortunately the steamer Constitution, of the Union line, was just meeting her at the time of the accident, and her passengers were enabled to return on her to the city. The Baltimore was left at Still Point, to be towed down by one of the same line. No injury was done to person or property other than damage to the engine.

CAPTURE OF A SLAVER, WITH MORE THAN FIVE HUNDRED SLAVES ON BOARD.—Captain Clarkson, of the ship Woodside, from Canton, learned at St. Helena, that H. B. M. brig Waterwitch, on the 12th of June last, 100 miles W. S. W. from Ainkie, captured an American built brig, having "Bantah, of Portland," painted in large white letters on her stern. No colors or papers on board. On the log slate was written Captain Forsyth. The crew were all Brazilians. She had on board 508 live and two dead slaves. She was sent to Sierra Leone for adjudication. The Bantah was 8 days out from the coast, between Congo river and Abusehe.

POTATO DISEASE.—A correspondent of the Bangor (Me.) Whig states the potato rot had made its appearance in the vicinity where he resides. This is almost the only complaint of the kind we have seen or heard from places this side of the Atlantic the present year. The season is now so far advanced that there is good reason to hope for a general exemption from this evil.

BASENESS.—A respectable and beatiful young girl being out shopping a day or two since, at Boston, was accosted by a man, to whom she was once barely introduced, and most imprudenly accepted an invitation to a soda water establishment. Immediately after she experienced a dizziness and faintness, & was obliged to sit down on some steps in the street. It was found that she had been drugged with opium, &c.; but the fellow had sloped. The Journal says that several cases of that sort had lately occured.

Important Legislative Act.

On the first day of July, 1847, the following act, passed at the session of the Misseuri legislature, went into effect. It is important that its provisions should be generally promulgated.

AN ACT RESPECTING SLAVES, FREE NEGROES, AND MULATTOES

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, as following:

SEC. 1. No person shall keep or teach any school for the instruction of negroes or mulattoes, in reading or writing in this state.

SEC. 2. No meeting or assemblage of negroes, or mulattoes, for the purpose of religious worship, or preaching, shall be held or permitted where the services are performed or conducted by negroes or mulattoes, unless some sheriff, constable, marshal, police officer, or justice of the peace, shall be present during all the time of such meeting or speeches, and disorderly and unlawful conduct of every kind.

SEC. 3. All meetings of negroes or mulattoes, for the purposes mentioned in the two preceeding sections, shall be considered unlawful assemblages, and shall be suppressed by sheriffs, constables, and other public officers.

SEC. 4. No free negro or mulatto shall, under any pretext, emigrate to this state, from any other state or territory.

SEC. 5. If any person shall violate the provisions of this act, he shall for every such offence, be indicted and punished by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 6. Free negroes and mulattoes who are under the age of twenty-one years, and who would not be entitled to recieve from the county court a license to remain in this state, if they were twenty-one years old, shall not be bound out as apprentices in this state.

Approved, Feb. 16, 1847.—St. Louis Reveille.

THE ROAD WEST.—The Pittsburg Gazette, of the 11th instant, understands that the citizens of Salem, Ohio, have engaged the services of Charles T. Whippo, Esq., a distinguished civil engineer, to explore and locate a railroad from that city by the way of Salem, through Canton, Massillon, Wooster, &c., and that he will enter upon his duty in the course of the present week.

The Gulf of Mexico covers a much larger space than many persons suppose. It extends North and South about 600 miles, and East and West about 750. From Alvarado, in Mexico, to Pensacola, Florida, is about 1100 miles. It exceeds in dimension all the fresh water lakes on the globe taken together.

A VALUABLE TABLE.—The following table compiled from the calculations of J. M. Garnet, Esq., of Virginia, will be exceedingly valuable to many of our mechanical readers:

A box 24 inches by 16 square, 22 inches deep will contain a barrel, or 10,852 cubic inches.

A box 24 inches by 16 inches square and 11 inches deep, will contain half a barrel, or 5,476 cubic inches.

A box 15 inches 16,8 inches square and 8 deep, will contain one bushel, or 2,150,4 cubic inches.

A box 12 inches by 11.2 inches square and 8 inches deep, will contain half a bushel or 8.075 cubic inches.

A box 8 inches by 8.4 inches square and 4.2 inches deep will contain one half peck, or 268.8 inches deep.

A box 7 inches by 4 inches square, and 4.8 inches deep, will contain half a gallon, 131.4 cubic inches.

A box 4 inches by 4 inches square, and 4.2 inches deep, will contain one quart, or 67.2 cubic inches.

The measures come within a small fraction of a cubic inch, of being perfectly accurate, as near indeed as any measures of capacity have been made for common use.

An improved WHEAT FAN has been recently used. The machine consists in the following:—1st, in dispensing with the board or shoe at the bottom of the hopper, and substituting a revolving apron or feeding belt to carry the grain on to the seives, or riddles; 2d, a row of vibrating fingers, and chaff, and greatly assists in separating them from the grain as it falls from the apron to the seives; 3d, a contrivance by which three seives, and the fingers before named, are made to vibrate alternately with and opposite to each other, and so quietly as to avoid the noise and jar attendant upon the operation of ordinary machines, while it allows of a greater width of wire and secures a more perfect riddling of the grain.

METHODIST SABBATH SCHOOLS.—Within the limits of the Pittsburgh Conference, there are 369 schools; 3,730 officers and teachers; 18,972 scholars; and their several libraries contain 35,521 volumes. These schools were supported, during the past year, at an expense of $1,594 23 cents; and they have contributed, for benevolent purposes, $456 36.—Pitts. Jour.

DROWNED.—A boy was drowned in the Ohio last night opposite Saw Mill Run. He was the son of Mrs. Williams, employed in the Iron Works of Messrs. Stoner, Sterling & Co.—Pitts. Jour.

The following is an estimate of the amount of contributions, sent by this country for the relief of the Irish and Scotch, since the 1st of January last:—

Amount of contribution in the United States, from January 1, to July 31, 1847.

Through New York Relief Committee,	$200,000
Other Committees in other cities,	250,000
Remittances by Irish and Scotch,	600,000
Total in seven months,	$1,050,000

USE OF BREAKFAST TO THE BILIOUS.—A certain amount of bilious conjestion seems to be natural in the morning. That the bile is periodically stored up, might be inferred from the anatomical structure of the liver, which has not only its system of ducts, but also a gall-bladder to hold that fluid until it is wanted; experimental research, moreover, has shown that little bile escapes into the duodenum except during digestion. For four or five hours, therefore, after eating, the liver is slowly drained of its bile; but when digestion is finished, the flow stops, and the liver gathers up a supply against the next repast. Hence it is after fasting, that the liver is most fully charged with bile; and, as the period of longest abstinence is between the evening meal and breakfast, it follows that there will always be towards morning a natural accumulation of bile, which any of the causes already mentioned, may convert into morbid engorgement. * * * * * * * * * Hence, many who are bilious in the morning feel themselves relieved after breakfast; in other words, after some bile has been drained from the conjested liver. Acting on this hint, I have often recommended a light supper to prevent morning biliousness, and sometimes with success. It keeps the bile flowing during a part, at least, of the night, and thus shortens the period of accumulation.—Child, on Indigestion.

A DISAGREEBLE JOKE.—The N. Y. Sun says that a lady residing in Portland, Maine, expecting a large company to tea, sent for a quantity of cream of tartar to raise her biscuit. By mistake tartar emetic was got. The biscuits were beautifuly light and the guests ate heartily, one lady exclaiming there "never was anything so nice." The meal was hardly over when the emetic began to work, and gentleman and ladies fell to vomiting with might and main. One of the gents, a very fat man, imagining he was poisoned, sent for a doctor, but before that functionary arrived the medicine had taken a severe course, leaving the patient in as bad a condition as a cleanly person could imagine. The cause of the vomito was soon discovered, and the party signed a "total abstinence from hot biscuit" pledge for six months.

A SMART RETORT.—The following is from the pen of a celebrated Irish wit. Lord E. declared, in a large party, that "a wife was only a tin cannister tied to one's tail." Upon which, Lady E. was presented with the following lines:

Lord E. at woman presuming to rail,
Calls a wife "a tin cannister tied to one's tail,"
And fair Lady Anne, while the subject he carries on,
Seems hurt at his Lordship's degrading comparison.

But wherefore degrading? Considered aright,
A cannister's polish'd and useful and bright—
And should dirt its original purity hide,
That's the fault of the puppy to whom it is tied!

DUST YE ARE, &c.—In digging the cellar of a new building in Crown street, above Race, Philadelphia, a day or two ago, several bodies were found, the coffins rotten and decayed, but the bodies seemingly in tolerably good preservation.—When they were brought into the open air, lo! they instantly lost the shape of bodies and crumbled away into a mass of dust. The spot was formerly a grave-yard.

SHERIDAN once wrote: "Women govern us, let us try to render them perfect; the more they are enlightened, so much more shall we be. On the cultivation in the minds of women, depends the wisdom of man. It is by women that nature writes on the hearts of men." Napoleon said:—"The future destiny of the child is always the work of the mother."

PROSCRIBED.—The town of Westfield, in Massachusetts, at a recent town meeting, voted to exclude from the jury box the names of persons who belong to the order of Odd Fellows.

From the Pittsburgh Gazette.

DREAM OF LIBERTY.

Hear you not those iron chains—
Clanking—clanking on the ear?
This is music to the slave:—
Stop—and listen, you may hear!
Yet that captive seems to be
Happy!—dreaming of the free.
See! you not that aged sire
With his hoary locks of gray?
Weary is the darsome night—
Weary is the endless DAY!
Yet HE, smiling seems to be—
While he dream of LIBERTY!
Here the aged and the young—
In these massive walls, that rise
Hear no MUSIC, but these chains—
See no more the sunny skies!—
Yet the tear that flows so free
Will not drown their SLAVERY!
They may lie;—O! God, the heart
Shrinketh from their bitter fate—
In those dungeons, ceaseless years
Look from out the IRON-GRATE!
Dreaming—dreaming of the FREE—
Sighing for sweet LIBERTY!
Oh! ye POETS, lift your pens;—
And ye mighty press, proclaim—
Freedom for the shackled slave—
Liberty in MORE than name!
Then—these chains shall bind no more—
On Columbia's peaceful shore
And these bosoms now that pine
At their dark, unhappy fate—
Come and view the broad sunshine—
Not from out the IRON-GRATE:—
Cast their useless dreams away,
With the weary NIGHT and DAY!

Notice.

The fifth Session of the Muskingum Annual Conference Methodist Protestant Church, will be held at Youngstown, Mahoning county, Ohio; to open on the 1st day of September next, at 9 o'clock, A. M. A brother, competent to the work, has been solicited to conduct the opening exercises; who, we hope, will consent so to do. As Brother Gee's letter, in the Recorder, removes all reasonable apprehension of any difficulty in getting suitable entertainment, it may be expected, as it is much desired, that ALL, both Ministers and Laymen, will be in attendance; and that, too, at the opening of Conference. Come, brethren, cheer us with your presence! Let not the distance keep any away. GEORGE CLANCY, President.

Indiana Conference.—Inasmuch as the next Session of the Indiana and Wabash Conferences was appointed to commence at the same time, and being not far distant from each other, it is thought advisable that Indiana Conference change the time of its Session. I believe there is no provision in our Discipline in reference to this matter; and where there is no law there is no transgression. After having consulted about three-fourths of the members of Conference, and the District Committee, I am requested to publish to all, whom it may concern, that our next Session of the Indiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, will commence the twenty-ninth of September next, at Johnson's meeting-house, 7 miles West of Shelbyville, Shelby county. We earnestly solicit aid from sister Conferences. T. SHIPP.

TANNER'S CREEK CIRCUIT, Indiana District.—Our 4th quarterly meeting is to be held at the East Fork Chapel, embracing the 11th and 12th days of September next, with the expectation that those brethren who were appointed by the last session of the Indiana Conference as fraternal visitors to the next session of the O. Conference, will attend and assist us. May we not hope that Br. W. Polan of Twin Creek Circuit will attend? All brethren, ministerial or lay who can make it convenient to be with us are invited to do so. W. W. PAUL.

The Law of Newspapers.

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered wishing to continue their subscriptions.

2. If the subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publishers may continue to send them till all cash charges are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their papers from the offices to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled their bill, and order their paper discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the paper is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The Courts have decided that refusing to take a paper or periodical from the office, or removing and leaving it uncalled for, is "prima facie" evidence of intentional fraud.

Liabilities of those who take Periodicals.

The law declare that any person, to whom a periodical is sent, is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office or persons with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a Post Office, Store, or any other place of deposite,, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the Postmaster, Storekeeper, &c., are responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or informs the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

POETRY.

Written for the Western Recorder.

The Mother's Reflections, after the Loss of her Son.

O, lovely child ; O, tender plant ;
O, darling Son ; O, fragrant flower ;
Since thou art gone, I'll secret vent
My sighs and tears in many a shower.

Oft have I clasp'd thee in my arms :
Oft hast thou hung upon my breast ;
Oft nightly in the bosom warm,
In tender love I thee caress'd.

Sure thou wast taken in the bloom,—
A tender bud—a sweet May flower ;
Had Providence not call'd thee home
'Till riper years thy form matured,—

Perhaps I might far easier borne
The stroke which I so keenly feel ;
But now thy fleeting months are gone,
And now no balm my heart can heal.

Well may I cry, O, that it were
Now with me as in months that's past,—
When all my sons did with me share,—
But, ah ! that time too short did last.

These lovely babes which I have nurst,
More than the honey-comb were sweet ;
Behold, are now laid in the dust,
And I'm left here to mourn and weep.

With grief, and anguish sore, my breast
Is rent and tortur'd all the day ;
And in the night I find no rest,
Since death my children's snatch'd away.

CONSOLATION.

Why dost thou mourn ? why dost thou tear ?
Why is thy bosom pain'd within ?
Has death stole all thy children dear ?
No, no,—the half is left behind.

And let me ask thee which is best,
The two thou hast, or those that's gone ?
Dost thou not read, They're blest that rest
In Jesus,—God's Eternal Son ?

He says, Let children come to me,—
Let little children to me come ;
Of such shall heaven filled be—
I safely shall conduct them home.

Then do not mourn—O, do not weep—
So much for these beloved ones ;
But trust in yon bless'd morn to meet
With thy two infant darling sons.

Those lovely babes which thou hast lost,
In that day shall be brought to thee,
Arrayed in robes of richest cost,
Which thou must be prepared to see.

Though grief and anguish force thy wail,
Because of death's avenging stroke,
Let moderation still prevail,
Lest that God's anger thou provoke.

Reflect not on the lovely face,
The tender form, the prattling tongue,
But strive by faith their souls to trace
To mansions of redeemed ones.

How bless'd are they who in their youth,
Are freed from this world's vanity ;
No more allured to paths uncouth,
But rest in peace beyond the sky.

FREE MASONRY.

BR. BASSETT—DEAR SIR: I had intended to give the subject of Masonry a fair discussion to the third degree, but according to your notice, and my other calling, it is rendered impossible.—I shall have to pass over many items on which I would wish to speak. I shall farther attempt to show the inconsistency of the religious pretensions of Free Masonry. In the first they are barely named. It is there seen that Masonry pretends to save men—to conduct them to heaven, and bestow on them the rewards of a blessed immortality. It is no great task to show that this is a delusion. There is no system but that of the Bible, by which man can be saved. This, no sober christian will deny, Masonry is not the system of the Bible; therefore, cannot save men, and its pretensions to save them are false. Let a man practice every duty, and believe every article of the Masonic creed, yet he may make his bed in sorrow, and dwell with devouring flames. Masonry has no Saviour, no atonement for sin, no repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, no Holy Spirit, no regeneration and sanctification by the influence of the Spirit, no justification by the righteousness of Christ, and no doctrine of the Trinity. Can men be saved by such a system? Masons may pretend that these things belong to their creed, but it is all pretension. It is not real. They belong to the Christian's creed, and not to the Mason's. These are doctrines in which wicked men can never unite. Their hearts are at war with them. Masonry is so shaped and modeled, that it exactly pleases the carnal mind. There is nothing in the whole economy of Masonry with which the carnal mind is naturally at enmity. All is equally as gratifying to Deists as to any other class of men. To tell men that such a system of religion will save them, is one of the suggestions of the Prince of darkness, to accomplish their ruin.—If Masonry be a system of salvation, and all its pretensions true, Masons are certainly unjustifiable in concealing it from any of the human family, especially from the females, who are equally as needy as the other sex. Why should they be left to perish? Why not teach them the whole duty of man,—open before them the riches of divine grace in boundless prospect, and show them their election of God, and their glorified station in his kingdom? It is equally as important that they should know and see these things, as that Masons should. The doctrines and precepts of the Bible, have no necessary connection with Masonry. They belong to the Bible, and to no other system. They are designed to sanctify, and build up the Church of Christ, and not a Masonic Lodge. What authority, then, have Masons for telling the world, that Masonry teaches the whole duty of man, the same faith and practice with Christianity, and the whole subject-matter of divine economy? They have none. From the Bible, sinful, fallen man, must take his faith and practice. To this as to a light which shines in a dark place, the Lord directs him to go, and learn his whole duty. It is not true, that Jesus Christ is the Spirit, and essence, and foundation of the Masonic institution. He has no more connection with it than he has with Mahometanism or Paganism. He is the spirit and essence of Christianity, and not of Masonry; the foundation of the temple of Jehovah, not of the temple of Free Masons. We may venture to say, that it is yet a secret to the angels in heaven, that the first promise of a Saviour to this lost world, is the great corner-stone in the edifice of speculative Free Masonry. What! the Saviour of men,—the Prince of life,—the second person in the Adorable Trinity,—is he the foundation, spirit and essence, of that system of religion, which is nothing more than an amalgamation of Pagan superstitions, and Jewish ceremonies? Do Masons generally believe this themselves? Do they acknowledge the crucified Jesus, as the foundation of their hopes? How many of the fraternity are avowed Deists, and openly ridicule the doctrines of the Trinity, the Deity, and vicarious sufferings of Christ? Let Christ crucified be preached in Masonic Lodges, and Masons urged by the terror of the Lord, to believe in him; what a scattering,—what a falling off would there be! Did the ancient heathen priests and philosophers and astrologers believe the doctrine of the Trinity and acknowledge Jesus as the foundation, spirit, and essence of their mysteries? Masonic principles are the same in every age and nation. I may be told, that the things I dispute are supported by Masonic traditions. What are Masonic traditions. Who will be so credulous as to embrace a pretended system of religion, which is supported by nothing but Masonic traditions? Mr. Town tells us a remarkable story about the preservation of the five books of Moses by Masons, when the Israelites were carried captive into Babylon—p. 226. We have another of a similar nature in the Monitor, concerning Enoch, who it is said, being inspired by the most High, built a temple under ground, and dedicated it to God—p. 215. These are supported by Masonic traditions.—What wonderful sayings may not a man support by traditions? Have Masons never read what has been written by the infallible dictates of the Divine Spirit? "Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition; for, laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men. Full well ye reject the commandment of God that ye may keep your own tradition." What is the saving power of Masonry then? It is just what it would be without the precepts and doctrines which have been detached from the Bible. It is as unable to save, as if there were no Bible in existence.—Masonry never renovated any part of the world. It pretends to form the most lovely, the most illustrious moral characters, to fit men for heaven, and for its eternal enjoyments; yet it never formed one such character, nor fitted one soul for Heaven, nor reclaimed one sinner from the paths of perdition. There is no person on earth, who can say, that he has been turned from sin to holiness, transformed into the image of Christ, made a new creature, made meet to be a partaker of the inheritance of the saints in light, by the influence of Masonry. Without this change, no person sustains the Christian character, nor that character which is lovely in the sight of God, and literally marked with the highest beauties.—This change is wrought, and this character formed, by the Christian religion, and not by Masonry. The Christian religion has formed millions of such characters; but Masonry never formed one; hence falling short of its highest pretensions, as a religious system; it is one of the greatest delusions ever imposed on the world.—Did the Lord ever pour out his Spirit upon Masonic Lodges, and produce revivals in them, like those we often witness in Christian Churches?—Mr. Bradley has favored us with an interesting account of revivals in Christian Churches; but he has given us no account of such revivals in Masonic Lodges; and I presume he had none to give. Is it not remarkable, we should be told, that Masonry embraces the whole subject-matter of Divine economy; that it embraces and inculcates evangelical truth—Town, p. 37; yet the Lord never owned and blessed it by the out-pouring of his Spirit upon its members? Those who belong to Masonic Lodges, and live under the influence of this pretended sublime institution, are no better than other men; their lives are no more Christ-like—they are no more free from the follies and imperfections of fallen men; Christians are not better Christians. Those who do not profess to be Christians, do not pursue any different course of conduct than the rest of an unbelieving world, but in many instances are rude and profane. It is pretended, as we have already seen, that the ancient Druids, the priests, and philosophers of all heathen nations, understood and taught the mysteries of Masonry. This being the case, and Masonry embracing the subject-matter of Divine economy, and inculcating evangelical truth, why did not those priests and philosophers enlighten and reform the world, and deliver the nations from the darkness of idolatry, and form those characters on which the Divine Being looks with so much complacency, and which are marked with the highest beauties?—Did they inculcate evangelical truth? Masonic principles are the same in every age and nation. Why did not they evangelize the world, and reclaim it from idolatry? Why were they idolaters themselves? Plainly, because Masonry is not what it professes to be. Will not evangelical truth, and the whole subject-matter of divine economy reform men, and reclaim them from idolatry? They will. They have done it, and are continually doing it: but Masonry has never done it, and never can do it. It tried its strength previous to the advent of Him, who is the light of the world. Those priests and philosophers were the wisest, and the most ably qualified to reform the world, they ever were. Then it was, that Masonry made its greatest efforts, and was found wanting. The cloud of moral darkness, which overshadowed this ruined world, was daily becoming more impenetrable. The nations of the earth, were sinking lower in crime, and wandering farther from the true God, and the path to eternal life. As for any thing Masonry could ever do, brighter prospects would never have shone, and better days would never have been seen.—Another pretension of Masonry is, that the ultimate point of its research is a knowledge of Christ, and that the term Logos, or Word, the appropriate of the second person in the Trinity, has been preserved in the Masonic institution.—This word, says Mr. Town, with its Masonic pronunciation, can be traced back in the institution for more than two thousand years, for certainty. What can be the Masonic pronunciation of this word? Is it something mysterious, which God has communicated to Masons, but has never revealed to the church? Says Mr. Town, p. 89, the period cannot be fixed, when the true name of God was not known, and reverenced in the Masonic institution. How inconsistent! Did those ancient heathens know and reverence the true God? What did the Athenians know about the true God? Paul says, For as I passed by and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription: "To the unknown God," whom therefore ye ignorantly worship. This Word however mysterious it may appear to the world, has been understood and held sacred by the Masonic Order, from time immemorial—Mr. Town, p. 87. What coincidence is there between the mysteries of this Word, and the mysteries of the Egyptain priests, into which Pythagoras was initiated? In the quotations, I have now made, several important things are contained, 1. Masons, and even Pagan Masons, have ever been acquainted with the meaning of the term Logos, or Word. 2. Masons, and even Pagan Masons, have always known and reverenced the true name of the true God. 3. The mysteries of the divine word, are the mysteries of Masonry, and have been preserved in the institution. 4. The great object of Masonic research has ever been, to obtain a knowledge of these mysteries. What greater inconsistencies ever came from the pen of a Christian writer! Perhaps Mr. Town would support these things by Masonic traditions; but he must recollect, that such traditions are not credited as infallible, and that ancient men made void the truth by their traditions. He who can believe such strange inconsistencies, can believe any thing, however absurd, if it only belongs to the creed of his own party. Did God ever communicate any information to Masons relative to the Logos, which is not found in the Bible? When a man declares that a true knowledge of the mysteries of the eternal Word, has been preserved in the Masonic institution, he betrays the wildest imagination of an enthusiast. The mysteries of Masonry are solemnly concealed from the world, but the mysteries of godliness are revealed, and ministers are employed by the Great Head of the Church, for the express purpose of making these mysteries known to all men. To make all men see, what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world, hath been hid in God, not in a Masonic Lodge. Ministers and Christians are in possession of no mysteries from God, which they are to conceal from any of their fellow creatures. They are to communicate to the world all the information they can, relative to the Word, which was with God and was God, and was made flesh and dwelt among us.

A. C.

To the Editor of the "Cumberland Presbyterian."

SIR: By your permission, I beg leave to make a few remarks on a communication in your paper, No. 20, volume 7, bearing date, March the 16th, 1847, over the signature of H., on the 'Perseverance of the Saints.' Justice to myself requires that I should be heard through your columns, as I am the Methodist Preacher alluded to by H. in the above communication. Mr. H. sent you for publication, what he calls, the substance of a conversation said to have taken place between two Cumberland ministers and a Methodist preacher. Here first, I notice were two of the Cumberland order, both professed to be collegians, educated in all the learning of the schools, one of them occupying one of the most flourishing situations in Western Pennsylvania, to wit, Uniontown; the other acting as an itinerant, preaching in numerous places. Well, these two Cumberland ministers came into the neighborood of a farmer and miller, who has authority according to the forms and usages of the Methodist Protestant Church, and holds a relation to said church as a local, or unstationed minister, not professing to be a collegian or educated man. A person would on reading the dialogue over the signature of H., think that the two ministers had been encountered by some one of the Bishops, or some one of the Bascombs, or Stocktons, or Maffits, and that supposing themselves to have gained a splendid victory, it was worthy of being chronicled in the church periodical and held sacred in the archives of the denomination. But, no sir, the great H. and his comrade encountered none of these, but a plain, homespun, uneducated local preacher of the Methodist Church, and H. and A. being judges, and giving their own version of the entire matter, claim a victory, and publish it to the four winds that two Cumberland ministers out-talked and out-argued one Methodist preacher. They seem proud indeed, and so far as I am concerned, they are entirely welcome to their hard earned laurels. I am perfectly willing their names shall be handed down to future generations, as conquerors of a Methodist preacher, and as men well versed in controversy on the subject of 'the Perseverance of the Saints.' I am willing, sir, their names shall be enrolled with the names of the fathers. But for the sake of all that is sacred and good, let them not be deified, splendid as their achievement has been.—Great as has been the fall of the Methodists by this signal defeat of a local preacher, let not divine honors be paid to these champions. Yet give them their dues, trumpet their fame in your "Cumberland Presbyterian," and let it be known through the length and breadth of your ranks that Mr. H. thinks he has gotten the better of a Methodist local preacher in a private conversation.—O, what heart-cheering intelligence it will be to your numerous readers to hear that Mr. H. came out of the hands of a Methodist local preacher alive; and how much more heart-cheering it will be for them to hear, that amidst the cannonading on both sides, Mr. O. completely warded off the shot and balls from H. and they received no injury. This was a tempest in a tea-pot. In the onset of our discourse, sir, I informed those gentlemen, that if in the course of the investigation of the subject, I should gain the advantage in the argument, I shall have wherewith to boast: But if eventually two college-bred gentlemen should out-talk an old farmer, they have nothing whereof to boast. But Mr. H., endeavors to show I am wrong on the subject of the perseverance of the saints. I may also be wrong in my conclusions with regard to their boasting, for boast he does, and in his little communication, there is a great deal of egotism comprised in a small compass.

It would be useless for me to attempt to give a detail of the conversation between the two ministers, & myself, as there were two to one, & therefore their testimony of course amongst your people and in your periodical, would be considered preferable to mine. But Sir, I desire to bear testimony that Mr. H's. report of the conversation is a garbled, unfair and dishonest report, and if I can get no other redress, I notify Mr. H. thro' the columns of your paper, that I will carry it up to the Great Court of appeals, to be held on the morning of Eternity, by the judge of quick and dead. He who knows the secrets of each of our hearts shall be judge between us. Now, with regard to acknowledgements, said to be made by myself to H., and O., that I had studied the subject, it is all gratuitous. Such an acknowledement I never made, for if I studied it at all, I think the scripture so plain that I need not be in any worse dilemma than Mr. H. in giving his explanation on Ezekiel, for which I assured him he ought to have a patent right. I am prepared at a proper time and place, single handed to meet Mr. H., and enter into a scriptural explanation of the above subject, and if Mr. H., shall think it any victory to overpower me in argument, he shall be entitled to double praise, i. e. without his comrade O. Please give this an insertion in your paper and send me one copy, or return it to me by mail, if you decline publishing.

Yours, respectfully,

THOMAS MAPEL.

MISS MARIA HAYS,

Departed this life, July 14th, 1847, on Wednesday night about 11 o'clock. She was born February 14th 1823. Her father's residence is a few miles below Sistersville, Va., on the Ohio river. Sister Hays joined what is called the Christian, or Campbellite Church, about six years ago, there being quite a revival at that time in our neighborhood, among that sect. But the most of them at this time are scattered abroad. But we have charity enough to believe that there are some among them who are striving to enter the Heavenly Jerusalem, and among them were found our esteemed, and beloved Sister Hays. When I visited her on Sabbath before she died, she gave every evidence of a calm resignation to the will of God, in all things. At this time we were engaged in singing some Hymns. Her mother observed, that she had a favorite hymn, she often sung; the Book was presented, that had it in, we tried to sing it, with several tunes—but they were not the ones to which she had been accustomed to sing it. So she said if they would give her a sup of water, she would try and start it; and so she did. The Hymn was, "LORD AT THY TEMPLE WE APPEAR." She sung it soft, and as melodiously as an Angel would on his Lyre. The starting of sister Hays' sickness, was liver complaint, the symptoms of which, she first felt last November. It was thought by some, that she had the consumption in the start. Sister Hays was not confined to the bed, until along in March, and then she was not altogether confined, for she would be up & down, until about eight weeks before she died, at which time she took the Measels, which turned her disease to the hasty consumption, that soon ended her earthly pilgrimage. She was reduced to almost a skeleton. From what I have seen, and heard, of sister Hays, there can be no doubt entertained she died happy in God. She bore her affliction with a christian resignation, and a continued desire to be freed from this cumbrous clay. I visited her the Sabbath before her departure, and as I was approaching the house, I saw her bed surrounded by several individuals, and having entered, I learned that she had just had a hard struggle for life. It was a solemn, and melancholy scene indeed. The family all appeared loth to let her go. Her mother exhorted her to be faithful, and the Lord would help her. She at this time threw her withered arms around her fathers' neck; and besought him to prepare, and meet her in heaven. Likewise the mother, and all the children, and her brothers, who had arrived at the years of accountability. I led several of the smaller children to her bed-side. She called them by name, and clasped them in her arms and said, may the Lord bless you. O! it was a time of the shedding of many tears, and I could not help but weep, with those that wept. I looked around and saw the father, and brothers unprepared to meet her in heaven. O! that her dying words may ever sound in the ears, of father, and brother, until they leave off every sin, and live a new life in Christ Jesus our Lord. The mother who is a member in the same Church, has a consoling prospect, of meeting her daughter beyond this vale of tears, if only faithful until death. Our sister did not leave us yet. But revived somewhat. She would occasionally swoon away; and we being all calm, she, through her mother, requested me to sing and pray for her, to which I consented, after first reading the 15th chapter of Paul's first Epistle to Cor. May those that are near, and dear to her by the ties of nature, be resigned to this bereavement, and my prayer to God is, that this dispensation, of his Providence may make impressions on the minds of those who survive, never to be effaced. And may they be induced to seek salvation, and meet Maria in heaven.

Narrative.

The Way Lawyers Use Females.

I instituted an action for a large amount in the county of ———. The suit was brought on a plain promissory note, which I was assured was founded upon good consideration, and I was curious to know what defence could be set up. I was aware that I had to deal with a wily adversary; and when I offered my note in evidence, and closed my case, I was more terrified than surprised when I heard him direct the sheriff to call Mrs. Jackson. She appeared, and to my surprise I beheld a perfect beauty; possessing a sweet countenance, with exquisite form. I saw that my antagonist had formed the same judgment of human nature that I had and that he was about to make the experiment of washing away the obligation of a note of hand by the tears of a female witness. I knew that nothing but a desperate effort could save my client, and that her testimony must be excluded before she had time to cry.

I rose at once. "I perceive," said I addressing the court, "that this lady bears the same name with the defendant; I therefore respectfully request that she be placed on the voire dire." This was done. "Will you be kind enough to say, madam, what relation are you to the defendant?"

"Sir," answered the lady, applying a beautiful embroidered handkerchief to her eyes, "I am his injured wife."

"Then, of course, your honor, the lady's testimony is inadmissible."

"O, very well," interrupted my adversary; "you wish to keep the truth from the jury, do you? Gentlemen of the jury, you see that technicalities are resorted to, to procure a verdict against my client. I hope you will appreciate it gentlemen."

By this time the lady was a beautiful representation of Rachel of old; and one glance at the jury was sufficient to convince me that my case was ruined. I turned to my client—"You are gone, my friend," said I. "Gone!" said he, "gone! my dear sir; don't give up my suit so coolly. I shall be made a beggar if I lose this case, and then what will become of my wife and my poor daughters?"

O, you have daughters, have you? Run and bring them, my dear friend! If they mine, we must countermine. Bring them one and all!

My client rushed out, and as he lived but next door, he almost instantly returned, with a half dozen as pretty girls as could be found anywhere. My antagonist's face fell to zero.

"May it please your honor," I began. "I desire to offer some rebutting testimony."

"Rebutting testimony, C———? why your adversary has not been permitted to examine his witness. What have you to rebut?"

"A great deal, your honor. The witness has given some testimony. She called herself the "injured" wife of the defendant. Injured by whom? By my client. Injured how? By procuring this the subject matter of the suit, from him. Now, sir; I wish to swear the afflicted daughters of the plaintiff, against the injured wife of the defendant."

Here my fair witnesses commenced weeping bitterly, while several of the jury looked on with evident commisseration. My triumph was complete; but I determined to pay off my legal friend in his own coin.

"I do not seek, sir," continued I, "to take up the time of this court and jury, by administering the oath to all these witnesses. I am afraid their heart-rending description of this nefarious transaction (of which, be it remembered, they did not know a syllable,) would unman us all; your honor and this intelligent jury would be tempted to inflict summary justice upon the base wretch who, with a heart like Caligula, and a spirit like Nero, could attempt to doom to a life of beggary, of shame, and perhaps infamy, the offspring of my unhappy, nay, too credulous, too confiding client."

"Sir, in the spirit of a liberal compromise, I will swear but three of them."

Here ensued a burst of anguish from the daughters, and a corresponding and prolonged excitement of the jury. My legal friend soon saw that I had out-generaled him, and so he said, "C———, stop your nonsense; and take your verdict!" Of course I did so; but to show my knowledge of jury nature, I add, that as the foreman passed me, he said, "I rejoice that you have gained your suit, but before you offered to swear those witnesses, your case was a very dark one."

A Man Cutting his own Head off by Mistake.

Amongst my memorandums (writes Sir Jonah Barrington) of singular incidents, I find one which even now affords me as much amusement as such a circumstance can possibly admit of, and as it is, at the same time, highly characteristic of the people amongst whom it occurred; in that view I relate it. A man decapitating himself by mistake is indeed a blunder of true Hibernian character.

In the year 1800, a laborer dwelling near the town of Athy, county Kildare, (where some of my family then resided) was walking with his comrade up the banks of the Barrow to the farm of a Mr. Richardson, on whose meadow they were employed to mow, each, in the usual Irish way, having his scythe loosely over his shoulder and lazily lounging close to the banks of the river, they espied a salmon partly hid under the bank. It is the nature of this fish that, when his head is concealed, he fancies no one can see his tail. There are many wise-acres besides the salmon, of the same way of thinking. On the present occasion the body of the fish was visible.

"Oh Ned—Ned dear," said one of the mowers, "look at that big fellow there, isn't it a pity we ha'nt no spear?"

"May be," said Ned, "we could catch him by picking the lad with the scythe handle."

"Thrue for you," said Dennis, "the spike of yer handle is longer nor mine, give the fellow a dig with it at any rate."

"Ay will I," returned the other, "I'll give the lad a prod he'll never forget, anyhow."

The spike and their sport was all they thought of, but the blade of the scythe which hung over Ned's shoulders, never came into the contemplation of either of them. Ned cautiously looked over the bank, the unconscious salmon lay snug, little imagining the conspiracy that had been formed against his tail.

"Now hit the lad smart," said Dennis; "there, now there raise your fist; now you have the boy, now Ned—success."

Ned struck at the salmon with all his might and main, and that was not trifling. But whether the boy was piked or not never appeared; for poor Ned bending his neck as he struck at the salmon, placed the vertebræ in the most convenient position for unfurnishing his shoulders, and his head came tumbling splash into the Barrow, to the utter astonishment of his comrade, who could not conceive how it could drop off so suddenly. But the next minute he had the consolation of seeing the head attended by one of his own ears, which had been most dexterously sliced off by the same blow which beheaded his comrade.

The head and ear rolled down the river in company, and were picked up with extreme horror at the mill door, near Mr. Richardson's, by one of the miller's men.

"Who the devil does this head belong to?" exclaimed the miller.

"Who ever owned it," said the man, "had three ears, at any rate!"

A search being now made, Ned's headless body was discovered lying half over the bank, and Dennis in a swoon, through fright and loss of blood, was found recumbent by its side. Dennis, when brought to himself, (which process was effected by whiskey,) recited the whole adventure. They tied up the head; the body was attended by a numerous assemblage of Ned's countrymen to the grave, and the habit of carrying scythes carelessly very much declined. Many accidents had happened before from that cause.

VARIETY.

Death not a Painful Process.

We think that most persons have been led to regard dying as a more painful change than it generally is, first, because they have found by what they experienced in themselves, and experienced in others, that sentient beings often struggle when in distress. But we may remark, that struggles are very far from being invariable signs of distress; muscular action and consciousness are two distinct things, often existing separately; and we have abundant reason to believe that in a great proportion of cases, those struggles of a dying man, which are distressing to behold are as entirely independent of consciousness as the struggles of a recently decapitated fowl. A second reason why men are led to regard dying as a very painful change, is because men often endure great pain without dying, and forgetting that like causes produce like effects only under similar circumstances they infer that life cannot be destroyed without still greater pain. But the pains of death are much less than most persons have been led to believe, and we doubt not that many persons who live to the age of puberty, undergo tenfold more misery than they would did they understand correct views concerning the change. In all cases of dying, the individual suffers no pain after the sensibility of this nervous system is destroyed, often without much and sometimes without any previous pain. Those who are struck dead by a stroke of lightning, those who are decapitated with one blow of the axe, and those who are instantly destroyed by a rush of blood to the brain, experience no pain in passing from a state of life to a dead state. One moment's expectation of being thus destroyed far exceeds in misery the pain during the act. Those who faint in having a little blood taken from the arm, or any other occasion, have already endured all the misery they ever would in this world did they not again revive. Those who die of fevers and other diseases, suffer their greatest pains, as a general thing, hours, or even days, before they expire. The sensibility of the nervous system becomes gradually diminished; their pain becomes less and less acute under the same existing cause; and at the moment when their friends think them in the greatest distress, they are more at ease than they have been for many days previous; their disease as far as respects their feelings, begins to act upon them like an opiate. Indeed, many are already dead as it respects themselves, when ignorant bystanders are much the most to be pitied, not for the loss of the friend but for their sympathising anguish.—Those diseases which destroy life without immediately affecting the nervous system, give rise to more pain than those that do effect the system so as to impair its sensibility. The most painful deaths which human beings inflict upon each other, are produced by the rack and faggot. The halter is not cruel as either of these, but more savage than the axe. Horror and pain considered, it seems to us that we should choose a narcotic to either. [Chas. Knowlton, M. D.

KNOWLEDGE IS POWER—CURIOUS ILLUSTRATION.—At a meeting which took place the other evening for the purpose of forming a North London Mechanics' Institution, Mr. Basil Montagu, as an illustration of the maxim that knowledge is power, related to the following anecdote. He was walking a few months ago in Portland Place, when he observed a crowd of people assembled, and found it was in consequence of a large mastiff dog having a lesser one in his gripe. Several persons tried, by splitting the mastiff's ear, and by biting and pinching its tail, to make it let go its hold, but in vain. At last a delicate and dandified young gentleman came up, and making his way through the circle, requested to be allowed to separate the dogs; assent was given amid jeers and laughter, when the dandy slowly drew from his pocket a large snuff-box, and having taken a pinch himself inserted his fingers again into the box, and withdrawing a larger pinch, deliberately applied it to the mastiff's nose. The snuff operated so powerfully on the animal's olfactory nerves, that it not only immediately let go its hold, but made its escape as fast as it could. The dandy was loudly cheered, upon which he stopped for a moment, and said: "Gentlemen, I have merely given you proof that 'knowledge is power.'

Ireland and Scotland.

Dr. Chalmers, among the last acts of a useful life, recommended a direct property tax for the relief of Ireland and Scotland upon all values over 50 pounds. Parliament should "lay no tax on any income below £50, and then tax all above this, not laying the per centage on the whole income, but only on the excess above £50. Thus a yearly tax of five per cent, would amount to ten shillings on all who had £60 a year; to twenty shillings on all who had £70 a year."

The produce of such a tax, if wisely administered, might transform both Ireland and the Highlands into prosperous counties in the course of a few years. He says, too, and powerfully for the temperance cause:—

"Taking the Highlands of Scotland, and the South and West of Ireland together, as the parts to be relieved, and regarding the calamity while chiefly effecting these, as imperial, there is food enough by stopping the distilleries, 'and hindering the destruction of food for the bodies in order to provide poison for the souls:' and money enough to meet the deficiency of revenue, by imposing a transition tax."

BRIEF AND BITTER.—The Boston Post makes the following laconic announcement—more would have been superfluous:—"Mr. Baylies Richmond was found dead in Taunton on Monday, supposed to have died in a fit. He left a wife and family, and a bottle and $20 in his pocket."

EVENING.

The golden sun sinks softly down
Behind the distant west,
And leaves the silent, silver-clouds,
In robes of beauty dressed.

The weary laborer leaves his toil,
And seeks his cottage home,
Where smiles of innocence and joy,
So fondly bid him come.

The cheerful birds, in mellow notes,
Now sing their evening song,
And darting swift on active wings,
Their joyous flight prolong.

The quiet herds, from noon-day heat,
Had sought the cooling shade;
But now in evening's gentle breeze,
They graze the dewy mead.

Upon the aged mountain's brow,
Still rests a lingering ray
Of golden hue—the expiring light
Of the departing day.

Softly there it lingers still,
As if it fain would stay
To guard the pleasant scenes below,
From night's approaching sway.

But ah! 'tis gone—forever gone!
I saw its colors fade:
Along the landscape gently steals,
The twilight's gath'ring shade.

Now night, in death-like stillness, spreads
His mantle o'er the earth,
And man and beast in silence sleep,
And dream of war or mirth.

Save here and there, in some low cot,
A wretched sufferer lies,
Whose numerous cares, or guilty crimes,
Drive slumber from his eyes.

O, will this darkness always last,
And ne'er will day appear,
To gild again the mountain's height,—
The verdant plain to cheer?

Will not the lovely birds again
In yon green forest sing?
Will not the city's streets again
With cheerful voices ring?

Methinks I see the ruddy streaks
Of daylight in the East,
Where golden hues are bursting forth,
And streaming to the West.

O'er forest, field, and vale they spread,
And gild the glitt'ring spire,
And make the sparkling dew drops shine
Like gems of heavenly fire.

All nature hails the new-born day
With smiles of rapturous joy,
While grateful prayers and cheerful songs,
Her sacred powers employ.

'Tis thus when faithful pilgrims die—
Like summer's setting sun
Reclines behind the Western hills—
Their earthly race is run.

In peace they bid the world farewell,
And fix their steady eye
On Canaan's bright and glorious plains,
Where all their treasures lie,

And though their bodies be awhile
In death's dark, dreary gloom,
The Resurrection Morn will break
The silence of the tomb;

And they will rise triumphantly,
O'er death, hell, and the grave,
Through Jesus Christ, their mighty King,
Who died their souls to save.

On the Constitution and Government of the Methodist Protestant Church.

NO. I.

Mr. Editor—Sir: I feel like offering a few suggestions through your noble "Recorder," to the public, on the Constitution and Government of the Methodist Protestant Church. Although much has been said and written on this subject, pro and con, yet a few short articles may be entertaining and useful at the present time.

The Methodist Protestant Church, or denomination, is an Association of individual Churches. Each Church when necessary is divided into classes. The classes are composed of individuals, male and female—of those in full membership, and probationers. For purposes of mutual advantage persons are united in forming a society; and on the same principle, and for the same purpose, societies are united in forming Churches, circuits and stations,—and circuits and stations in forming Annual Conferences, and these in forming the Methodist Protestant Church or General Conference. Now, sir, if the social principle involved in the organization of a class of individual believers is right and Scriptural, then the same principle is equally so when applied to a larger association—the Annual or General Conference. It is true individual members have personal inalienable rights, which should not be infringed but guarded and secured by social combination. Individual societies have inalienable rights which should remain unimpaired in the formation of churches, circuits and stations. Churches, circuits and stations, possess rights which the Annual Conferences should not encroach upon.—Annual Conferences have rights which the General Conference has no right to infringe. Where these rights of members, classes, churches, circuits, and Annual Conferences are duly respected and sacredly guarded, personal, social, and religious liberty have a firmer basis and stronger security, than in an isolated condition of modern Congregationalism or any other system of government whatever.

But does the Constitution and Government of the M. P. Church secure and guard these rights severally? This will be the subject of enquiry in the following numbers under the above caption.

Yours, truly,
WESTERN WATCHMAN.

"WHAT SHALL I DO WITH THEM?"

Thus, in the terms of an honest enquiry, demanded one of our preachers lately, in the State of Pennsylvania, as he was about taking leave of an afflicted family whom he had been laboring to instruct and console by the truths of the Gospel. He had been called by the father of that family, who had lost a beloved child, to repair to the place of his residence—twelve miles distant—for the purpose of conducting the funeral services and of preaching on the occasion. It was in early spring; the air was damp and chilly, and the roads exceedingly muddy and almost impassable. Of course, it would have been unkind and unchristian in him not to go at the call of a brother in trouble, whatever might be the condition of the weather or the travelling; for such a service as that which required his presence could not be deferred or dispensed with. So he went to the village stable, hired a horse and vehicle, promising to pay for the hire ($2) on his return; employed a man to work for him while he should be absent, arranged his affairs so as to accomplish his journey, and set out early in the morning for the afflicted family in the borough of G———. Owing to the badness of the travelling, while being jolted over one of the corduroy bridges on the road, the axle-tree of his hired carriage broke and let him down into the mud. There was no blacksmith or other help near by; and the best he could do was, by dint of sundry contrivances on the spot, to start the screws that held the axle-tree to the carriage; which being done, he shouldered the iron thing and trudged a mile and a half to a blacksmith's shop to get it welded. Arrived there the blacksmith was gone from home, and the only man he could find about the premises was a hired man, half blacksmith and half farmer, who was engaged in a distant field setting posts. He went after him, begged his attendance at the shop, and both together attempted to weld the broken axle-tree. The preacher blowed the bellows, and smote with the heavy sledge-hammer. Neither understanding the work, it was a long time before they could get the two parts of the broken axle-tree to adhere. Perseverance, however, accomplishes all things; and, at last, the parts, were tolerably joined, and the preacher, having paid $1 for the job, swung the axle-tree again on his back, and walked back alone in the mud to his broken carriage—a mile and one half. After two or three hours lost time, and being all exhausted, he was able to harness up again and proceed on his journey. But this accident made him late.—The funeral was appointed at 1 o'clock, but it was 2 o'clock when he reached the house of the afflicted family. The people had been waiting an hour, and became impatient. He had had no dinner; but the house was full of people, and of course that was no time or place for him to be served with any thing to eat. After receiving a gentle rebuke for being so late, he entered the house, and without stopping to sit down or rest himself at all, was obliged to take his position at once at the table, with the bible and hymn book placed on it for him to stand at, and proceed directly to the service. A concluding service was to be held at the grave; and so, after his sermon, he was obliged to join the procession (without yet having eaten any thing) and proceed to the grave yard one mile distant. When the services at the grave were closed, it was 6 o'clock, P. M., and he must reach home that very night. The afflicted father of the child very politely urged him to return to the house with the procession and take supper: the preacher assured him that he should be very happy to do so; for he had eaten not a mouthful since early in the morning, and he had had a hard and unfortunate day's journey and labor; but his horse and carriage were hired, and he had promised to return them that night, as they were specially engaged to another person the next morning. So, return home he must. 'Well,' said the bereaved head of the family, 'we feel greatly obliged to you for your services this day. Your sermon met our case precisely. The consolations you offered have greatly helped to compose our aching hearts: I give you my hearty thanks—I do indeed.' 'But what shall I do with them?' exclaimed the disappointed and injured preacher. 'Do with what?' rejoined the father. 'Why, what shall I do with the many thanks you are so ready to give me?—They will neither pay the stable-keeper for the hire of his horse and carriage, nor the blacksmith for his bill of repairs, nor the man I had to hire to work in my stead at home to-day: nor will they help me to buy bread or clothing for my own body, or for the bodies of my wife and children, who depend upon me for their support.—My time and labors are all the means I have for support, and if I am to give these away, and to pay all the expenses attending a journey performed in order to oblige you, I do not see what good your thanks will do me. I am willing humbly and gratefully to accept them, as you desire; but I beg you again to to tell me "What can I do with them?" The afflicted father looked astonished and aghast. He did not know what such talk meant. He had always supposed that a preacher was made to go and come at the call of any and everybody who needed his professional services; and the thought never entered his head that they would not be performed, just as much a matter of course as that water will run down hill. 'Why, really,' said he, 'you do not expect pay for attending this funeral, do you?' 'I do, brother, it is my only means of living.' 'Then I pronounce you a hireling,' said he indignantly, and turned and left him to go home as he might. He did reach home about midnight, having stopped at a tavern on the way for a late supper, which cost him two Pennsylvania eleven-penny bits. Next day he could do nothing in consequence of the fatigues of the preceding day. Thus, for the sake of preaching a free Gospel, this poor preacher incurred an expense of between four and five dollars in money, and by the fatigues of his journey, his exposure to bad weather and going without his food, made himself sick and was obliged to hire several days work about the premises because he was unable to work himself. This is the way very many preachers are treated; and really it is hard and unjust.

There should be some rule and understanding on the subject of attending funerals. We think it should be thus: If a person belongs to a Society, attends worship and does any thing for the preacher's support, he has a right to demand his attendance and services whenever circumstances require them: if he does not belong to his Society, or does nothing for his support, (being able,) he should pay any preacher he calls upon for his time, labor, and whatever expense he is at in going to the appointment. If an afflicted person or family is poor, why then, of course, a preacher would give his services as cheerfully as the coffin-maker and the sexton would give theirs at the same time; but if not poor, the preacher deserves his means of support for his labors, as honestly as other men deserve theirs for their labors.

Noble Deed.—A preacher in a slave State, whose whole heart is set upon advancing the cause of emancipation, but who has but little of this world's goods, recently redeemed a colored woman, formerly a slave belonging to his father. "This woman," says the noble-hearted liberator in a letter to a friend, "sustained to me a relation different from all others of her people. She had labored for my food, clothing, and education, from my very childhood. To redeem her was to give up some land which I owned, that was purchased partly by her labor. It was to give into her hands liberty for her toil for me. This I would like her to have done for me, had I as a slave labored for her, and was still subjected to the wrongs of a slave. Her posterity will ever afterwards be free also. To do it, I mortgaged the last piece of land I owned. I am now at the bottom of my purse, and shall still hold on to Kentucky, with more hope of final success thro' the blessing of God than ever. I gave the woman a passport to go free immediately, and am making arrangements to have her recorded free at the first sitting of the county court."—Nat. Era.

Doing the Genteel Thing.

I heard a story the other day too good to be lost. A church in the country had just engaged a good minister, who had not attended long, when, after preaching on a Saturday, the deacon gave him a pull, and said—

"I want to speak with you."

After going aside the deacon says—

"Brother, I saw something about you to-day that hurt my feelings."

"What was it my dear brother?" said the minister in surprise; "do tell me."

"It was about your arm, while you were preaching—I saw it."

The poor minister became still more alarmed and anxious to know in what way he had hurt the old father's feelings.

The deacon pointed to his elbow. "There it is yet," said he.

The minister began to brush his sleeve.

"Stop," said the deacon, "you can't mend it now; there is a hole in your coat, right on the elbow. I am hurt to see our minister have to wear such a coat. Now, I want you to go to—— and pick you out a coat-pattern, a black coat, and I'll pay for it."

The minister thanked him kindly, and was entirely relieved of his fright.

TEMPERANCE.

Temperance Song.

Air—"Sparkling and Bright."

Sparkling and bright in liquid light,
Is the rill from the gurgling fountain;
Clearly it gleams in the rosy beams
Of the sun, that gild the mountain.
Then drink your will of the crystal rill,
And leave the cup of sorrow,
Which, sparkling to-night with deceitful light,
Will sting thy soul to-morrow!

Like a gem each drop comes bubbling up;
Then forth from the cool spring flowing,
Reflects Heaven's ray, and purls on its way
Bloom, peace, and joy bestowing.
Then drink your will of the crystal rill, &c.

Touch not the wine, tho' it brighly shine,
When nature to you has given
A drink so sweet your lips to meet—
A nectar that flows from Heaven!
Then drink your will, &c,

Temperance Societies.

In the sixth chapter of the Book of Numbers, we find an account of an Order among the Jews, called the Nazarites, who took upon themselves a vow not to drink wine or strong drink. This was, to all intents and purposes, a Temperance Society, and it is the first of which we have any account.—B. C. 1490.

Jonadab, the son of Rechab, formed a Family Temperance Society, under a pledge to drink no wine,—B. C. 590,—of which we have an account in Jeremiah's prophecy,—chapter thirty-fifth.

No other definite account of a similar association is found in ancient history, unless we consider the Christian Church itself as such. It is in fact a Temperance Society, but it does not stop here, it enjoins all virtues, and is a divine institution.

We have many interesting facts going to show that efforts to promote temperance in individual cases, have been frequent in all ages of the Christian era, but we read of no regular Temperance Society—unless, perhaps, one in Germany, about the middle of the sixteenth century, called the "Order of Temperance"—until the commencement of the present century, when Temperance Societies were formed in this country.

The earliest of our associations for the promotion of Temperance in particular, claims to have originated about the year 1800, the second, 1808, &c. After this, the record of the Temperance Reform is plain and definite.

On the 13th of February, 1813, a society was formed at Boston, called the "Massachusetts Society for the suppression of Intemperance."

The Virginia State Temperance Society was organized in November, 1825, all the State north of her having previous established societies.

The American Temperance Society was organized at Boston, February 13th, 1826.

The N. Y. City Temperance Society was formed March 9th, 1829.

The N. Y. State Temperance Society was formed April 2nd, 1829.

In 1831, the American Temperance Society despatched the Rev. Dr. Hewitt to be present and assist in oganizing the "British and Foreign Society for the promotion of Temperance."

In the same year a Temperance Society of some note, was established at West Point, New York.

On the 26th of February, 1833, a congressional Temperance Society was formed in this city.

The American Temperance Union was formed in N. York, in May 1833.

The Drunkard Maker.

Mr. savage, in a recent address to the children, at Temperance Hall, said,—"the drunkard maker is to the Temperance cause what the devil is to Christianity—the Great Tempter!" The remark was very forcible, but not more so than true. The man who induces another to partake of intoxicating drinks may rest assured that God is displeased with him for it, and that a curse is pronounced against him in the Bible. "Wo unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that puttest thy bottle to him and makest him drunken," (Hab. ii. 15.)—How awfully solemn is the reflection, that there are thousands now living who make it their business to give drink to their neighbors; and how is the painfulness of the reflection increased by the fact that such a business is lawful in this and other enlightened countries.—Columbian Fountain.

From the Western Christian Advocate.

Temperance in Indiana.

Mr. Editor,—I wish, through your paper, to present a few thoughts relative to the growth of intemperance among several communities. It is true, the sober and reflecting citizens of Indiana have made unwearied efforts to put down the evil; and we want no stronger testimony that a majority of the citizens are unfavorable to "license," than the act of 1846, which compelled voters, favorable or unfavorable, to write "license" or "no license," in a legible manner, upon the back of their respective tickets. But, unfortunately, the sons of "Bacchus," the last session of the legislature, gained considerable of a victory—a victory based upon stratagem, and not upon open triumph; for be it recollected, that all the neutral votes, by this act, were thrown into the scale of intemperance, while none but those that took the trouble to write "no license," were in its favor; and to charge all the unfortunate results of this act upon the legislature of our flourishing state, would be more than uncharitable.

However, the facts in the case are unfolding. In our towns, villages, and on our highways, sign after sign is hoisted; the flood-gates are partially opened, and, if not speedily checked, will flow in every direction, without control. These establishments are sinks of pollution: they drown fathers in liquid poison, and weeping mothers and guiltless infants are brought to misery and want. The advocates of the license system inflict all this cruelty, in order to indulge avarice. In this, "avarice and cruelty are twin sisters."

When I reflect upon this subject, my memory is stung with the recollection of past events. In one of the villages of this state, I was a spectator of one of the most appalling circumstances. I knew a gentelman and his lady who were in possession of all fine qualifications; they were social and affectionate as husband and wife; they were famous for industrious habits, and became the parents of fourteen children; they were quite intelligent, and placed a high estimation upon educating their first children. But, alas! the father became a constant visiter of those sinks that stand so high on the rolls of impiety and crime. Railing, threatening, and malignant passion raged within him. His companion made use of all prudent and skillful measures to reclaim him; but no—his fury rose to madness. I will only advert to one instance. It was cold, weather, and about eleven o'clock at night: this malignant and treacherous monster, with horrible imprecations and unmerciful blows, routed the whole family, male and female. Their cries and shrieks were heard in almost every direction. A boy, about fifteen years old, made his escape from a deadly weapon, by rushing through a window. Truly, in the language of the poet, a well-regulated license system:

"Never smiles but when the wretched weep,"

I shall not stop to detail the dreadful end of those that sold this man the fatal draught, altho' time has unfolded it. The above is a woful picture, nevertheless true; and hundreds and thousands of similar cases have proclaimed, with a trumpet tongue, the iniquity of such a system. A few years ago, there was scarcely a town, village, or neighborhood, that escaped such heart-rending scenes.

And now, permit me to ask, where is the remedy? It is said, in history, that Philip, of Macedonia, feared more the forcible declamations of Demosthenes than all the armies and fleets of the Athenians; for nothing escaped his penetrating eyes, or consummate prudence. He shook apathy from the public mind, by portraying present and prospective evils. And if the public speakers of the present day would thunder, with half the vehemence of this orator, from the respective positions they occupy in our several communities, certainly intemperance would come tumbling from its ugly throne.

Fruit-Preserver.—We notice an important invention which has been brought into use near Philadelphia, by means of which all perishable articles, fruit and vegetable and even animal, can be preserved for months, and even years. It consists of an immense chamber, so cut off from the influences of heat as always to be at an uniform temperature, a degree or so above the freezing point. There is hardly a perishable article which has not been experimented upon with perfect success.

Miscellaneous.

VOLTAIRE.

We have been interested in an article in the Biblical Repository for July, on the Life and death of Voltaire. All the facts there stated are not new, but they are impressive and instructive, and especially the circumstances attending the death of this infidel, should serve to annihilate all tendency to the gloomy views which he embraced. We give the concluding part of the article in question:

The account given by the Abbe Baruel; and known through one channel or another, to most readers of religious miscellany, is considerably more particular. The Abbe indeed gives no authority for his statements, the reason of which probably is that his work was so nearly contemporaneous with the events described. Voltaire died in 1778, and the history of Jacobinism was published sometime before the close of the last century. The death of Voltaire, was at all events, too recent to permit any material misrepresentation; and the Abbe challenges denial of his statements.

In spite of all the sophisters flocking around him in the first days of his illness, he gave signs of wishing to return to the God he had so often blasphemed. His danger increasing, he wrote the following note to the Abbe Gauthier: "You had promised me sir, to come and hear me. I entreat you would take the trouble of calling as soon as possible. Signed,

VOLTAIRE.

Paris, the 26th Feb., 1778."

A few days after he wrote the following declaration, in the presence of the same Abbe Gauthier, the Abbe Mignot, and the Marquis de Villevielle, copied from the minutes deposited with M. Momet, notary at Paris.

"I, the undersigned, declare, that for these four days past, having been afflicted with vomiting of blood, at the age of eighty-four and not having been able to drag myself to the church, the Rev. the Rector of St. Sulpice having been pleased to add to his good works, that of sending me the Abbe Gauthier, a priest, I confessed to him, and if it pleases God to dispose of me, I die in the Holy Cathòlic Church in which I was born; hoping that the divine mercy will deign to pardon all my faults: if ever I have scandalized the church, I ask pardon of God & of the church.

Signed, VOLTAIRE.

March 2d, 1778."

"In the presence of the Abbe Mignot, my nephew, and the Marquis de Villeveille, my friend."

Voltaire had permitted this declaration to be carried to the Rector of the St. Sulpice, and to the Archbishop of paris, to know whether it would be sufficient. When the Abbe Gauthier returned with the answer, it was impossible for him to gain admittance to the patient. The conspirators had strained every nerve to hinder the chief from consummating his recantation, and every avenue was shut to the priest whom Voltaire himself had sent for. Terror and rage then got complete mastery of the dying man.—D'Alembert, Diderot and some twenty others who had beset his apartment, never came near him but to be received with reproaches and execrations. "Begone," he would exclaim, "it is you who have brought me to my present condition!" Then succeeded alternate blasphemies and prayers. Sometimes he would cry out in plaintive accents, "O Christ! O Jesus Christ!" and then would complain that he was abandoned both by God and man. The scene was too dreadful to be endured. His friend and physician, M. Tronchin, withdrew in terror, declaring that the death-bed was awful, and that the furies of Orestes could give but a faint idea of those of Voltaire. The Marshall de Richelieu also fled, acknowledging that the scene was too terrible to bear."

To this account, a striking confirmation is added by the anecdote given by Bishop Wilson, to the effect that "the nurse who attended him, being many years afterwards requested to wait on a sick Protestant gentleman, refused till she was assured that he was not a philosopher; declaring, if he were, she would on no account incur the danger of witnessing such a scene as she was compelled to do at the death of M. Voltaire." The excellent Prelate, in whose Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity this anecdote occurs, declares that he received the account from the son of the gentleman to whose dying bed the woman was invited.

All this was much too unphilosophical, we suppose, and much too solemn, to find any place in the Lives of Men of Letters. Those, however, whose reading or experience has given them better information than Lord Brougham had, of the way in which bad men and haters of Christ do often die, will find a strong argument from analogy, for the truth of the Abbe Baruel's statement.

D'Alembert also shrank when he came to face death, and would have betrayed his remorse and fear, by calling in religion to his aid, had not Condorcet barred the door against the priest and rendered him inaccessible. "Had I not been there," said Condercet, relating the circumstances, "he would have flinched also."

Diderot, too, was willing to find something better than philosophism to lean on in his last hours. He had in his employment, as librarian, a young man of a religious turn of mind, who felt greatly concerned at the thought of his dying without repentance.—After having, by the advice of a clergyman, made the matter a subject of prayer, he ventured to address Dideror with regard to his preparation for death. "Are you certain," said he, "that your philosphy has not left you a soul to save? I have no doubt on that point; and I cannot reflect on it without warning my benefactor to avoid the eternal misfortune that may await him. See, sir, you have yet sufficient time left; and excuse an advice which gratitude and your friendship force from me." Diderot heard him with attention, and even melted into tears. He promised to give the subject his serious consideration.

The result was that the Cure M. de Tarsac was invited to assist him; and after several conferences, Diderot prepared for a public recantation. His own private circle of friends however, watched him as he had helped watch Voltaire. They persuaded him that he was imposed upon, and that a little country air would immediately recover him. Diderot for some time resisted their entreaties, but finally consented to try the country.—His departure was kept secret. It was pretended he was still in Paris, and the deception was carried on by issuing daily reports of his health. In the meantime the jailors, who had seized his person, watched him till they had seen him expire, and then brot' the body back to Paris, and gave out that he had died suddenly at table. He expired the 2d of July, 1784, and was represented as having died calm in all his atheism, with no signs of remorse. It will not be easy to satisfy any one who has had the least observation of the power of a guilty conscience, and the "fearful looking for," with which the last hours of the wicked are often attended, that all this agitation, shrinking and sending for clergymen, respected a question of a greater importance than securing a christian burial.

The Abbe Baruel may have been led by his alarm, and the liveliness of his imagination, to overdraw somewhat the picture he has given of conspiracy against religion and government; but for facts like the above, his testimony is amply sufficient. We are ourselves well informed of two instances in a considerable Western town, in which the companions of dying infidels, seeing them begin to "flinch," closed round their bed, bolted the door against every religious person, and in one of the cases, stupified their victim with brandy, till he died. Gather not our soul, O Lord! with sinners!

Now, we will not deny that the world may be wiser and better; in the long run because such a man as Voltaire lived in it; but we think it will be in a very different way from what Lord Brougham anticipates. That "Glory to God in the highest" will accrue from it in some way; we have no doubt.

"If plagues and earthquakes break not heaven's design,
Why then a Borgia or a Cataline?"

At the feeble malice of those who thus take counsel against the Lord and against his Anointed, he that sitteth in the heavens sometimes laughs and has them in derision; and again speaks unto them in his anger, and vexes them in his sore displeasure. But so far human happiness or improvement is concerned; there is a frightful deduction to be made, on account of those whom Voltaire has taught to live, and fitted to die, like himself. Perhaps the man never lived, who is followed in his course through eternity by the accumulating execrations of a greater number of victims. "With what dreadful vehemence (says Jay in one of his Evening Exercises) did the writer once hear a fine young man, while dying, exclaim, again and again 'O, curse you, Voltaire.'"—How it must roll on, through age after age, here and hereafter, in one broad, deep, swelling current of blasphemies and agonies, the mind shudders to think of!

The crisis, however, is already well passed. The most formidable conspiracy ever organized against religion, with every circumstance of advantage presented by a corrupt church, and people, at that time, as Voltaire often says, half monkey, half tiger, recoiled in wide ruin on its inventors. True religion raises her placid head from the waves, as the tempest sweeps away, and now the scriptures and the petits livres portatifs, circulated in connexion, are sowing all over France the seed of a different harvest: that shall one day wave like Lebanon, when the influence of Voltaire shall have withered like the grass of the earth.

NEWS ITEMS.

Dificulty Between Gen. Scott and Gen. Worth.—The New Orleans Picayune of the 8th instant contains a large number of old letters from Mr. Kendall, one of which, written at Puebla, on the 27th of June, has the following paragraph:

A court of inquiry, called by General Worth, has been in session for a day or two. It seems that General Scott has in some way expressed himself dissatisfied with not only the terms of the capitulation entered into with the Pueblanos by General Worth, but also with some of the acts of the latter while in command of the city.—General Worth promptly called for an investigation, and I trust that all may be satisfactorily settled.

The Picayune, referring to these letters, remarks:

The most interesting point touched upon in them is a difficulty between General Worth and General Scott, the former having demanded a court martial. This is mentioned in a letter of June 27th. Of the issue of the affair we are totally in the dark. The next package of letters despatched by Mr. Kendall were only two days later, and though they came safely to hand they said nothing about the difficulty. There had hardly been time for the action of a court martial. The next package forwarded to us contained our letters from the 1st to the 11th of July, so far as we can learn. The courier, it will be recollected, was overpowered by the Mexicans, severely wounded and left on the road.—He made his way to Vera Cruz, but had lost all his letters save the fragment of a postscript to a note of July 11th. Here is a hiatus of eleven days, which we very much miss. Were it supplied, we might probably clear up this affair of Gens. Worth and Scott, and explain other allusions in our letters which we do not entirely understand.—

Mail Contracts.

We are gratified to learn that Messrs. J. & P. Voorhees, in addition to their former extensive contracts, have obtained the contracts for carrying the U. S. Mails from Terra Haute to St. Louis on the line of the National Road, and also via Springfield to St. Louis—making a continuous line from Dayton to St. Louis.

The time through will be 60 hours—or three hours less than three days. These lines are now in operation.

A large number of new and splendid coaches have been put upon the road. The teams are all good and every effort will be made to render the travelling public comfortable.

This is now by far the best route to reach the great city of the West.

Messrs. J. & P. Voorhees in addition to the former stock upon the roads, have put on thirty-three new Troy coaches, and sixty-eight teams.—Transcript.

Dreadful Disaster at Sea.—Immense Loss of Life.—The Patriot has a Telegraphic dispatch announcing the receipt at New York, by a vessel just in port, of the distressing intelligence that the ship Iduna, which left Hamburg for New York, with two hundred and six passengers on board, foundered at sea on her way over, and one hundred and seventy-two of the passengers met with a watery grave. The commander of the vessel, Capt. Mobery, was also lost. Those who escaped were picked up at sea by a vessel that fortunately came to their assistance in time. They were clinging to the wreck in a condition of dreadful suffering.

WESTERN REGORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, AUGUST 26, 1847.

To Correspondents.—Br. J. P., we are sorry to say that it was thought best not to publish your article, as there are some things contained in it, at which we fear many of our readers might take offence. We have placed it upon file, until the return of the Editor, who is now absent. It is altogether probable that he may, after making some slight alterations, publish it, or, possibly, he may publish it as it is.

☞ Brother W. S., you are informed that, in the last No. of the "Recorder," the Editor resolved to publish no more articles in relation to "Secret Societies;" as a great deal has already been said upon that subject, which has not benefitted us, other than to cause a number of our subscribers to order us to discontinue their paper. There are but few men who belong to no Society,—whether it be a secret one or not,—and there are fewer Societies which have no opponents. We feel in duty bound, when compelled to choose of two evils, to choose the least. We wish not to wound the feelings of any; but we believe to stop the publication of such articles, will wound the feelings of the smallest number.

☞ Those who have sent us funds, since the departure of the Editor will have patience; as they will be duly acknowledged, when he returns.

☞ In another column will be seen a letter from the Editor, who was, at that date, on his way to Waynesburg, Pa., to attend the meeting of the Pittsburgh An. Conference, (M. P. Ch.) On his return he will write again from the same place, and, probably, give a condensed report of the proceedings of said Conference.

Church Differences.—We learn from the Herald, published at Princess Ann, Somersett county, Md., that the Rev. Mr. Brindle, who was appointed by the the Philadelphia Conference, at its last session, to Northampton circuit, has been compelled to leave, in consequence of the opposition he met with, growing out of the question of division, which has of late disturbed the peace of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in that quarter.

☞ We have given rather a lengthy account of the prospects of peace, in to-day's paper; believing (and we judge from the number who have come into our office and asked for "war news,") that it will be more satisfactory to the majority of our readers to give the proceedings entire, than merely to give extracts from it.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR.

Wheeling, Va., Wed., Aug. 18, 1847.

We left Zanesville at 4, P. M., on yesterday, for this place. We were favored with a seat in the mail coach, by which we reached this place more than two hours in advance of the second coach which started at the same time. Ours would leave the way mail at intervening post offices, and post off, leaving it to be taken up by the other coach. We were oppressively crowded most of the way, but had a tolerably pleasant company, though not altogether such. Our most agreeable fellow passenger was Charles Fox, Esq., one of the oldest members of the Cincinnati bar, whom we had known for many years. As we approached Hendrysburg, Belmont Co., Ohio, we were surprised to find the wires of the telegraph broken, in several places, dangling upon the ground. At a place where the line intersects the turnpike, they were hung just low enough to come in contact with our driver's head, and he came very near being seriously injured by it. We supposed that our Zanesville and Columbus neighbors were looking out for despatches, perhaps for war news, and would look in vain, till repairs could be made. We were told in the village that the breaks were supposed to have been accidental. We arrived in safety this morning, before 4 o'clock, and soon found that there was no ready means of reaching Waynesburg from this place. We readily found the dwelling of our friend J. L. Sands, where we found a home and a welcome, during our stay. Much enquiry has been made for a conveyance for us to the Conference, but the only means we meet with, is to take a horse from a livery stable. This we expect to do to-morrow morning, and hope to reach Waynesburg, the following evening, 40 miles.

Wheeling has become a large, thriving and prosperous business place. And we see numerous valuable buildings going up in every direction. A gentleman of Philadelphia, has taken the contract for constructing a stupendous wire suspension bridge over the Ohio, at this point, its entire length of a single span. We are informed that the work is commenced. The extension, and completion of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road to this point, also promises much for Wheeling.

☞ "Let us vote the foul demon, Alcohol, out of the land," says a New York gentleman writing from Vermont, where the people have already done so.

"We respond from the seat of our National Government,—"Amen." Would to God we might live to see the day—we do hope to see it—when this grand object of all our Temperance efforts will have been effected,—the banishment of the poison from every State of our glorious Union by the free will of the people. This ought to be done—the sooner the better."—Columbian Fountain.

And we too, from the Western Valley, respond, God speed the time when the wheels of the great Temperance Car, which have been making such rapid revolutions throughout our glorious Republic, shall have rolled on to complete victory. We hope to live to see the day when our own native State, Ohio,—of which we proudly boast,—shall erase from her statutes the license granting power, and there shall not be left in her archives, one word to support the evil of intemperance. We assure our brethren in the Temperance cause, who reside at the seat of Government, that we are making rapid strides towards the completion of this grand object; and hope, ere long, to boast equally with our sister State, (Maine) that we have voted the "foul demon" from our borders, and thrown around every family the broad escutcheon of Temperance.

The Annual Exhibition of the Columbus Horticultural Society, will be held on the 7th and 8th of September next.

☞ We would direct the attention of our readers to a notice on our first page, under the head "Agricultural;" of a Convention of Nurserymen and Fruit Growers, at Columbus, Sept. 29th and 30th, 1847,—as taken from the Ohio Cultivator. We thought it more satisfactory to publish the article.

The Magnetic Telegraph.—Daily despatches are received by the Zanesville Courier, from the Eastern cities, by means of the Telegraph. It is also in operation as far as Columbus, and will soon be completed to St. Louis (via Dayton, Cincinnati, and Louisville, Ky.) We believe it is to be extended from Louisville to New Orleans.

Who can fathom the depths of the mind of man? or who can tell where improvements and inventions are to end? Would that such rapid strides were making toward that era when the Lion and the Lamb shall lie down together. We think despatches from the South would be looked for with much less interest.

Ohio, State Board of Agriculture.—The meeting of this Board, held on the 5th instant, (August,) not being attended by a full quorum of members, the President of the Board, after some consultation, has given notice that a District Agriculture Fair and Exhibition, will be held on Wednesday, the 20th of October next, at Wilmington, Clinton County, Ohio. The friends of the cause are expected to make the necessary arrangements, publish a premium list, &c.

"The Soul and the Body," is the title of a well printed and neatly bound book, consisting of 270 pages, by George Moore, M. D., Member of the College of Physicians, London, forwarded to us by Harper & Brothers, Publishers, New York; in which is clearly set forth the power of the soul over the body, considered in relation to Health and Morals. We can conscientiously say that this is a book which is not only interesting, but useful; deserving a place in the library of every christian family throughout the land. The subjects on which it treats, are momentous; subjects which should engage the attention of every reflecting mind.

The above work is for sale at Reed's Book Store, Main street, north side, between Fifth and Sixth, Zanesville, Ohio. Also, new books received by them every week.

American Pulpit.—The August number of this welcome monthly visiter has been received. It contains two sermons, by Rev. Daniel Sharp, D. D., Pastor of Charles st. Baptist Church, Boston, which are quite edifying. It also contains two other sermons, and some miscellaneous matter, which cannot but be pleasing to every lover of true christian piety, into whose hands it may fall. Terms, $1, in advance. Address Samuel Chism, (post paid) Worcester, Massachusetts.

Dont Forget.—Those who are indebted for the Western Recorder, will greatly oblige us, by paying up before the close of the present volume. It will be a convenient opportunity to send by the preachers or delegates to the approaching Conferences. We need to receive, about this time, several hundred dollars, to enable us to meet claims against us which have grown out of our publishing enterprise. Dont forget. We shall have to discontinue many at the close of vol. viii, if they do not pay up.

A Great Dependance is also placed in the liberality of those true friends of the paper, who pursue the good old custom of paying in advance. From them we trust we shall have some essential aid in entering upon our next volume. Read the next paragraph.

Annual Register, M. P. Church, 1848.—This little publication, so much demanded by the Church, is now in press, and will be issued at an earlier date than heretofore. An edition of 6000 copies of the first half of the pamphlet, including the Calendar, is already worked off from the press. And we only wait to obtain the statistics of the several Annual Conferences to be held within a few weeks, when we expect to make up the remaining part of the publication. Every subscriber for the Western Recorder who pays $2 in advance for vol. 9, shall have a copy of the Register sent him by mail, so soon as it is issued.

Information Wanted—Statistics of Conferences.—We are about publishing the Annual Register of the M. P. Church, for the year 1848, and are anxious to obtain, in view of this publication, the statistics of those Annual Conferences which have not published their Minutes in full. We desire to have the name of the President of each Conference, the number of Stations, Circuits, Missions, Itinerant ministers and preachers, Unstationed ministers and preachers, Members, and houses of worship in each District. Also, the time and place of the next session of each Annual Conference. If the secretaries, or any other having the information, will communicate it to us without delay, we shall be greatly obliged, and will be pleased to reciprocate the favor in any possible way.

Cincinnati Correspondence of the Western Recorder.

Cincinnati, Aug. 2, 1847.

Dear Recorder: Circumstances again render it my pleasant privilege to present to your readers a sketch of another celebration, or rather celebrations of the Elm-street M. P. Mission Sunday School; and, I am glad to say, upon this occasion, as upon that, it was a happy, very happy day for the little people of the Mission. So many agreeable associations were connected with the Christmas celebration of the school, that the teachers and children, as with one mind, determined that the anniversary of our country's freedom, should not pass without suitable manifestations of praise and gratitude to the donor of the blessing. Accordingly, Monday evening, 5th of July, was named as the most suitable time. Through the liberality of A. H. Ernst, Esq., who presented the school with ten beautiful cedar trees, the Church was very tastefully adorned with arches, festoons, &c., presenting a most agreeable contrast to the eye. At 8 o'clock the school took their places, and the little orators, 12 girls and 4 boys, were seated upon a platform, in and around the pulpit. The speakers were designated by a blue scarf, upon which was seen the word "Mission." At this early hour many were obliged to retire, from inability to gain an entrance to the house. Br. O. Warrington opened the exercises by prayer, after which the school sung a very appropriate hymn, commencing—

Loud raise the peal of gladness,
'Tis Freedom's natal day;
Our land that once in sadness
Groaned neath a tyrant's sway,
In Liberty rejoices,
Aw'd by no monarch's rod;
Lift high our joyous voices—
Yes—lift them up to God!

This was again followed by an excellent address upon "Our Country," and again succeeded by singing—

Happy land! Happy land!
What e'er my fate in life may be, &c.

Then followed a well delivered address—contrasting our present happy condition, with the bloodshed and strife, and turmoil of the past ages of the world. It was a noble effort. But a slight sketch of each exercise would occupy too much space, and then would entirely fail to convey the effect produced upon the minds of the audience. Suffice it to say, that each speaker grew more eloquent, and each song seemed to thrill more deeply the feelings of parents and friends.

The address on Prayer—Dying Boy—My Mother in Heaven—The appeal in behalf of the school Our advantages—The triumph of the Gospel,—The dialogue by two Misses of the First Class, upon the discouragements and encouragements of the Sabbath School Teacher, were all well calculated to stimulate us to a noble discharge of our duty to God, our country, and ourselves. Several times, such was the effect of the little appeals that nearly all were bathed in tears. The speaking, in connection with the singing of ten hymns, prolonged the exercises untill 10½ o'clock; and yet such was the interest manifested, that but one individual left the house. It was truly an anniversary of our Country's Freedom long to be remembered.

In consequence of the crowded state of the Church, it was thought advisable to repeat the celebration at the Sixth-street Methodist Protestant Church. Accordingly on the evening of the 13th of July, the exercises were repeated to a very large congregation, who manifested the highest degree of interest and satisfaction upon the occasion. It was a very pleasant feature in the Sixth-street Church that the singing was alternately performed by the two schools, filling all hearts with the spirit of joy, by their melodious warblings and reminding many that not only here is a Happy Land, but in the language of one of the hymns—

There is a happy land,
Far, far away,
Where saints in glory stand,—
Bright, bright as day!
O, how they sweetly sing,
Worthy is our Saviour King;
Loud let his praises ring,
Forever more!

The appeal in behalf of the school, mentioned above, resulted in a collection of near $40 for its benefit. In conclusion, Mr. Editor, the results of this celebration are now being realised, and they will be seen after many days. The school is in a more prosperous condition at this time, than ever before. It may emphatically be said, good is daily done. It now numbers 20 Teachers and 140 scholars, of these, more than twenty are orphans. God bless the Mission school and make it more useful and more happy. E.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Br Bassett: I now write to you, for the first time, concerning the condition of our little Circuit, called White River Circuit. Our first, second, and third quarterly meetings are over, and there have been no particular revivals of religion amongst us. We had the labors of Br's. P. Clingler, H. Collings, J. Shipp, and others; and we hope seed has been sown in good ground. Pray for us, that it may bring forth an hundred fold.

Some accessions have been made to the church, and we have perfect peace in our borders. Our 4th quarterly meeting will be held at G. W. Canes' 5 miles south east of Moresville, on the last Saturday in August. Come down to Macedonia and help us, all hands.

Yours, in Christ, S. SOLOMON.

At a special meeting of Capitol Division, No. 72, Sons of Temperance, held at their Hall in the city of Columbus, on the evening of the 13th of August, 1847, to make arrangements for attending the Funeral of our late Brother, Moses Jewett, the following preamble and resolutions, offered by Brother Samuel Galloway, were unanimously adopted:

Obituary.

Death, at all times busy, again has been in our midst. The disease of our respected and venerable fellow citizen, Col. Moses Jewett, has created a void throughout a widely extended circle of mourning friends and relatives that time with all its "healing influences" can scarcely obliterate. Closely identified with the progress and prosperity of our city from the period of our municipal organization, he was always found among the first in the advancement of the common good—in the promotion of the interests of all. Enterprising from his youth, and blessed by nature with a strong and vigorous constitution, he lived to behold in the evening of his days the wonderful results of energy and perseverance well directed, and received to himself the credit and the praise to which, by his labors and his worth, he was justly entitled. Honest and correct in all his dealings, he gained the confidence and respect of every one. Humane and benevolent, he was the friend of the poor. Philanthropic and kind to human misery wherever found, his generous donations have bound up the afflicted hearts of many, and truly bespeak the generous charity of his feeling nature.

The deceased had reached and passed beyond the allotted limits of Man's earthly existence.—His seventy-third year had just opened before him—and death seemed no nearer his approach than years before. But "a time there is for all to die." The grim reaper came, but found his subject ready, and all prepared to meet his God.—Years and years of devoted attachment to the "Church of Christ" had armed him for the trying hour of death, and truly could he exclaim, "O Death where is thy sting—O Grave where is thy victory?" How inscrutable are the ways of mysterious Providence—how unknown to man are the determinations of His will. Five days previous to the demise of our venerable friend, he moved among us cheered along in his declining years with health and happiness, and all earth's blessings. An accidental fall produced in a moment a serious concussion of the brain, and the last sad farewell to family and friends was denied him. Insensible throughout all his suffering—he died, as he had lived prepared for death—calmly and without a groan. Attached with all a husband's and a father's fondness to an affectionate family, they have indeed sustained a severe and heavy blow—but the "Great Father of Love," the "Fountain of Light," "can raise us up from death unto life," and reconcile us to his will. He who drieth the mourner's tears will not forsake His children here. Truly do we sympathise with those whose affliction by death is rendered in this instance severest.

To the Board of Trustees of Putnam Female Seminary.

In consequence of the absence of the other members of the Examining Committe during most of the examination just closed, the following report is but the expression of individual sentiment.

With the general results of the examination, I have been gratified. In many cases a high degree of scholarship and of mind, was manifested. The examination I considered thorough, and, by being protracted through several successive days, gave all the scholars a fair opportunity of exhibiting their progress and acquirements. I took an active part in the examination and freely propounded questions. The replies, both to my own questions and those asked by the teachers, generally evinced not only a knowledge of the subject committed to memory, but discipline of mind and power of reasoning. I have no wish to bestow indiscriminate praise. Such praise is always unfounded. The flattery dealt out to female Seminaries ought to be deemed an insult to them. No literary institution exists, all whose pupils are entitled to commendation.—From habits of inattention, from want of industry and punctuality, some scholars will fall below the grade in scholarship which they should have reached. The averaged results of an examination when sufficiently protracted, constitute a safe test of the character and intellectual condition of a school. In the present case these results in my opinion reflect credit on the Seminary whose trust is committed to you. They show that the teachers have been faithful and devoted to their work. It is, I am persuaded, the determination of Miss Cone, the Principal, and of the other teachers, that the pupils committed to their care shall be thoroughly educated.

If it would not be deemed improper, in this communication, I should be glad to refer to a few features of the Seminary, that seem to me worthy to recommend it to the patronage of an enlightened public. I am pleased with its extended course of study. It embraces, substantially, the same subjects and the same books studied in our best colleges. The abridged school editions of works are thrown out. The exact sciences and Philosophy, and the languages hold the prominent place that belongs to them in a course of education. It has thus the testimony of ample experience in its favor. To extend the course would have been useless, without giving time to accomplish it. This time is secured by adopting the ordinary college term of four years. The complaint, sometimes justly made, of crowding the time of study in female Seminaries with too many studies, is thus obviated. A full course of study, with full time to accomplish it, certainly constitutes a high recommendation for the Seminary. The pupils, at the required age of fourteen, with the preparation demanded, which, while it is comparatively great, is not too great, can enter upon the prescribed course with an assurance of reaping, from it, an intellectual discipline, and a varied knowledge, unattainable in the space of time too often allotted to female education. It is with great propriety that Latin and German have been made a regular part of the course without extra charge for tuition. The benefits of linguistic study have been, in a much too limited manner, bestowed upon the female mind. It requires no argument to show that, if the study of language, ancient and modern, is essential to an accomplished education in one sex, it is equally so in that of the other.

The success of the measures now in progress, and in contemplation, to furnish a library for the Seminary, adequate to all its wants, will greatly advance its interest and increase its usefulness. A deficiency of books in our female seminaries is a common and great evil. The hope of their being elevated to a commanding position, while this deficiency exists, is unreasonable. Libraries and cabinets of Minerals and Philosophical apparatus are as important to a female seminary as to a college. The benefit to the Seminary could hardly be over estimated of a well selected library, containing all those moral, literary, and scientific works, which are calculated to refine the taste, inform and strengthen the intellect, and improve the heart.

I have deemed it not inappropriate to refer to this matter because, in order to appreciate the merits of an examination, the means of instruction must be understood. A seminary so well situated for its purposes, with a building and grounds so well adapted to literary pursuits, and with such means of instruction, as your seminary possesses, has high prospects of usefulness and respectability before it.

Very respectfully,

Aug. 10, 1847. J. KENDRICK.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrival of the Steamer Cambria.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

Panic in the Corn Market—Great Fall in Breadstuffs—Favorable State of the Crops—State of the Cotton Market—Uneasiness in the Money Market.

The following is the dispatch of the steamer Cambria's news received by telegraph in New York and Philadelphia, and published in the papers in those cities yesterday morning.—Balt. Sun.

Boston, Aug. 18—7 o'clock, P. M.

The Cambria reached the dock at 15 minutes past 5 o'clock, with Liverpool dates to the 4th inst.

Liverpool, Aug. 4—11 o'clock, A. M.

Parliament has been dissolved, and the new elections are proceeding vigorously. So far as the returns have been made, they show a complete triumph for the free trade principle. Lord John Russell, who will form the new Cabinet, has been re-elected for the city of London.

The prospects of the harvests continue unexceptionably encouraging, and every where promise a most abundant yield. It has already commenced in several of the southern counties. The crops of wheat, oats and barley are unusually healthy, and the potato crop, notwithstanding all that has been said about the re-appearance of the rot, is affected to a very insignificant extent.—Reports from Ireland are equally glowing.

Famine and disease are rapidly vanishing from Ireland. The accessions of the prelacy priesthood gentry of the country to the old Ireland party are large, and the weekly contributions steadily increase. It is expected that a large proportion of Repealers will be returned to the Imperial Parliament at this election.

The remains of Mr. O'Connell were embarked at Birkenhead for Dublin, on Sunday, where they arrived the following day.

Several heavy failures have occurred in the corn trade, and many others of a serious character are apprehended.

A distinguished literary amateur performance for the benefit of that child of genius, Leigh Hunt, was given in Liverpool on Wednesday last. The principal characters were borne by Charles Dickens, Douglass Gerrold, Mack Lemon, Cruikshank, Foster and Leech.

A formidable conspiracy, of the most diabolical character, has been discovered at Rome.—The object of the conspirators, who amounted to several hundreds in number, was to massacre the citizens and to remove the Pope to Naples by force. Five Cardinals, of exalted civil and military offices, have been discovered to have been abettors.

Popular feeling has become more tranquil in France. The King was well received by the people on the celebration of the glorious three days.

The Chamber of Deputies is about to be dissolved.

Several sanguinary battles have been fought between the Russians and Circassians—the former having been defeated with considerable loss.

Switzerland is threatened with a revolution.—The Sonder, a band, or Catholic league, have armed themselves, but are likely to be suppressed.

Mr. Walter, the celebrated proprietor of the London Times, died last week.

The Wesleyan Conference, commenced their sittings at Liverpool on Wednesday last. The Rev. Samuel Jackson was elected President.

Commercial and Financial.—A painful sensation has taken place in the money market since the departure of the last steamship, and which, in a greater or less degree, has affected every branch of trade and manufactures, and for some days the funds have been in a very unsettled state, and though speculation has not gone to the extent which it was apprehended it would, the financial condition of the country may be said to be in a state of the most painful uneasiness.

The Manchester business has for the last few days been of a very limited character, and if the monetary embarrassments continue to increase, distress will be the inevitable consequence. Although the funds were in a state of unusual fluctuation last week, they have this week opened with greater firmness, but how long that position will be maintained, it is hard to predict.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Important from Mexico.

The Mexican Congress and Peace—Rejection of American Terms—War to the Death, &c.

In the New Orleans Picayune, of the 12th instant, we find the following report of the committee on foreign relations of the Mexican Congress, to which had been referred Mr. Buchanan's late letter to that government. The document is full of importance as expressive of the feelings and views of the Mexican Congress and nation. Thoughtfully pondered, however, it will be found a lucid, condensed, and most significant exposition of the views of a majority of the Mexican Congress and nation. The report is directed to the Secretary of Congress:

Committee Room of the Sovereign Constituent Mexican Congress.

Sir—The majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations deem it not improper to present the report with the promptitude which the Chamber have thought fit to allow, as well because the legal question involved appears to be perfectly clear, as because the same subject has for a long time been the object of their meditations, and also of the debates of the national representation.

In the judgment of the committee our fundamental code is perfectly clear in that part of it. The 110th article of the constitution places among the powers of the executive authority of the Union that of directing diplomatic negotiations and concluding treaties of peace, friendship, alliance, truce, federation, armed neutrality, commerce, and every other kind whatsoever; but it says that to grant or to reissue the ratification of any one of these the approbation of the General Congress must first be obtained. The executive power is also exclusive, according to the 15th number of the same article, to receive ministers and other agents of foreign powers.

These articles prove, in a manner incontrovertable, that by our constitutional laws, as among other civilized nations, the direction of foreign relations is entrusted exclusively to the executive; but without conferring on it the power to conclude anything definitely, or to bind the nation to anything, without the consent of the legislative body. The same federal constitution places among the powers Congress, that of "approving treaties, of alliance, of friendship, of federation, of armed neutrality, and every other kind whatsoever which the President of the United (Mexican) States may conclude with foreign powers."

From all this we come to the conclusion that Congress does not possess the the power to entertain, and cannot rightfully entertain the communication which the Government of the United States has transmitted with a view to entering into negotiations for peace, and offering to name a minister for this purpose. And if this opinion appeared to us sound according to the federal constitution, when promulgated as a provisional code and even since Congress has acquired an augmentation of powers granted to it by the "Plan of the Citadel" and the "Convocatoria;"—now that the nation is definitely constituted; or possesses a definite constitution—[esta definitivamente constituida] now that one of the articles of the act of amendments declares expressly that "the powers of the Union are all derived from the constitution, and are limited to the simple exercise of the faculties expressly designated in it;" now that all public powers must be measured by it in the most rigorous manner, we can find no possible objection to our opinion, for any other opinion whatever would involve a violation of the pact to which we have sworn.

Nevertheless we are not blind to the fact that instead of being a political theory, it has been a sentiment of the purest, noblest patriotism in its origin, which has interposed so many difficulties in order that upon a subject of so vast importance that course should be strictly followed which the commands of the constitution so distinctly mark out. Congress, as the faithful representative of the wishes of the people, who have been outraged by the most unjust of all aggressions, are de-ermined not to consent that an ignominious trea-

y should secure to our neighbors the possession f the territory usurped by them, and with it the ominion of this continent—terminating at the ame time our political existence in a manner which would not even entitle us to the compasion of other people—[Congress] has uniformly pposed every thing which should seem to open the way for a peace, which would at this day be very way ignominious, and it has exercised the most jealous care and precaution to prevent even the remotest danger of such a disaster.

The committee participates in these feelings, and would only observe that this constitutional power conferred upon the executive cannot be assailed by us, nor does it afford occasion for well founded alarm, nor in fine is it possible that Congress should itself discharge this duty. The management of diplomatic negotiations demand s such reserve, so much discussion, and activity so well timed, a system of designs so well prosecuted, that it would be impossible to carry them on with certainty, if their management were entrusted to a numerous body. The policy of all nations confirms this truth, and there is no doubt that Congress itself renounced the power of negotiation when in amending our original constitutional pact, it determined that there should be no alteration in the provisions we have cited, and left them to stand as they were.

On the other hand, in perfect consistency with these provisions, the executive can conclude nothing definitely; it possesses no authority to consummate any arrangement which shall be binding on the Republic; and Congress very well knows that the executive, even in the exercise of its constitutional exclusive faculties, under a representative system, finds itself constrained to pursue such a course as may be designated by public opinion and the legislative body. In the position, truly strong and respectable, which our constituents give to Congress, it possesses abundant peaceful and legal resources, without exceeding its duties, to insure the interests of the nation in whatever manner it may be compromised.

For these reasons, therefore, the majority of the committee cannot propose any other course than to return to the Government the dispatch; and if this report appears subscribed by only two members of the committee, it should be borne in mind that our associate Sr. Ceballos, who worthily presides over the committee, but who from his well known illness is unable to co-operate with us, has authorized us to express his agreement with us, and he even offered to subscribe the report which we should prepare expressive of our views, which we conclude with the following proposition:

With a copy of this report let the dispatch be returned to the Government, because, in the present situation of the affair, it comes within its cognizance, with the restrictions which are established by the fundamental code of the Republic.

OTERO.
LAFRAGUA.

Mexico, 13th July, 1847.

The report being submitted to Congress, underwent a discussion, and the vote being taken upon it, it was approved the same day. Ayes 52—nays 22.

We need hardly say, remarks the Picayune, that this report appears to us an authoritative declaration on the part of the most intelligent political party in Mexico, in favor of the continuance of the war. It is the declaration of the majority of the present Congress, and of the party called Moderados, which would prevail in Mexico but for the interposition of the military. The same line of argument which is maintained in the report of the Republicano has strenuously pursued hitherto.

We infer from this report, that the embarrassments which have purposely been thrown in the way of negotiations, are sanctioned by the intelligent liberal class in Mexico; that they were expressly designed to guard against the possible corruption of their leaders, who might be induced to entertain thoughts of peace. The blind obstinacy of the nation to oppose a peace is now definitely incorporated in the law. The executive has the power by the constitution to negotiate and prepare a treaty for the sanction of Congress, but there is an existing law of Congress declaring that man a traitor to the country, who shall propose peace. The executive must set this law at defiance in recommending a treaty for the sanction of Congress.

Santa Anna is understood to have demanded or at least expected the repeal of this law by which his hands are now tied. Congress has not yielded to his instances, nor does he feel himself strong enough to trample the law under his feet. We have then the spectacle of an obstinate, self-willed, superstitious and ignorant people engaged in a war with a powerful foe, and bound by the most solemn sanctions of law as well as by the evil passions of their nature, to continue the war till extermination of their enemy or themselves.

The Dreadful Shipwreck.

We yesterday gave some account of the loss of the barque Iduna, gathered from the telegraphid despatch of the Patriot. It seems the vessel containing the report of her loss arrived at Boston and not at New York, as inferred from that despatch. The New York Commercial, of Tuesday evening, gives the particulars.—Balt. Sun.

One hundred and seventy-two persons drowned.—A telegraphic despatch received in this city, dated Boston, last evening, says that the ship Shanunga, Patten, from Liverpool, bound to Boston, came in contact, on the morning of the 9th instant, (latitude and longitude not given) about one o'clock, in the thick fog, with the Swedish barque Iduna, Capt. A. Moberg, from Hamburg, bound to New York, with two hundred and six persons on board. Thirty minutes after the collision, the barque went down, carrying with her one hundred and seventy two. Captain Patten, of the Shanungo, immediately after the collision, lowered the boats and sent them to the rescue of those on board the Iduna, of whom they succeeded, with one boat from the barque, in rescuing thirty-four. Among those who perished was Captain Moberg.

The following are the names of the passengers saved:

Edw. Kaisa and Teresa Leithner, cabin passengers; Carle Lausen, Leonard Roshuber, A. A. Wester, Frederick Rohn, Charles Setz and wife, Daniel Gunther, Frederick Kapburg, Johanna Wensell, H. F. Rohlose—12.

From the above, we should judge that nearly the whole of the crew of the Iduna were lost. The Iduna sailed from Hamburg 2d July.

A Frenchman was robbed on board the steamboat Trenton, as she came into port on Saturday last, of two thousand dollars in gold. The money was in his trunk, which was broken open, in the confusion attending on landing, and the gold selected from the silver, and the latter thrown back loosely among the clothing. Suspicion rests upon a crowd of gamblers, who were on the boat, and had made repeated endeavors to enlist the foreigner in a game of cards, which he had the sense to decline. He cannot utter a word of English, and, therefore, may find difficulty in making his loss known to those who could be useful in assisting him to recover it.—Cin. Protestant.

Riot and Probable Murder.

Yesterday afternoon, about two o'clock, a fracas occurred between four or five men at the corner of Race and Thirteenth streets, which caused considerable uproar. After the fight, one of those engaged, a young man named John Hahn, a drayman, went to the coffee house of Mr. Ernest, which had been closed on account of the disorder, and demanded admittance. Ernest refused to let him in, and Hahn hammered pretty loudly at the door, threatening, it is said, to force it open. While Hahn was yet knocking, Ernest opened the door suddenly, and fired upon Hahn, with a double-barreled shot gun, the contents of which lodged in his shoulder, side and face—causing a wound which it was thought would terminate fatally. Hahn fell, and was taken up and carried home by some of the persons present.

After Ernest had fired, he retired into the house and again locked the door. The crowd became boisterous, and loudly demanded his surrender and arrest. After a lapse of about five minutes, Ernest suddenly appeared, gun in hand. He came out by the cellar way, and ran up Race street, pursued, with great hue and cry, by the crowd, and was overtaken and captured in Fourteenth street. His gun was taken from him, and fired off—both barrels being loaded. He was then taken to jail by the citizens, where he now is.—Three other persons, we understand, were also arrested and imprisoned.

Hahn is well known in this city, and has been for some time employed by Mr. McLellan as a drayman. Of his character, we know nothing.—Cin. Com.

THE YELLOW FEVER AT NEW ORLEANS.—The New Orleans Bulletin of the 5th says:—"There is no doubt not only of the existence, but also of the increase of this disease among us. We learn there are eighty or ninety cases of it in the Hospital. If it is not already epidemical, it will probably be so in a very few days, and we think it a duty, to recommend unacclimated persons, whose arrangements will admit of it, to leave the city. Those who intend to remain, should avoid unnecessary exposure, exertions, or excesses of any kind.—Pitts. Com. Jour.

CANADA—The Pestilence.—The Irish famine fever has evidently assumed a pestilential or epidemical form in Montreal and Quebec, where the people are paying dearly for British misgovernment in Ireland.

The Quebec Gazette of the 2d instant states, that the Rev. Mr. McMahan, pastor of St. Patrick's church there, had announced 60 deaths among his congregation alone in the previous week. There had died on ship-board, on the passage from Great Britain to Quebec, over 2,500 immigrants, in Grosse Isle Hospital, 1,500, on board ships at Grosse Isle, 750, and in Montreal, Quebec, the sheds, &c., over 3,500 more; in all, 8,250 deaths, besides the pestilence carried through Canada, destroying the clergy, physicians, nuns, benevolent householders, crews of boats, ships, &c. Over 70,000 have reached Canada from Europe this year, and of those some 5,000 are yet below Quebec. In all, 200,000 must have already been added to the population of North America from Europe since the 1st of January last.

The deaths in the abortive efforts at revolt in Ireland, in 1798 and 1803, were few when compared to the famine fever caused by the rapacity of Irish Landlords.

The barque Naomi arrived from Liverpool, same day as the Yorkshire, had had 334 passengers; and of these 78 had died at sea, 104 were dying of the fever—while the Martingale, from Hamburg, brought 168 passengers, and there were none sick or dead. One ship, the Agamemnon, from Liverpool, brought 646 passengers, a whole village at once!

At Montreal, 202 immigrants had died at the miserable sheds, near the swampy grounds, during the past week, and 65 more of them in the city.

ABDUCTION.—A singular case of abduction took place in this city yesterday morning, which, as it created some public notoriety, may require a just public exposition. A man named Hart, lately, as we understand, connected with the Theological School in this city, had some difficulty with his wife, whose fidelity he suspected, and they had lived in a separate state for some time. About three weeks since his wife was confined, and had a child, for whose expenses Hart was sent a bill a day or two since, and finding himself liable for the expenses, determined to possess the child. Accordingly, at an early hour yesterday morning he repaired to his wife's residence, a house in Martin street, and suddenly and rudely seizing the child, ran off with it in the direction of Broadway, where, stopping under a horse-shed, he wrapped it in his own coat, and again started off, (followed by a number of persons,) made his way through a corn-field to the back of the burial ground, and thence to the residence of Prof. Silliman, as a former member of the college, he gave him a temporary asylum, and relieved him from his pursuers. What the result is, or has been, in regard to the mother and child, we do not know, but the indelicacy and inhumanity of the act, however justified by circumstances, is revolting to every feeling heart.—New Haven Journal.

A friend told us yesterday of a house on Seventh street, of convenient size for one family, that is now occupied by seven, all of one nation and tongue. Nine cooking stoves occupy the kitchen which, when all in opperation, surrounded by the busy and talkative housewives, presents a good miniature representation of the confusion of Babel. They sometimes quarrel and use hard words toward each other, but have never been known to commit a breach of the peace by fighting, which is saying a great deal for their forbearance.—Cincinnati Times.

Navy of Great Britain.

The London Times gives the following as the official return of the Navy of Great Britain on the 1st of July last:—

Admirals of the fleet, 2; admirals of the red, 10; white, 10; blue, 10; vice admirals of the red, 15; white, 15; blue, 15; rear admirals of the red, 25; white, 25; to consist of 100 flag officers, viz, 30 admirals, or ten of each squadron; 45 vice admirals, or 15 of each squadron; and 75 admirals, 25 of each squadron; retired rear admirals, 51, to be reduced to 25; retired captains, 130, to be reduced to 100; captains for service, 561, to be reduced to 500; retired captains under order in council, 10th August, 1840, 48; commanders, 876; retired do., under His Majesty's order in council, 1816, 100; ditto, 1st of November, 1830, lieutenants, 2,400; masters, 337; second masters, 132; mates, 34; surgeons, 356; assistant do., 238; pay-masters and pursers' active list, 462; retired do., 28; clerks qualified for pay-masters and pursers, 285; 40,000 able-bodied seamen; 2,000 stout lads; 12,000 Royal Marines, divided into 94 companies—1st division, Catham, 23 companies; 2d division, Portsmouth, 28 companies; 3d division, Plymouth, 24 companies; 4th division, Woolwich, 19 companies; Royal Marine Artillery, 7 companies, head-quarters Portsmouth. Ships of war in commission, ordinary, or building, 678, carrying from 1 to 120 guns each—of which 165 are armed steam vessels, built on the most approved principle for active sea service, from 150 to 750 horse power.

MARRIAGE.—Man and wife are equally concerned to avoid all offences of each other in the beginning of their conversation; a very little thing can blast an infant blossom; and the breath of the South can shake the little rings of the vine, when first they begin to curl like the locks of a new weaned boy; but, when by age and consolidation they stiffen into the hardness of a stem, and have, by the warm embrace of the sun and the kisses of heaven, brought forth their clusters they can endure the storm of the North, and the loud noises of the tempest, and yet never be broken: so are the early unions of an unfixed marriage; watchful and observant, jealous and busy, inquisitive and careful, and apt to take alarm at every unkind word. After the hearts of the man and wife are endeared and hardened by a mutual confidence and experience, longer than artificial pretence can last, there are a great many remembrances, and some things present, that dash all little unkindnesses to pieces.—Jeremy Taylor.

LAMENTABLE AFFAIR.—Mary Cavenaugh, the daughter of Michael Cavenaugh, aged four years, was killed by William Hebden, at Richmond, Va., on Saturday last. Hebden was intoxicated, and carelessly handling a gun, which he presented at the little girl. It accidentally went off, tearing away the upper portion of the little girl's head.

MURDER BY A BOY.—In Bristol, (Conn.,) on Thursday last, a boy about ten years of age, immediately after being reproved by an uncle with whom he was living, went into the house and bringing out a loaded gun, deliberately shot him, killing him almost instantly.

TELEGRAPH OUT WEST.—The Zanesville Courier has been enjoying a little fun by telegraph. It seems that Columbus has a State House in about as great a state of forwardness as the Washington Monument, and Zanesville has a fountain.—So the following passed as a correspondence:

ZANESVILLE, Aug. 12, 1847.

J. Greiner, State Librarian:

Dear Sir,—How high is the grass on the foundation of the new State House?

ZANESVILLE FOUNTAIN.

COLUMBUS, Aug. 12, 1847.

Zanesville Fountain,—

On the State House foundation
The grass is, to-day,
About twice as high
As the fountain can play. GREINER.

Water Cure.

This changeable weather, alternating suddenly from cold to hot, and from wet to dry, is terribly trying to the constitution of young children in our crowded city, and we hear of much sickness and death among them. To all anxious parents at this time, if your children are well, see that they live on light and wholesome food, sleep with the windows a little open, have plenty of pure ice water to drink and are thoroughly bathed daily. If they are sick, at the risk of being considered an impertinent intermedler by the physicians, we will recommend cold water. One swallow we know does not make a summer, but we have had some little experience with the summer complaint in a family of thirteen children, and the result is a determination never to use a drug for that disease. If a free use of ice and water will not prevent it, we think it stands a better chance to cure it than any chalk mixtures, cordials, syrups, or paregorics. Cold wet towels applied to the abdomen, and cold water injections we have seen raise children from the brink of the grave, and there seems some good reason why they should.—Chronotype.

RIOT AT KINGSTON, CANADA.—On the 2d inst. a considerable disturbance took place at Kingston, the rioters having to be dispersed by the military. According to the Toronto British Colonist the disturbance thus originated. A Roman Catholic clergyman had been insulted while in the discharge of his duty on Sunday evening; by the crew of the steamboat Princess, went on board and demanded the interference of Captain Twohy, who promised, if the offenders were pointed out to have them punished in the morning. The reverend gentleman appears not to have been satisfied and lost his temper, so that the crew repeated their offensive expressions.

Mr. Higgins repeatedly called up Capt. Twohy during the night and finally some of his adherents took up the quarrel, demanding the discharge of the crew of the Princess Royal or threatening the Captain's life. They did severely beat him. Finally the military dispersed the rioters and the Roman Catholic Bishop undertook to censure Mr. Higgins and other offending parties. The magistrates seem to have accepted this arrangement, but the owner and captain of the boat insist upon their right to lodge a criminal complaint in the premises.

BLOODY BATTLE IN LOUISIANA.—The Iris, a paper published in Minden, in the parish of Claiborne says, in the number of the 24th ult., that it was credibly informed, that morning, as the paper was going to press, that a bloody fight took place at the Dorchete Bridge, near the line of the parish, on Thursday, the 22d ult., at 10 o'clock in the morning. There seems to have been two parties numbering some twelve or fifteen men, who mutually agreed to meet at this bridge, and settle some old difficulties by fighting with rifles. Two men were killed on the spot. Their names were Hardy Miller and a Mr. Simpson.—Mr. Watley received a wound in the abdomen, supposed to be mortal. Mr. price was dangerously wounded. Mr. Robert Sawyers had two fingers shot off, and some others wounded, whose names the Iris did not learn. The runner who came to Minden for medical aid, says that some sixty guns were fired.—N. O. Picayune of the 7th.

THE MURDER OF MRS. WILLIAMS.—The Delaware Express gives the following particulars of the late horrid murder of the wife of Rev. Gersham Williams, in Wayne Co., Pa.:—

Mrs. Williams was engaged in conducting a Sabbath School, and had started on foot some half hour before her husband for the school, having to pass through a copse of woods on the way. When Mr. Williams and family arrived at the schoolhouse, they were alarmed upon learning that Mrs. W. had not arrived, & commenced an immediate search, first among the neighbors, then the roadside. They soon fonud her, lying some 20 feet from the highway, dead, and bearing an evidence that her person had been violated. Suspicion was at once attached to Bell, an Englishman, and who had been in the vicinity for some days, and but the day previous had been at the house of Mrs. W. begging, she having furnished him with a coat and other articles of clothing. He was found within half a mile from the murdered woman, strolling about, and when taken and charged with the murder, carelessly stated that "he guessed she was not dead—that he did not mean to kill her, but she fought so hard and screamed so loud that he was obliged to choke her to stop her voice."

The villian says he came from England some six years since—that in the old world his parents brought him up to stealing and robbing—that he has been five years during his stay in America in the Penitentiary in the city of Philadelphia—that he started from there some weeks since to practice his business in these parts. He appears perfectly indifferent as to his fate. The neighbors of the lady were so much excited by his indifference, that it was almost impossible to prevent them from hanging him upon the spot; better counsel, however, prevailed. He was examined and confined safely in the Honesdale Jail.

The following description of the murderer is given by the Honesdale Democrat:—

"Bell is from twenty-five to thirty years old, dark complexioned, of medium height, thick set, straight and well built, has a slight scar on his forehead, a distinct one on his upper lip, and a large scar on each arm just above the wrist, produced by scalding, his nose is uncommonly small, and appears to be wholly destitute of bone, head large, forehead full, look repulsive and brutal, general appearance that of a hopeless outcast and vagabond."

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—The Buffalo Courier relates a case of extraordinary fortitude under suffering. Mr. John A. Johnson, of Clarence, in that country, a cooper, aged about 63 years, went into a swamp about three-fourths of a mile from home to cut timber. He cut a tree so that it fell lengthwise on a log and lodged against another tree. He then stepped on the log for the purpose of cutting the tree off. On striking the second blow, the tree fell, knocked the axe out of his hands, and throwing it some four or five feet, knocked him down, and caught his leg between its trunk and the log, and broke it in three places, between the knee and the ankle, crushing the ankle as low as the heel of the boot would permit. He lay in this situation some time, crying for help, but none came to his assistance. At length, reaching out his hand, with difficulty, he got hold of a stick, and with that succeeded in getting his axe within reach. With one hand he cut the tree in two, and liberated himself. He then crawled to the top of the tree and cut a limb for a crutch, and with that and his axe he hobbled nearly half a mile, when his cries brought assistance and he was carried home. Great doubts are entertained of his recovery.

The greatest circulation attained by any periodical in this city, or in the world, so far as we know, belongs to the 'American Messenger,' a monthly paper published by the Amer. Tract Society. Its regular edition has reached 98,000, and is rapidly increasing. The price to single subscribers is 25 cents—to companies of forty, taking 40 copies, 12½ cents. The same Society, besides innumerable tracts of four to twenty-four pages, each is issuing bound volumes at the rate of 2000 a day. It is a mighty instrumentality, and is wielded only for good.—N. Y. Paper.

SIXTEEN LIVES LOST.—A sail boat, belonging to Francois Xavier Dion, left Quebec on the 7th about noon for St. Antoine, on the South shore, above Quebec. There were 19 individuals on board, consisting of Dion, his son, another young man, and the remaining 16 were females, returning from market. They reached St. Nicholas with the tide, in the evening, which place they left about 2 o'clock on Sunday morning, but had not proceeded far when the boat ground, and through violence of the weather, shortly afterward upset, and melancholy to relate, out of 19 persons on board, only three escaped, damely, Dion, his son, and a young woman.

MORTALITY AT VERA CRUZ.—From the 15th to the 31st of July, the total number of deaths was 131, of which 68 were Americans, 55 Mexicans, and 8 other foreigners. The whole number by vomito was 35, 27 of whom were Americans.

DEAD.—Marvin Hale, Esq., proprietor and editor of the Elizabethtown Journal. His death was caused by lock-jaw, resulting from the injury which he received a few days since on the railroad.

YELLOW FEVER.—There were 19 deaths by yellow fever in the charity hospital, at New Orleans' on the 8th inst. There were two cases at Mobile on the 9th inst.

The telegraph posts are up. The last one was raised in front of College Hall on Saturday evening. The posts are handsomely finished, of yellow pine, and about thirty feet high.—Cin. Commercial.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—A very serious accident occurred on the river opposite Covington, on Sunday. A man named Michael——went out with his two children in a skiff to fish. While throwing out a line, he lost his balance, fell overboard, and was drowned! His body was recovered about an hour afterwards. The children succeeded in getting to shore with the skiff. Poor little things! Sad the termination of that morning's sport! The joy and gladness in their bright little faces, and the merry laugh were suddenly changed to tears of sorrow and the cries of grief! When least expected—when sorrow seemed farthest away—death appeared, and they were orphans! No little tale to bear home to the fond mother—no little incident to afford many an hour's pleasant prattle had they! but an awful tale to tell, not in words—a tale of paternal deprivation by the relentless hand of death!—Cin. Com.

POPULATION OF PITTSBURGH.—Mr. Isaac Harris, in his late Directory, classifies in the following manner the population of Pittsburgh:

American born, about	60,000
Irish,	14,000
English,	3,500
Scotch,	3,000
Welsh,	3,500
French,	500
German,	15,000
African and Colored,	3,000
Total,	102,500

DEATH OF LEAKE alias "LEGS."—This notorious thief and burgler terminated his existence a few days since, while on his way from Memphis to the Tenessee State prison at Nashville, by jumping overboard. He was arrested some time since, for robbing a jewelry store in Memphis.

The Law of Newspapers.

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered wishing to continue their subscriptions.

2. If the subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publishers may continue to send them till all cash charges are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their papers from the offices to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled their bill, and order their paper discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the paper is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The Courts have decided that refusing to take a paper or periodical from the office, or removing and leaving it uncalled for, is "prima facie" evidence of intentional fraud.

POETRY.

From the German.

PRESENCE OF GOD.

God near me! and near me ever,
On the land and on the sea;
Thus the Word that erreth never,
Thus my life assureth me.
Ask ye therefore, "who is nigh thee?"
God is present—God is by me!

Death's dark valley, depths of ocean,
Prison walls hide not from God;
He observes my every motion,
While at home and while abroad:
Let me sit, recline or stand,
Every where is God at hand.

God for me, my consolation,
All my soul's desire is God;
Faint I'll not in tribulation,
Under crosses and the rod;
Ask ye, "what consoleth then?"
Listen—God upholdeth me.

Want, and pain, and death I'll conquer,
If my God be only near;
Satan's snares I'll burst asunder,
Triumph over every fear.
"Thou do these things?" question ye?
Nay, nay but my God with me.

DEATH.--By Shirley.

The glories of our blood and State
Are shadows—not substantial things;
There is no armor against fate;
Death lays his icy hands on kings,
Sceptre and crown
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor scythe and crooked spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill
But their strong nerves at last must yield,
They tame but another still;
Early or late
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their murmuring breath
When they, pale captives, creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow,
Then boast no more your mighty deeds,
Upon death's purple altar now
See where the victor-victim bleeds;
Your head must come
To the cold tomb,
Only the actions of the just
Are sweet and blossom in the dust.

Sketches by Rev. A. McGuire.

NO. VII.

On Thursday 23d, Brother D. Wilson set out with me, to meet my appointment at Chitwood's meeting-house; I preached to about one hundred, —read the Articles, and explained and compared, and unfurled the banner of Mutual Rights, and twenty-four came forward, among whom were three local preachers, Brothers Chitwood, Jones, and a colored preacher, J. Brody. This was a very pleasing accession, as I had not one preacher to assist me in the good work until now: thank God the light is spreading,—the people begin to see. Friday, 24th, went on to Providence, and preached at twelve o'clock, read and explained the Articles, gave out to preach again at night, and organise. I attended, and organised another class of thirteen members; six from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and seven from the world. O! it was a precious season; praise the Lord my soul. Saturday, 25th, went on to Pisgah meeting-house, and preached to a large assembly, and God blessed the word to many souls. I then opened the subject of Mutual Rights, and gave out to preach there the next morning at 11 o'clock. After dismissing I sold a number of pamphlets on Church Government. Sunday 26th, preached with great liberty, and many were deeply affected. Went on to Paris, and preached to a large congregation at four o'clock; at the close we were invited to put up with a local preacher; we were hardly seated, before he began to talk on the subject of Church Government, and defended Episcopacy as well as he could. Next morning two travelling preachers came in, and we had a singular introduction to them by our host. He said, (pointing to us) these are reformers; but not of the heart. We made no reply to the insult. A heavy rain kept us there until three o'clock: then rode eighteen miles to Madison; rested on Tuesday. Went in the evening to hear Brother Ray in support of Episcopacy, and reply to some remarks I had made when I read our Articles, he having been present. When he concluded, I rose and gave out that I would reply to some things that he had advanced on that night three weeks. It was the opinion of many that Brother Ray, did much for our cause. One man happening to get along side of Brother Ray, after meeting broke, it being very dark, asked Brother Ray, who that was that was going to reply to Ray. His name is McGuire, said R. Well, said the other, if he is any thing of a smart fellow, he can easily refute all Ray said to-night, for I think he worsted his own cause. On Saturday, 1st of August, Br. McIntire rode four miles with me to a two day's meeting, held by my old affectionate Brother Ruddle. They were singing the first hymn when we went in. He invited me to close; I gave an exhortation and prayed, and was invited to stay for dinner. In conversation with him, he said he should be glad to have me stay and preach that afternoon, but he expected he had got himself into difficulties, for asking me to close the meeting, it was painful to him; it was painful to me, for we had for years been as David and Jonathan: he wished to keep clear of censure until he got a certificate. We returned to Madison, and I preached the next day, Sunday, 4 o'clock, in the Methodist Episcopal Church. On Monday, 3d, rode fourteen miles, to James West's, preached Tuesday, and attempted to form a class, but was interrupted by the class leader, who manifested a little spirit of opposition, and laid himself liable to be prosecuted; however his opposition operated in our favor. I organised a class of 12 members before I left, seven from the old church, and five from the world. After visiting two classes who intended to secede in a body, I rode on Wednesday 6th, to Brother Davis', and preached to a little company, and the good Lord blessed us in a glorious degree. All the class at this place intend to leave the old ship. I will relate something a little remarkable: One sister with whom I dined a few days ago, dreamed that herself and another lady, had settled a swarm of bees on a limb of a tree, but had no hive to put them in, they presently saw a man coming, who took off his hat, and held it up and the bees flew into it, and he took them off, and the next day, coming on to the meeting house, she saw me standing out in the yard of the church: yonder, said she, to her husband, is the very man I saw in my dream; so, also, Brother Davis saw me in a dream, and heard me preach. Also Brother Watts, a very intelligent man, told me that he saw me in a dream, and heard me preaching to a large congregation, and so soon as they saw me they knew me to be the same person they saw in their dreams. On Saturday, 8th, rode to Lexington, expecting an appointment had been made, but it had been neglected. Met with Rev. Calvin Ruter in the street, enquired of him, if I could have an appointment for evening; he thought it would be but a poor chance. He kindly invited me home with him for dinner. He is a superannuated minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church,—a learned man—a friendly man, with whom I had great satisfaction the two or three hours I stayed with him.

JOHN GUTRIDGE.

DIED, at his residence on Rocky Fork of Licking, Licking county, Ohio, July 31st, 1847, in his 84th year, Br. JOHN GUTRIDGE.

Father Gutridge was born in Baltimore county, Maryland, May 8th, 1764. Of his early history we cannot speak particularly. We learn that he emigrated from his native State to Virginia; thence to Ohio; and in the course of his pilgrimage, between the years of 1830 and 1840, he embraced religion, under the ministry of the Rev. J. Quinn, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church,—his history in which we will have to pass, until we come to the year 1829, in the days of the Rev. William Evans, in the counties of Licking and Muskingum,—presenting and advocating the mutual rights of the Official and Lay members of the Church. Then the old man, who had not only felt the touch of the finger of the Fathers, but the weight of the whole hand of the Sons of Episcopacy, with others of his brethren, became a warm and avowed friend of equality. And when a society of Methodist Protestants was organized in the settlement he became one of its first members; in which he lived and labored to the end. To adorn his profession of an impartial faith, Father Gutridge was the affectionate and constant husband,—the feeling and indulgent father,—the liberal and benificent neighbor,—the social and interesting friend,—the devoted and lively Christian. He was the delighted attendant on the ministrations of the Word of God.

Among his neighbors, class-mates, and children, he was the emulating father in their little Zion. His buoyant hopes,—his brightening prospects, in view of his dissolution,—his soul-filling and satisfying realizations of the grace that brings salvation, as detailed in his unassuming and retiring manner of relating his experience, seemed to carry something inspiring, or almost renovating, to the soul of the hearer. His confidence was strong to the last.

When visited by his attendant physician, the evening before his death, in changing the conversation from his affliction to the subject of religion, the doctor asked him if he was resigned, or felt willing to go. The old man answered, that he not only felt willing, but ready and anxious, to go to his rest. His disease was of the chronic character; he lingered and faded away some three or four months, but was confined only two or three days before his death. His sufferings were light, his transition easy:

And who that stood by his death bed,
Will e'er forget that scene?
The joy, the hope, in Christ the Head,
The look of love serene?
His only wish was greater grace
To bear his Master's will:
No murmuring at his rod had place,—
'Twas prayer and praises still.

The estimation in which he was held, was expressed by the lengthened procession of time-worn and age-wrinkled friends and brethren, with their children, and children's children, following in train, with tear-glistening eyes, to the charnel-house. Yours, &c., J. K. DUFFY.

SEVETER J. SOLOMON.

DIED, at his residence in Indiana, on the 2d day of July, 1847, in the 77th year of his age, SEVETER J. SOLOMON. He embraced the religion of Jesus Christ, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, about the 30th year of his age, and remained in it until the year 1841; when he became dissatisfied with its government, and joined the Protestant Methodist Church, and remained in it until the close of his life. During his last illness he suffered greatly; but in the midst of his suffering he was frequently known to shout aloud the praises of God. Just before his departure, he became calm, and a sereneness rested on his countenance. My wife asked him if he was still resigned. He answered, yes; I am just waiting to go. In a few hours he expired. He has gone from his home below to his home in heaven; where he has met his companion, who died in the faith of the gospel in 1841. O, the pleasing hope of wife and husband, parents and children, meeting together in that home which is prepared for all the finally faithful.

Yours with respect, S. SOLOMON.

THOMAS IJMES.

DIED, on the 16th instant, at his residence in Hopewell township, JUDGE THOMAS IJMES in the 77th year of his age. He was the main pillar of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in this neighborhood. In recording this mournful event, it is not intended to utter a eulogy on this man of God, who has gone to his rest. To those who knew him it would be superfluous; and to those who knew him not, it would be difficult to convey, by any verbal description, that sweetness and gentleness of piety that constituted his most peculiar attributes of character. He had a good taste and respectable acquirements in general.—As a neighbor, his attention to the sick was always prompt, kind, and impartial; administering with the same readiness to the rich and poor.—In the domestic and social relations, and as a member of civil society, few men were more justly esteemed and respected than Jude Ijmes. An easy politeness, refined taste, cheerful hospitality, and intelligent conversation, made his house a pleasant resort to his friends and acquaintances; and by attentive notice of strangers who visited Asbury Chapel, he was an honor to the neighborhood in which he lived. In friendship he was warm and affectionate, yet steady and faithful. In his dealings, he was regular, methodical, punctual, and conscientiously upright.—And as an office-bearer in the church, he was faithful, assiduous, and devoted; doing his Master's work, one very occasion. His last disease was lingering and protracted; enabling him calmly to look forward to his great change, and furnishing an opportunity for an exhibition of the most touching and beautiful resignation. The closing scenes of his life were marked with a calm and peaceful reliance on that Savior whom he had chosen and served in health; and having committed his family, and every earthly interest that lay near his heart, to Him who could care for them and protect them, he fell asleep.—"So man lieth down and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep." JOHN BROWN.

DIED, in Falls Township, Muskingum county, on the 9th inst., after an illness of two or three days, JOHN, eldest son of Br. MICHAEL BROWN, in the tenth year of his age.

The subject of this notice was an interesting member of Green Valley Sabbath School and was followed to the grave by a number of his school, who wept the early loss of their young friend. It is to be hoped that such was his moral condition that he has exchanged a world of sin and sorrow, for a world of bliss.

"The bud that open'd in thy sweet domestic bower,
Transplanted to a fairer, gentler clime
Shall bloom, a sweet perennial flower,
Unmar'd by the cold, blighting touch of time."

Young Men's Department.

TO YOUNG MEN.

YOUNG MEN of every creed!
Up and be doing now;
The time is come to "run and read,"
With thoughtful eye and brow.

Extend your grasp to catch
Things unattained before;
Touch the quick string of Reason's latch,
And enter at her door!

The seeds of mind are sown
In every human breast!
But dormant lie, unless we own
The spirit's high behest!

Look outwardly, and learn;
Turn inwardly, and think;
And Truth and Love shall ever burn
O'er error's wasting brink

Give energy to thought,
By musing as ye move;
Nor deem unworthy aught,
Or trifling for your love!

Plunge in the crowding mart—
There read the looks of men;
And Human Nature's wondrous chart
Shall open to your ken!

Tread the forest; climb
The sloping hill wayside;
And feel your spirits ring their chime
Of gladness far and wide!

Where'er your footsteps tend,
Where'er your feelings flow,
Be man and brother to the end—
Compassionate the low!

Curb Anger, Pride, and Hate!
Let Love the watchword be;
Then will your hearts be truly great,
God-purified and free!

Improvement of Time.

One writer, guided by inspiration, has taught us to "redeem our time, because the days are evil." This life, at best, has much of sorrow. From briers we pluck its roses; from the midst of its bitter we gather its sweets; in its softest pillow are planted many thorns.

But if, by diligent improvement of time, we can lessen the evil of our days—if we can pluck a single thorn from life's pillow, stay a pang of sorrow, or ease a wounded heart, or carry consolation to the desolate chambers of the afflicted, or light up a ray of pleasure in our own hearts, it is certainly the part of wisdom to do so.

It has been truly remarked, "time turns a torment, when man turns a fool." Who is more properly compared to a fool than he who spends his time in idleness and dissipation, preparing the instruments for his own future torment. No one can be happy unless he is virtous, and virtue is a positive and not a negative quality. Her laurels must be won by active exertions in the path of duty.

How many a youth has commenced life with bright hopes and youthful anticipations, surrounded by friends, wealth, and all that heart could wish, to secure happiness and elevate to future usefulness and greatness. And yet how often have all these prospects been only like the rainbow upon the morning cloud, the precursor of approaching storms, tempests and ruin.

How often the bright sun of a summer's morning, ere it reaches its meridian height, is shrouded in dark and angry clouds. And how often blooming and virtuous youth, ere it dawns into manhood, is transformed from all that is lovely into all that is hateful—hopes disappointed—prospects of usefulness blighted—instead of a golden, blushing harvest of joy and peace, the bitter fruits of sorrow and wretchedness.

But why these melancholy disappointments? Time has not been properly redeemed. Idleness has engendered immoral habits; vice has usurped the throne of virtue; and instead of guiding the car of life through flowery fields of peace and usefulness, has dashed it upon the dark rocks of crime and dissipation. Waste it not in idle or vicious pursuits. What a man soweth, that shall he also reap. He that soweth to the wind, must expect to reap the whirlwind. In youth, then, sow that seed that in manhood will yield a golden harvest of joy and peace; in time, sow that seed that in eternity will ripen into fruit of eternal glory and rejoicing at God's right hand.—Cross and Journal.

Thoughts and Maxims.

The man whose hopes centre on the world like a worm which seeks its living in the dust is liable to be crushed and buried by the step of every passer-by.

To possess any thing we must enjoy it—what we call ours is otherwise the pressure of our bondage.

He who can compromise his self-respect for any thing, is sure to be the loser by what he so gains. He has surrendered that, without which even goodness cannot assert its right to happiness.

An ardent sensibility to the impression of great virtues and abilities, accompanied with a generous oblivion of the little imperfections with which they are joined, is one of the surest indications of a superior character.

Ignorance gives perpetuity to prejudice, and makes folly eternal.

It is characteristic of a little mind, to be shocked and revolted from friends on a discovery of their faults—this shows as little self-acquaintance as it does want of general knowledge.

There are beauties, natural and moral, every where; this is a beauty revealing life and world, but we must have an eye to see it, and that eye is love.—Epis. Rec.

Ladies' Department.

From the Ohio Cultivator.

A Poetico--prose Letter from Rosella.

THOUGHTS FOR LADY READERS.

Oh Earth! thou,rt bright and sweetly fair,
A paradise of mortal dreams;
A sunny picture born of light,
A fairy tale with beauteous scenes.

Thou'rt formed of richness lightly cast
In heaven's own purity divine;
Tinted as 'twere with holiness,
And all else good that can combine.

I love thy scenes, so dear, so fair—
In them my heart in warmness laves;
And drinks sweet draughts of purity,
Unmix'd with sorrow's rolling waves.

Whilst basking in these Heaven-born dreams,
And bathing my aspiring soul,
'Tis more than I can unmoved bear,
And tears flow free without control.

Oh Father! 'twas a gift too great,
To form for us this lovely earth,
Its hills, rocks, vales, and blooming flowers—
For fallen man, to give them birth.

All these thy goodness and thy love
Proclaim in one united voice;
Whilst, too, they speak in softest tones
And bid the fainting soul rejoice.

It is a long time since I had the pleasure of contributing my little mite towards the Ladies' Department; but by the permission of the editor, I will be happy to correspond occasionally with the "sisterhood" thro' the medium of the Cultivator.

I have felt it impressed upon my mind to write a short piece on the management and education of children. You may laugh, unknown reader, at the idea of a girl of nineteen, uneducated, and scarce ever in her life beyond the precincts of home, endeavoring to impart instruction on such a subject.

I was left motherless at the early age of fourteen with a sister and three litte brothers looking up to me as if to recieve a mother's love and counsel. I was young and unschooled in the ways of the mind; but I soon discovered that KINDNESS alone was the "magic spell" to chain the mind and will; I chose her as my guide, and never failed in accomplishing whatever I undertook.

For the last three months, I have been engaged in teaching school; and there again I find that kindness is the mystic sceptre with which to sway the youthful mind. In the young mind, too, should early be implanted a love of nature—of all Her beautiful and admirable works. Whilst it is gathering new beauties from every varied scene, and the little soul seems expanding with admiration and wonder, then point it upward to the adored Maker of all, with a garland of love placed on the brow, bid the young heart adore the Great One who formed each flower to attract our attention, and exalt our aspiring thoughts up to His Throne. If a child is trained to be a lover of nature and nature's God, I do believe its growing intellect is more susceptible of receiving education—its mind is tinged with heavenly purity, and its little soul-born thoughts are capable of aspiring higher than if this important part were neglected. NATURE, too, is capable of educating; and how much more is such an education to be desired than the vain lettered show of which so many boast.

I hope, Mr. Editor, you will publish my poetry, as it is a new kind, which I call the "soul's poetry," or the poetry born of a self-educated mind, aided by Nature.

Respectfully, ROSELLA.

P. S. I am not a victim of staid matrimony yet! and only pretended so, to elicit your sympathies, ladies, and enlist them in my behalf. My little ruse happily succeeded. R.

Perrysville, O., Aug., 1847.

POOR AND PATCHED.—You sadly miss it, young lady, to laugh at that poor young man, as he passes along. What if he has a patch on his knee and wears cowhide shoes? He may make a smart man—and from what we know of his character, he will yet become independent. His mother is poor and his wages are small, and it is with difficulty he gets along. We honor him for the love of his parent, and his economical disposition. He is worth double the young fop who recently gallanted you from the evening party, and so you will find it, before many years have passed away. You would do well to secure him for your future husband, patched as he is, and collossal as are his ringless hands. Would you believe it?—your honored father was once as poor and as destitute as the young man of whom you have just made fun. We remember him, when you could not tell the original color of his jacket; but it speaks volumes in favor of his excellent mother. The young girls who once laughed at his appearance—who were rich and fashionable—are now, many of them, poor and miserable. Be careful, then young lady, and never make mouths at the youth covered with patches, for you may yet live to be thankful for the leavings of his table.—Coleseworthy.

AN IMPROVEMENT IN BREAD MAKING.—Persons who are so unfortunate as to be poorly provided with those agents of mastication, good teeth, will be glad to know that there is a method of baking bread which obviates the necessity of a hard crust. The crust commonly attached to the loaf is not only troublesome to such persons, but is often the cause of much waste. The way to be rid of it is as follows: When the loaves are moulded, and before they are set down to "rise," take a small quantity of clean lard, warm it, and rub it lightly over the loaves. The result will be a crust beautifully soft and tender throughout. This is not guess-work.—Prairie Farmer.

Constant Piety.

In a family in the north of Ireland, a pious young woman was engaged as a servant. The poor girl was much ridiculed for her religion by the young ladies, but did not render evil for evil; on the contrary, she would allow them to laugh at her, and then mildly reason. She made it her study to be attentive and useful to them; took opportunities to speak to them about religion, and would offer to read the scriptures to them when they went to bed. They commonly fell asleep while she was reading, but she was not to be discouraged. Having exemplified Christianity in her life, Providence sent a fever to remove her to a better state. The young ladies were not permitted to see her during her illness, but they heard of her behavior, which did not lessen the impression which her previous conduct had made upon them. Soon after, the two elder ones began to make a profession of religion; the little leaven spread, and now all the young ladies appear truly pious. Nor is religion in this highly favored family confined to them. Other means were employed by God in producing this great change, but one of the two who became serious, declared that she chiefly ascribed it to the life and death of her servant maid. Be not weary in well doing; never be ashamed of Christ and his Gospel. Always try to bring others to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. All can do good, if they are only willing.

THOUGHT.—Thought engenders thought.—Place one idea upon paper—another will follow it, and still another, until you have written a page. You cannot fathom your mind. There is a well of thought there which has no bottom. The more you draw from it, the more clear and fruitful it will be. If you neglect to think yourself and use other people's thoughts—giving them utterance only—you will never know what you are capable of. At first your ideas may come out in lumps—homely and shapeless—but no matter, time and perseverance will arrange them. Learn to think and you will soon learn to write—the more you think, the better you will express your ideas.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

Let Children Sing.

We extract the following beautiful and judicious remarks from 'Phrenology for Children.'—It abounds in passages remarkable for their simplicity and eloquence:

'All children can learn to sing if they begin in season. I do not say all will have the same sweet voice of the nightingale; for some have naturally sweet, mild and soft voices when they talk, while others speak in loud, strong and masculine tones. The same is true in regard to singing.

'In Germany every child is taught to use its voice while young. In their schools all join in singing as a regular exercise, as much as they attend to the study of geography;—and in their churches the singing is not confined to a choir, who sit apart from the others, perhaps in one corner of the house, but there is a vast tide of incense, going forth to God from every heart which can give utterance to this language from the soul.'

'Children, sing! yes sing with your whole hearts! David sang before the Lord, and it is meet that you should do the same; and always, when angry feelings rise in your breasts, curb and check them by singing sweet and cheerful songs.'

A Boy's Bullets and Pencils for Books.

In a neighborhood where a Sabbath school was sustained last summer, I found some religious interest among the children. A number of persons had obtained a hope that their sins were pardoned; four children were expecting to unite with the church on the next Sabbath. This Sabbath school was supplied with Testaments by the donation of a little girl about six years of age, who lives in Brooklyn, N. York. Let other little girls and boys who have money, be encouraged to lay it up for benevolent purposes, to send Testaments and good books to the destitute.

The children in Michigan, as in other places, are very much pleased with the little books published by the Society, and desire to obtain them; but many have no money. I showed some of them to a little boy with tattered garments, and asked him if he had a penny. He said, "No; but I have got a pencil. I will give you that," showing me a slate-pencil he had: then thinking that it was not of so much value as the primer, he said, "I have four bullets; I will give you them too." I told him that, as he wanted a book so much, I would give him one, and selected one with many instructive pictures, as he could not read. The colporteur finds many such children. Who will lay up their money, as did the little girl in Brooklyn, to supply them? D. R. D.

PRAYER.—"Mother, I can't tell you how happy I felt in prayer this morning! When I gave myself to God, it seemed as if there was a sun in my soul," said a little child a few days since.

Agricultural.

Sowing Clover & Grass Seed in the Fall.

A writer in the Prairie Farmer, says:—As there is and has been a good deal said about the time of sowing grass seed, I will give you my ideas on the subject. Some say sow the last of February or first of March; but I say not—and why? because if sown with wheat, it will die when the wheat is harvested, and if you sow on stubble you will lose the use of the ground. In the spring of 1845, I sowed thirty-five acres, a part in February, and the other in March. The seed caught well, and looked finely untill harvest; after which it commenced to wilt, and finally died—the change, from the protection of the wheat, to sudden and entire exposure to the sun, (which I suppose you know is heavily charged with heat about those days,) being too much for it. The time that I should recommend, would be the last of August, or first of September. About the 20th of August, 1845, I sowed a border around the field that I seeded in March. I gave the ground a thorough harrowing, put on my seed, and then rolled it I got a good crop of grass from it last year, and tried the same plan on two different pieces this year and with a common season I shall get a good crop. I have as yet confined myself to timothy, but intend to try clover this winter.

SOWING CLOVER AMONG CORN.—A correspondent of the Boston Cultivator, writing from Burlington, New Jersey, says:

I have just witnessed the following management of corn land, which appears about the best that can be adopted, as it secures a rotation of crops peculiarly suitable to the growth of wheat, affording additional pasturage for the dairy, of all others the best and the most reasonable; and increasing the mowing land on a farm to an extent that must add immensely to its winter resources. The mode of arrangement is as follows:

On a very fine farm in the neighborhood of Columbus, New Jersey, the proprietor sowed amongst his corn the last year, at the time of the last cleaning of the crop, red clover broadcast, affording a full allowance of seed; and it is worthy of remark, its present appearance is fine beyond comparison; the land so clean, and the plants so thick. In early spring, the young crop was dressed with plaster, and it is the intention of the owner to feed off the crop with his dairy cows, keeping them on until the mowing land affords a bite, after being cleared of its first crop of hay, when they will be removed; the second growth of clover, with the refuse of the first, being afterwards carefully turned under by the Prouty plow for wheat. By that time the corn stubs will be so decayed and trodden down and mixed with the droppings of the cattle as to form no impediment to the working of the plow; and to this highly manured and compost seed-bed, it is his intention to sow wheat after a shallow furrow, the first day of September, with, there is no question, the best prospect of success. Now, although it is customary to sow wheat after corn, it is acknowledged to be a bad practice, as "grain ought not to follow grain;" this, and the late season for sowing, rendering the result peculiarly uncertain, and oftentimes unsatisfactory and unprofitable. The question, therefore, has often been asked, (the growth of oats being generally troublesome and uncertain in yield,) "what crop could be substituted which would derive benefit from the fallow process of the growth of corn and afford it to the following crop in rotation?" which is here, in my opinion, fully answered. At the same time, if the corn were cut close to the land, the first crop of clover might be cut and made into hay, the second growth being devoted to manuring the wheat crop by turning it under, but in this case, it would be desirable that the young clover should be dressed with compost very early in the sping—the best mode, I am inclined to believe, of expending our means of manuring, even on the largest scale; as I too am an advocate for surface dressing.

Convention of Nursery Men and Fruit Growers.

(AT COLUMBUS, SEPT. 29th AND 30th, 1837.)

A general meeting of Nurserymen and Fruit Growers, is appointed to be held at Columbus on the 29th and 30th of September, for the purpose of bringing together specimens of all the approved varieties of apples (and other fruits of the season,) cultivated in different sections of Ohio and adjoining States, in order to afford opportunity for examining and comparing them, and correcting, in some degree at least, the erroneous name under which many of them are now cultivated; also, to bring into notice such new varieties as may have originated in this region of the country, and are deemed worthy of cultivation—to consult together on the subject as to the selection of varieties for different sections of the country, and different soils; also, the best mode of cultivation, the nature and prevention or cure of disease of fruit trees; and generally to discuss such matters as may be thought useful and interesting to nurserymen and fruit growers, and tend to promote the general cultivation of fine fruits throuhout the country.

All nurserymen, and others interested, are respectfully solicited to attend the convention, and bring specimens of as many kinds of approved fruit as possible, together with the name under which they are grown, (if known,) and a particular history and description of such as are deemed new varieties.

The Columbus Horticultural Society will lend their aid in making the necessary arrangements, and contributing to the exhibition of fruits at the convention.

VARIETY.

Extraordinary conduct of a Maniac.

A pauper, named "Silly Ben," the inmate of a union, not far from Essex, was so refractory that the governor, in order to subdue him, ordered that he should be confined in the 'dead house,' where lay the body of a man lately deceased.—After a lapse of two hours, the porter visited the maniac, when, to his horror, the poor fellow, as he imagined, dropped a corpse at his feet as he opened the door. Horror-stricken, he hastened to the governor, who, upon being informed of the horrible circumstance, went, accompanied by several others, to the "dead house," when they beheld Silly Ben stretched upon the ground.—While deploring his fate, the corpse in the coffin suddenly rose, exclaiming, "Hard times, master," and then shrank back into its narrow cell. An immediate rush from the habitation of death to the governor's house was the result, where the governor and several others fainted. After a great lapse of time, a crowd of officers and others repaired to the "dead house" with every, and the greatest dread. It is needless to say that it was by each endeavoring to push his neighbor forward that the awful place was reached, when the mystery was solved by its being ascertained that Silly Ben dressed the dead man in his own clothes —and having placed him against the door, put the winding sheet and shroud upon himself, and then took the dead man's place in the coffin.—Notwithstanding the fact having been proved, the governor and the others who beheld, as they imagined, the resurrection of the dead, have not even yet recovered the fearful effects of the fright. It is to be hoped that this occurrence will in future prevent governors from acting in so brutal a manner toward even maniacs. What can be conceived so brutally cruel as the locking up of the living with the dead?

For what? This is the enquiry which many of our readers may be disposed to ask, after they shall have read of the bloody battle of Rio Frio. For what is this hostile array, this fierce struggle, this murderous slaughter? Had A. B., in the American Army, any private grude against C. D., in the Mexican ranks? Had the citizens of one Republic cause of complaint against those of the other, which could not be removed without this bloodshed?

When these questions are to be answered, the spirit of Party may be revealed by the lips, but the conscience can never be stifled.—Zanesville Courier.

THE MINERAL WEALTH OF MUSKINGUM.—Besides the immense quantities of bituminous coal found in nearly every township of our county, we also have numerous beds of Iron Ore. That the mineral is present in the surrounding earth, most of our readers are aware, but few of them have distinct ideas of the magnitude of the deposite. From the 2d Report, made from the Geological Survey of Ohio, in 1838, we learn that our ore-beds are estimated to contain metal enough for one hundred and fifty-three millions of tons of pig! This is in Muskingum county alone.—Ib.

A young and beautiful girl of 13, the daughter of a widowed mother residing at Columbia, S. C. has been traced to New York, where she was taken by some villian, supposed to be a man of the name of Eaton, who is described as being about 45 years of age, 5 feet 11 inches high, stoops a little—dark hair, long and partly gray—slim made, and sallow complxion. He likewise carried off with him two mulatto slaves, young men about 20 years of age. The accused was tracked as far as Baltimore, where he was seen to be flush with money and purchased tickets for three passengers for Philadelphia. $1000 is offered for the arrest of Eaton and the young girl, or $500 for either.

STANZAS.

"The night cometh when no man can work."

Ye, who in the field of human life
Quickening seeds of wisdom fain would sow,
Pause not for the angry tempest's strife,
Shrink not from the noontide's fervid glow—
Labor on, while yet the light of day
Sheds abroad its pure and blessed ray,
For the night cometh!

Ye, who at man's mightest engine stand,
Moulding noble thought into opinion,
Oh, stay not, for weariness your hand,
Till ye fix the bounds of truth's dominion;
Labor on, while yet the light of day
Sheds upon your toil its blessed ray,
For the night cometh!

Ye, to whom a prophet voice is given,
Stirring men as by a trumpet's call,
Utter forth the oracles of Heaven,—
Earth gives back the echoes as they fall:
Rouse the world's great heart while yet the day
Breaks life's slumber with its blessed lay,
For the night cometh!

Ye who in home's narrow circle dwell,
When love's flame lights up the household hearth,
Weave the silken bond, and frame the spell,
Binding heart to heart throughout the earth;
Pleasant toil is yours: the light of day
On naught holier sheds its blessed ray,
Yet the night cometh!

Diverse though our paths in life may be,
Each is sent some mission to fulfil;
Fellow workers in the world are we,
While we seek to do our master's will,
But our doom is labor, while the day
Points us to our task, with blessed ray,
For the night cometh!

Fellow-workers are we: hour by hour,
Human tools are shaping Heaven's great schemes,
Till we see no limit to man's power,
And reality outstrips old dreams.
Toil and struggle, therefore, work and weep,
In God's Acre ye shall calmly sleep
When the night cometh!

NO. VIII.

Monday 10th: After preaching at Esq. Thomas', I rode with Brother Blann eight or ten miles, and preached in a school house, and organised a class of six. Tuesday 11th, rode a devious and difficult way for ten miles to reach Providence meeting house, and found a goodly number waiting for me. Our class leader appeared very much discouraged about our cause, but glory to God, before our meeting closed, he, with many others, received such a blessing that all were in good heart: the class leader's daughter found the pearl of great price, and five more joined the class, which made the number here eighteen. On Wednesday 12th, went on to my appointment at Chitwood's meeting house; I had been informed that Brother Ray was to be there: I found a large audience, to whom I preached with a feeling heart, and many appeared to feed on the word. I called on Brother Jones to close, and while singing, the divinely authorised expounder came in and took his seat about mid-way between the door and the pulpit; I beckoned to him to come into the pulpit; when singing closed, he came into the pulpit, and contrary to our expectations he abruptly commenced the defence of priestly power, and labored for about three hours, to prove from their Discipline and from Drew's Life of Dr. Coke, that Mr. Wesley recommended the Episcopal form of Church Government in America, and then poor thing, read Mr. Wesley's letter to Francis Asbury, in which Mr. Wesley says, "Men may call me a fool, a knave, a rascal, a scoundrel, I am content; but they shall never with my consent call me Bishop," and begs Mr. Asbury, for his sake, for Christ's sake, for God's sake, to put a full end to this, &c. He read one thing after another, and kept the people so late, that I had no time to reply. He stated that the reason why the General Conference did not grant the requests of the reformers, was, that a majority of the people were opposed to it; to this I made answer thus: That the Brother shot at random on this point, as also on many others, unless he had proven that the question had been put to the people universally, and the vote taken, and this he knew had not been done, and knew also that every means had been used to keep the people from knowing any thing about it. I then told the people that if they would attend, they should hear the other side of the question, no preventing providence, on that day four weeks, and dismissed them.

Being absent from home about five weeks, I began to make arrangements to supply my place, and promised the brethren to send Brother W. H. Collins, if possible, which promise was fulfilled. Brother Collins went on and labored successfully till Conference. After replying to Br. Ray, in town, according to appointment, on C. Government, and filling other engagements, having formed a two week's circuit, including about one hundred members, I thought it my duty to go and see my family, and return if Brother Collins did not come. So on Saturday 15th, I arrived in Cincinnati, met two classes on Sunday, & preached at 11 o'clock. Tuesday 18th, Brother Shinn started with me for the camp-meeting near Spring field,—rode thirty-six miles to my house; Br. Shinn went on next day,—I remained with my family until Friday morning, then started with three of my children forty-two miles,—got there on Saturday morning by ten o'clock on that day. There were forty-two tents on the ground: and when I look back eight months, and recollect that I then started alone to form a circuit, and now with the faithful labors of Brother J. Flood, and the help our local brethren gave us, and especially our beloved Brother, Saul Henkle, and now can say we have two circuits, and see this camp ground furnished with tents, I can but exclaim, What hath God wrought! He hath surely done great things for us, whereof we are glad—let all the glory be given to God alone. But the best of all, the good Lord poured out of his spirit, day and night upon us, and many souls were converted, and a great deal of bigotry and prejudice removed from the hearts of our old side brethren. Many of them joined with us at our prayer meetings, and partook with us at the Lord's Table.

Ministers' Department.

From the Religious Telescope.

What Constitutes an Efficient Ministry?

DIVINE DIRECTION.

Want of Divine direction is one of the greatest defects in the ministry of the present day. The Divine agency is too little sought and acknowledged, too little depended on in the study and in the pulpit. Does the modern preacher need a text or subject from which to preach? instead of going directly to the Word and Spirit of God, those infallible guides, he goes to a sketch-book or his manuscripts, and gathers up some old, musty, worn-out sermon, which he preaches, perhaps, for the hundredth time, with as little faith as the school-boy recites his well-learned task, and generally with about as much effect. Does he need assistance to enable him to bring to mind the truths he wishes to advance? instead of looking up, he looks down, to notes which, to conceal them, are pinned to the holy Book whence he professes to draw his principles.

In this manner preaching the gospel is reduced to a mere mechanical art. Books are written to teach men how to arrange and deliver their discourses in the manner best calculated to please the itching ears of the multitude. This is one great cause of the want of efficiency in our ministry. We must return and enquire for the old paths; and our preaching must have more of the Divine, and less of the human in it; we must learn to preach the gospel, as did the primitive ministers, "with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven;" we must enquire of the Lord, and "receive the word of his mouth," and deliver it, as it is indeed, as the word of the Lord. When ministers return to this, they will be inspired with the confidence so indispensable to success in preaching.

But may we now expect to be Divinely directed? Most assuredly. Even under the old dispensation, none were acknowledged as the Lord's prophets but such as were directed by him—such as had the burden of the word of the Lord, and delivered the same in his name. Others there were who prophesied out of their own hearts, but they were not acknowledged as the Lord's servants. The New Testament ministers are, in a peculiar sense, under the Divine influence and direction. They have an unction from the Holy One, which will guide them into all truth; the Holy Spirit is given to bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever Christ has said unto them; the Lord will give them a mouth and wisdom which all their adversaries cannot gainsay nor resist; the Holy Ghost so dwells in them that it is not they that speak, but the Spirit of their Father that speaks in them; and, above all, they have the assurance that Christ will be with them always, even to the end of the world. The above promises surely afford proof of the presence of the Divine Spirit to accompany, dwell in, and direct every true minister of Jesus Christ. If it be said that these promises were given only to the apostles, we demand the proof, for we find it nowhere asserted in the Bible; but, to the contrary, it is emphatically expressed that the Spirit shall remain with them for ever—always, even unto the end of the world.

But how far may we expect Divine direction? Not so far as to encourage sloth, or to induce a misimprovement of our mental faculties.—Grace neither destroys nor supercedes nature, but merely assists it. The man who will not exercise his own judgment, in reading and meditating, has no claim upon the promises of God. The trust of such a man is presumptuous. In grace, as well as in nature, the Lord helps them that will help themselves. The man who sits down in idleness, without making use of the proper means to improve his mind and prepare himself for preaching, is as wrong as the one that depends wholly on his own efforts, leaving the Lord out altogether. Divine wisdom has so arranged it, that his aid is afforded just in proportion to our believing diligence, so that neither sloth nor unbelief are in the least tolerated. Although > "The Christian works with all his power,

> And grieves that he can work no more,"

yet, after he has done all, he feels as helpless as a crawling worm, and involuntarily exclaims, "Ah, Lord God, I cannot, for I am but a child! Surely I am a worm, and no man. Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." All, all is vain unless the Spirit of the Holy one come down. As we plead not for a degree of Divine influence sufficient to encourage sloth, neither do we contend for the same amount that was necessary for the inspired prophets and apostles, to enable them to transmit to us in writing the pure Word of God. But we do plead for the illuminating influence of the Holy Ghost, in a degree sufficient to enable us to understand the Scriptures, to direct us in the proper choice of subjects, and also to illuminate our minds while preaching, assisting the memory, and giving weight and energy to the truth delivered. We believe that all orthodox churches admit this in theory, as is evidenced by their prayers for the assistance of the Holy Spirit to help their infirmities, &c. But who does not know that this belief generally ends just where it begins, in theory, and that such prayers are, in many instances perfectly hypocritical—a mere form. In many instances the Holy Spirit is not in the least expected in answer to such prayers; the sermon is, not unfrequently either in whole or in part, written down, and lying before the minister. This course cannot be too strongly reprehended; it weakens our dependance on God, leads to formality and hypocrisy, and is, no doubt, one great cause of the lifelessness which is creeping into those pulpits which, but a few years ago, were so noted for their streams of living truth, before which sinners trembled and hypocrites turned pale. O, ye men of God, who profess to stand as ambassadors between the living and dead, will you institute sketch-books and old manuscripts for the living, warming influence of the Holy Ghost? Say not we are ultra. Christ, nor his early ministers, had neither sketch-books, written sermons, nor notes. Why not write your prayers? Why not have experience sketch-books for Christians? They might learn to be more fluent and edifying thereby. Do you say this would lead to formality. Not a whit more than such books for the exercises of the pulpit. Come, now, Brother, be consistent; either throw away your dry bones, or advise them in relating their experience. Either cease praying for the directing influence of the Spirit, or cast yourself upon it as an evidence of the sincerity of your prayers. Go to work on the principle of faith; open your Bible; read it; pray for a subject; pray in faith, expecting the Spirit to guide you. Is a passage impressed on your mind? Meditate upon it; examine it with all its parallels; get all the light you can from God and man: on your knees go over it again and again, until it is written, not on paper, but on your heart. Continue this course, and light will shine, burden will be given appropriate to the occasion. To be sure, you will be tempted thus: it is a new subject—the occasion is an important one—better take one you are acquainted with, &c., but listen not to them: you never have failed when trusting fully in the Lord. What if you do tremble? Look up! The Lord is with thee, and will support you in speaking his own Word in his own way. To those who think we are enthusiastic, we say, try it; try it effectually, sincerely, and your congregations will perceive by your increased fervor and power that you have been with Jesus.

How Shall we Preach?

The Albany Spectator closes an editorial article with this caption in the following forcible language.

"Not indifferently, for the interests at stake are too vast to allow it. Sent out into a world to rescue souls from endless ruin, time flying, eternity at hand, death and the judgment drawing near, he has not a moment to lose. Hell yawns, he cannot temporize. The spirit of the world whispers—preach mildly, soothingly, learnedly, eloquently!—But God, the Bible, conscience, reply, "Preach with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven!"—"Not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit, and of power."

"Preach as dying men to dying men. Preach each sermon as if you knew it were the last your lips should utter, or the last some poor sinners before you should ever hear. Let your souls be full of eternity and the worth of the deathless spirit. Preach as for your own lives; and be sure that you preach the cross. All preaching without this is worthless. Be it your fervent and hourly increasing ambition to know nothing among death, judgment and eternity bound men, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. Glory in the Son of God. Magnify his grace and power before all men, by humble and prayerful individual devotion of soul, by spending and being spent in his service. Let the world take knowledge of you that you have been with Christ and learned of him. Preach as if you had, and the church will no longer slumber on in false security.—Her voice will go up to heaven as the voice of many waters. God will hear her cry—He will come and revive her throughout all her borders. Sinners will call aloud for mercy, and find no peace, till they seek for and obtain it at the foot of the Savior's cross. Zion will rejoice, the nations will break forth into singing and the whole earth will be vocal with the praises of God."

TEMPERANCE.

From the Columbian Fountain.

Temperance Societies.

During the years 1833 and 1834, the total abstinence principle began to be thought of by various Temperance Societies, and in the course of a few years was adopted by most of them.

In May, 1837, the American Temperance Union held its first anniversary in New York city.

The Marine Temperance Society of the city of New York was formed during the year 1837, and also the Marine Temperance Union.

In 1839, the London New Foreign and British Temperance Society adopted the American Total Abstinence pledge.

On the 10th of September, 1839, the great Temperance Reformation commenced in Ireland.

The cause had now begun to exert a wide spread and highly beneficial influence, not only in our country and Great Britain, but also in other countries, and indeed, throughout the world. But yet other and very important associations, auxiliary to the great cause, were soon brought into existence.

On Friday evening, April 2nd, 1840, six persons, all men of character, but very intemperate, met at Chase's Tavern, Liberty street, Baltimore, by accident, each having been induced by the demand of his appetite to resort thither. They got into a conversation about a Temperance sermon to be preached that evening and agreed that four of their number should go and hear it and report to the rest. They returned pleased,—and one of them remarked, that, after all, Temperance was a very good thing. The landlord immediately began to rail out against Temperance lectures, &c.; whereupon, one of the six, observed, "Of course, it is for your interest to cry them down, at any rate." This brought on a discussion, which terminated in the formation of a society by the six, called the Washington Society, and on the total abstinence principle. These men travelled and lectured and won hundreds from the drunkard's way. The Washingtonians are now very numerous, not only in Baltimore, but throughout the country.

The next important step in the great cause—so far as the formation of societies is concerned—was the organization of secret associations, such as the Independent Order of Rechabites, the Sons of Temperance, the United Brethren of Temperance, &c.

Of these new societies none has equalled in point of success and usefulness, the Order of the Sons of Temperance, which originated in the city of New York, at Teetotaller's Hall, on the 29th of September, 1842.—Besides the Sons of Temperance, there are three other organizations, having in view to co-operate with the Sons in the great cause: the Temple of Honor, the Daughters of Temperance, and Cadets of Temperance.

Certainly, if the vast host that now belongs to these orders will only exert the power possessed by them, it will not be long ere

> The Temperance Banner in triumph shall wave

The City of Distilleries.

We had not the remotest idea, until one of the editors of the Evening Mirror informed us, that in Brooklyn, sometimes called the "City of Churches," and in Williamsburgh, there are at the present time no less than seven grain, three molasses, and five rectifying distilleries! These seven grain distilleries, he says, are all in successful operation now, with one exception, and that will fire up in a few weeks. They work at present about 2200 bushels of grain daily, which yield about 000 gallons of whisky, and feed about 4000 cows. This, however is only one-third of the capacity of these distilleries for making whisky; when they are working at a profit, they can turn out two-thirds more. The rum distilleries, we are told, work up twenty hogsheads of molasses daily, and the rectifiers turn out about 12,000 gallons each per week—making 60,000 gallons! What becomes of this immense quantity of liquor, which flows in a never-ceasing stream from the Brooklyn distilleries, the Mirror thinks it is difficult to tell.—Christian Intelligencer.

HONOR TO ALL HANDICRAFTS.

BY CHARLES SOUTHERNER.

Honor to him whose sinew'd arm
Swings the ponderous sledge;
Honor to him whose sturdy hand
Delves at the fruitless hedge:
To every toiler who striveth
To beautify the earth
Be honor and fame far greater
Than to men of kingly birth.

To toil—it is to fill complete
The Lord of Life's command,—
To crown with golden fruit and grain
The wilds of ev'ry land;
To rear the mansion and the cot,
In city or in glen,
That joy and sweet content may meet
Around the homes of men.

Who makes a blade of grass to grow
Where there grew none before,
Is greater far than th' demi god
Whose mantle drips with gore:
Then plant the spade in desert ground
And make its treasures spring
To bless the hand and home of him
Who's greater than a king!

The Wheat Insect.

A correspondent of the New York Mirror, gives an experiment made by himself which to throw some light upon the nature and character of the wheat insect. He says:

"In the spring of '44, I placed a bag containing half a bushel of white flint wheat in a seed drawer, under glass, and near the furnace of my green house. On the 6th of March, 1847, I opened the bag, and to my surprise, found thousands of living insects, such as is now presented to you—some were on the point of leaving the kernel, others were just commencing to eat through, and many were perfectly formed and running about in all directions. Six years ago, I used to soak my early grains in salt brine, for the purpose of destroying the eggs of the insect, which I assured my neighbors much to their amusement and unbelief, was ensconced in the kernel.—Now, by accident, the fact is made manifest. The insect would not have appeared until June, perhaps, had the wheat been sown. The warm situation it occupied in the green house brought it thus early to maturity.

Sowing Timothy Seed.

If you have a field that you design to set in a timothy meadow, plow it at once, as the sooner you get your seed in the better chance will the plants have to stand the winter, and the greater assurance will you have for a good crop of hay next year.

If your soil is not already fertile, make it so by liberally manuring it.

In breaking it up, be sure to plow deep and turn the furrows flat. As plowed, let it be thoroughly harrowed, first in the direction of the furrows and then cross-wise. Continue the harrowing until the tilth is perfectly fine.

In sowing the seed, be sure to employ a careful and experienced hand, in order that the seed may be evenly distributed. The seed should be harrowed in with a very light harrow.

With regard to the quantity of seed per acre, we would remark, that 1 peck is the usual quantity sown, but that in our opinion 1½ peck would be the preferable quantity.

We have known excellent success to attend the sowing of Timothy seed in corn field at the time of the last working. Where this is done the field must be so worked as to be comparatively level.

Extirpation of Bushes, Briars, Sprouts, Shrubs and Weeds.—This is the month for all such work—so if any of your fields, fence corners or sides are thus infested, go to work lustily, and cut up the intruders.

Plowing for Fall Crops.—All the ground you may intend for fall crops should be forthwith plowed; the utmost care being taken to plow it deeply and without balks. Whether you shall be ready to sow when finished or not, harrow it, as soil intended for small grain cannot well be of too fine tilth.

Draining and Ditching.—This is perhaps the best month in the year for such work. If you have any fields of wet clay which are difficult of plowing and culture, make a ditch around it, and run cross or lateral drains (covered) into it at different points, and you will change the very texture of the soil, increase its susceptibility to improvement, and add 33 per cent, to its productive capacity.

Clearing the Grainaries.—Before any grain is put in your grainaries, have them thoroughly cleansed by first washing them with strong ley, sides, ceilings and floors, and then by white-washing the sides and ceilings. By pursuing this course you may possibly avoid the weevil.

Threshing Grain.—It may be the safest course to get your grain threshed and put away in your granary out of the way of rats, &c. Before however, thus storing it away sprinkle newly slaked lime over your floor, and be sure to stop up all the holes that would admit either rats or mice.

Pasturage.—An English author commends the mixing of a few sheep and one or two colts in each pasture for horned cattle. Another writer of the same country remarks that the following economical method has long been observed by the Hollanders. When eight cows have been in a pasture so long as completely to eat all the grass they can graze, and of course can no longer obtain their necessary food, therefore, two horses are turned in and find sufficient food for some days. After these begin to fail of procuring as much as their nature requires, four sheep are introduced, and find enough for their necessities, and even for an abundant supply, for weeks.—By mixing cattle, horses and sheep, in this manner, much pasture would doubtless be economized were it not that the practice militates against one of the clearest principles of economical grazing, inasmuch as the admission of food into a pasture, appropriated to horses, cows, or neat stock of any kind, is certain to render the latter animals restless by poisoning the herbage or rendering it unpalatable to them. No horse, ox, or cow will graze where sheep have trampled. As they are continually on the move, while grazing, they necessarily destroy much more by their excrement than they consume.

Cow Yards, Barn Yards, Hog Pens, &c.—Make it a point of duty to haul into these as much marsh mud or mould from the woods as will cover their respective surface 18 or 20 inches deep, —spread the substance into the form of a basin. Your stock in the course of the ensuing fall, winter and spring will convert it all into first quality manure.

Blight in Pear Trees.—A subscriber in Portage county assures us that he has found hanging up old rusty hoops and other scraps of iron, in the forks and on the limbs of pear trees, a sure remedy for the blight.

We have long known that this was a prevalent opinion with many persons, and we have seen numerous instances where pear trees have been loaded with scraps of old iron, to cure or prevent the blight, but we have felt inclined to regard the prescription as of no more value than the one recommending a "black cat" to be buried beneath the tree.

If any of the advocates of this practice can give a rational explanation of the operation of their remedy in curing or preventing the disease in question, we shall be glad to publish it.—Ohio Cultivator.

THE MIND.

The body is of little worth,
And soon will moulder back to earth,
But who a dwelling place shall find,
For the immortal, God-like mind?
Earth cannot fill its vast desires,
It adds but fuel to its fires;
Grave can't confine—Death cannot hold
That spirit prison'd in its fold.

Go to Golconda's noted mine,
Where jewels in their lustre shine,
Each bright as summer evening's star,
And let them with this gem compare:
Their lustre shall be dull as lead,
Each glistening star shall veil its head,
And all declare they cannot find
A gem like the immortal mind.

But go to Calvary, stained with blood
Drawn from the dying Son of God;
See there the man with sackcloth spread,
Earth quake and graves give up their dead;
See there the Saviour, as he hangs
In agony of dying pangs,
And as you view him, hear him cry,
"My Father, O my Father, why
Hast thou forsaken, too, thy Son?"
Then bow his head and die. 'Tis done!
There in those agonies you'll find
The worth of an immortal mind.

Remember the Poor.

The great mass of society know but little, very little of the wants, the privations, and the sufferings of the poor—the lack of decent shelter, comfortable clothing, and wholesome food. The "well to do" portion of community have but a very insufficient knowledge of the sufferings of the indigent. Many, very many, of those who are really needy have too acute sensibilities to ask charity, even when they are confident that it would be bestowed by a bountiful and beneficent hand. A delicacy of feeling naturally exists which deters the real objects of charity from asking alms until driven to it by dire necessity—till the gnawings of hunger cannot longer be borne, or the sufferings from lack of proper clothing, and comfortable shelter, are past endurance.—The parsimonious and unfeeling may say that we have poor-houses, established and maintained for the purpose of taking care of the poor, and they should go there if they cannot take care of themselves. True, humanity has dictated the erection of alms-houses, and made provision for their support, if they will avail themselves of their benefits; but there is an unconquerable and indescribable dread of becoming the beneficiaries of such institutions, which the imperial mandates of expiring nature cannot always overcome. Such ought not to be the feeling, we are willing to admit—it is, however, a feeling common to all, ingrained with our very existence, and one which we should find it hard to rid ourselves of if we would.

Those who have the comforts of life have a responsibility resting upon them—to "do as they would wish to be done by." Let them seek out the poor and needy in their immediate neighborhood, and administer unto their wants in proportion to their means—relieving the sick, feeding the hungry, and clothing the naked—and the smiles of an approving conscience will be their rich reward. We often hear and know of subscriptions being solicited for some far distant object which calls for charity, while there are in our midst quite as deserving objects. This is all well enough, perhaps, but "the poor we have always with us," and would it not be quite as humane to commence our deeds of charity to those in need immediately around us first, and if, after that, we "have enough and to spare," then may we enlarge the area of our benevolent operations.—If all that have the means would but relieve those whom they have in their immediate neighborhoods—where they may do it without offending the sensitive feelings upon those whom it may be bestowed, "silently as the snow comes down,"—there would be less of want and suffering in the world—many saved from falling into vice—and many relieved from the promptings to the commission of crime—securing the safety, bettering the condition, and gladdening the hearts of all.

The inclement season is fast approaching—now is the time to think of these things, and not only think, but act!—Maine Farmer.

The Battle Field.

Every battle field is the source of inexpressible grief, and woe, and agony. To say nothing of the gory victims that on such fields yield up their latest breath, who shall attempt to portray the agony that must pierce the hearts of their surviving friends! The battle of Buena Vista may be consecrated to fame, and poets may hymn its glories and attune their harps to sing the praise of the survivors and to chaunt mournful requiems over the graves of the gallant dead; but that bloody field will also be consecrated to human woe.—Each one of the thousands that were martyred to the fell spirit of war, had his friends, by whom his loss will be mourned. Many fathers there fell, leaving helpless children to struggle with the stormy tides of life, without the protection of the parental arm. Many husbands there died, leaving trusting wives to lament in bitterness of soul their loss. The dearly beloved sons of hoary-headed sires there sighed their last breath away, to be mourned awhile and soon to be followed to the land of spirits by those to whom their loss is irreparable. When we reflect on the desolation that will be carried to thousands of firesides—the gloom that will hang like a cloud over numberless homes, lately bright with the hues of happiness—the tears of orphans, the shrieks of wives, and mothers, and sisters, the groans of fathers, and sons, and brothers—the wide spread and lasting grief that will result from the carnage of the field of Buena Vista, what heart can refuse its sympathy with the bereaved, or refrain from censuring the infatuation which renders such scenes of blood necessary?

Where is Now?

"Time was—time shall be—but alas!
Where, where is time now?"

Now I write. No, ere I can form the letters it is gone.

Now you read—No, you cannot pronounce the word before the fugitive has escaped.

Now you say you percieve it—but where is the Now that was, when the percepuon began? Now you are sure you can grasp the idea. But where is the now in which you began to claim this wonderful power? Infidelity has scoffed at the doctrine of God's Eternal Now. But we will explain what now is in eternity, when infidelity will explain what now is in time. Till then, we will say with J. Q. Adams, also author of the lines above—

> "Where then is Now? In realms above,
> With God's atoning Lamb;
> In regions of eternal love.
> Where sits enthroned, I Am."
> Zion's Advocate.

Slander.—A cotemporary says generally, it is a poor soul that cannot bear slander. No decent man can get along without it—at least none that is actively engaged in the struggles of business life. Have you a bad fellow in your employment, and discharge him, he goes round and slanders you—refuse another some very modest boon which he asks, he goes round and slanders you—let your conduct be such as to create the envy of another, he goes round and slanders you.—In fine, as we said, we would not give a cent for a person who is not slandered—it shows that he is either a milksop or a fool. No, no, earn a bad name by a bad fellow, (and you can easily do so by correct conduct,) it is the only way to prove that you are entitled to a good one.

In those days long since gone by when Wisconsin was the far West, three wagons containing the "penates," family and traps of a hardy emigrant to that far off land halted in Cleveland. Among the family was one old man, who twenty years before had passed the "three score years and ten" to which man is entitled, and in spite of old father Time, had taken a new lease of life. A citizen, after a variety of other questions, asked the mover of what earthly use the old man could be in Wisconsin. "Wa-a-l," was the sober reply, "I calc'late I am going to lay out a bran new settlement, and I thought as I could't spare any of the younger chaps, I'd bring along the old man to begin a grave-yard with."—*Cleve. LACONICS.

Be wise; for in gaining wisdom ye also gain an eminence from which no shaft of jealousy and malice can hurl ye.

Never stop to wish a thing done. Go and do it.

A fool who has made a fortune may be likened to a pig embarrassed with fat.

The true way of enduring ourselves is to cut off our wants.

There are no faults truly fatal but those which we neither acknowledge or repair.

We are never beneath Hope while we are above hell, and never above Hope while we are beneath Heaven.

If for every idle word we must give an account, what shall we do for malicious words?

He who loves to be flattered had rather hear himself called wise than be so.

Conceit thinks it has knowledge enough to need no teacher, devotion enough to need no fires, and perfection enough to need no new progress.

When a man owns himself to be in woe he does but tell you in other words that he is wiser than he was.

A man who does the best he can—does all that he should do.

If you cannot find ease with yourself, you seek it vainly elsewhere.

Choose that course of life which is most excellent, and custom will make it most delightful.

Be always at leisure to do good.

Defer no charities till death; he who does so is liberal rather with another man's wealth than with his own.

Childhood.—Childhood is like a mirror, catching and reflecting images around it. Remember that an impious or profane thought, uttered by a parent's lip, may operate upon the young heart like a careless spray of water thrown upon polished steel, staining it with rust which no after-scouring can efface.

A Christian cannot tell in the morning what opportunities he may have of doing good during the day; but, if he be a real Christian, he can tell that he will try to keep his heart open, his mind prepared, his affections alive to do whatever may occur in the way of duty. He will, as it were, stand in the way to receive the orders of Providence, doing good in his vocation.

MUSKINGUM DISTRICT.

Martinsburg Mission, Aug. 16, '47.

Br. Bassett: We have just closed up our 4th quarterly meeting, which was held at the Union Class, near Martinsburg. The meeting was one of some interest, but probably not so much as though our circumstances had been different.

For want of a house sufficiently large, we resorted to the grove; but the congregation being unexpectedly large, even there we had not sufficient accommodations to render the people as comfortable as desirable; yet, considering the fears, timidity, and consequent embarrassments attending our situation, we had a good, and to some extent, edifying morning meeting, and sacramental season.

Brother E. Morris was our officiating Elder, he also delivered a discourse at 11 o'clock on Sabbath, from these words: "What lack I yet?" with his usual energy and pathos. Brs. Thrap and Russel, gave us an alternate round on the first 12 verses of the III of John, in the afternoon, with much spirit and prolixity. On Monday we closed up after service in the morning.

Harmony and love pervade the entire Mission: peace and prosperity are in all our borders. We have done no threshing or sifting, but have raked and bound and shocked up some this year. We have two regularly organised classes, one with twenty-four or twenty-five, the other with eight or nine members in it; then we have ten or twelve more in scattered parcels, of from two to four in a place in an appointment in different parts of the work. These are the particulars nearly in full.

Sabbath Schools.—We have three very flourishing schools, embracing, say between forty and fifty scholars each, &c., of which I have not a full report.

The day being far spent I must close, by subscribing myself,

Yours, in the bonds of a peaceful Gospel,

J. K. DUFFY.

Washington Ct., Aug. 20, 1847.

Br. Bassett: We have had some fine times on this circuit; our President's meeting held at the Union meeting-house, was a good season of grace; the Lord revealed himself in a gracious manner, warming the hearts of brethren, and softening the hearts of sinners. Many wept under the conviction of the Holy Spirit, while others rejoiced and magnified the God of their salvation. Four united with the Church. Since this meeting I have held another in the Stroup neighborhood. The class at this place had been backslidden for some time, so that they were disorganized and without meetings, and perhaps without prayers, only when the preacher came. But blessed be the Lord he has visited his people, and built up the waste places of Zion.

That class, though once warm in the love of God, their harp had become mute,—the echo of prayer heard no more around the consecrated altar,—the melody of Zion's song no longer charmed the soul and winged it away to the throne of God. But glory to God, the singing of that song and the voice of prayer are heard again. The Lord reclaimed the back-slidden and fired many hearts with immortal zeal. Sinners wept and believers rejoiced. An old sister, who with her husband had long been members of the Church, but had become cold in religion, gaining her heart warmed with the love of God, and shouting his praise, broke through the crowd to her husband, requesting him to give her his hand, promising her to erect that old family altar of prayer: he reached his hand, but she cried, "Stop, stop—give me your promise in the name of the Lord that you will do it, then I will take your hand." Brother Stroup with a warm heart made the promise, and gave her his hand. The Lord be praised for his wonderful work in the salvation of sinners. Four united with the church at this last meeting.

TENNESSEE DISTRICT.

Salt Creek Ct., Aug. 20, 1847.

Br. Bassett: Having received a little money for you, I embrace the present opportunity of writing you a few lines. I would say to you my health is tolerable, and through the blessing of Providence, I have been able to fill my appointments throughout the season. The brethren in Kentucky and at the Ohio Furnace, had formed themselves into a Mission called Greenup Mission, and had intended to apply for a preacher, but seeing the General Conference threw that place into the Tennessee District, and being unacquainted with the preachers, they concluded to write for one the coming Conference year with the Portsmouth Circuit, as they will supply them with preaching for the coming year. There is a fine opening on the Kentucky side, and a number of good members. I have received some seventeen or eighteen members into the church on the Saltcreek Circuit, and in most places the prospects are pretty fair.

Yours, in haste,

MOSES SCOTT.

The Conversion of Great Men.

When a child with the first dawnings of reason, or an aged man crowned with honors, bow before the cross, we believe there is joy in heaven, and in the bosom of every Christian to whom it is known on earth. But at this period, when the church is popular with the world, and vital godliness is obscured by formalism and hollow profession, too high an estimate we think may be, and often is, placed on the influence of wealthy or distinguished men, and the nature of that kingdom lost sight of, whose founder was "Jesus of Nazareth," and under him fishermen and publicans, its earliest and most efficient friends.

We have heard remarks from the pulpit and expressions in prayer, in the presence of individuals of distinction, conveying the impression that it was a great compliment to the Gospel and honor to Zion, to have auditors of so much dignity.

A few years since, a clergyman in Washington, during a communion season, when some eminent statesmen celebrated the ordinance, commented on the honor they conferred on the church. About the same time, we saw an article in a periodical on a moral subject, in which the writer spoke of complimenting the Almighty by a certain course of conduct.

We can trace no shadow of this spirit in the preaching and teaching of primitive disciples, nor the earnest and pointed style of the Puritans. An American divine,—if we recollect rightly, the lamented President Davies,—when in England, was called upon to preach before the king and nobility. His majesty being pleased with the speaker's eloquence, was somewhat noisy in his expressions of approbation. This representative of the old Puritan character, fixed his eye on the monarch and said, "When the lion roars let the people tremble, but when the Lord speaks let the kings of the earth keep silence." This prince, who understood the nature of a minister's calling, and appreciated moral heroism, sent his rebuke a handsome donation.

Again, if an eminent man, in the last years of his life embraces Christianity, and unites with a church, though gratifying to every pious heart, it should be dwelt upon with caution. If in every instance, as charity would believe, there is genuine repentance and faith, still it is evident that the legitimate effect of the event on the mind of the aspiring youth is procrastination. It looks to him like an illustrious precedent. And over the enthusiasm of early years, and the absorbing schemes of manhood, the fires of ambition burn dimly, and eternity is near, as the season of salvation.

Genius must enter heaven by the same humiliating process of preparation that saves the most imbecile heathen. And we see no reason why it should be thought a wonderful instance of conversion, when a noble mind, after a career of usefulness and fame, consecrates its waning splendor to "Him who bade it shine," and clings to an infinite support while all others are failing.

And in the early redemption of some humble individual, whose influence for piety, like that of Mills, may be felt around the globe, is there not a theme for the highest note of rejoicing and the most devout thanksgiving?

The gospel needs no auxiliary but consistent lives on the part of its friends, and preachers devoted to their Master's business, to work its design, the renovation of a guilty and sorrowing world.—N. Y. Observer.

Salvation.

What news so welcome to the prisoner, as to know that there is a hand stretched forth to break his chains? What intelligence so cheering to the sick, as that the physician has a remedy for his disease? And what tidings so delightful to the startled and trembling sinner, as that there is One who "shall save his people from their sins?" He shall save us—he shall translate us from misery to happiness; from pollution to purity; from the depths of perdition to the seats of tranquillity and joy. He shall save us from our sins—from their guilt and their terrible dominion; from their power in this world, and their penalties in another. He shall save his people from their sins—not the careless or cold, the worldly or the inconsistent; not those who openly submit to the dominion of other lords; who have a name only to live, and are dead; who say they are his, and are not; who call him Lord, Lord, and do not the things which he says; but those alone who are the faithful sheep of his flock; who "hear his voice" and "follow" it, and who hear not the voice of strangers. Such individuals may be poor, may be forsaken, may be persecuted; but they shall be "saved" with an "everlasting salvation;" and when the day of the Lord shall come," "in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the earth also, and the things that are therein, shall be burnt up," they, like the bush amid the sacred fire, shall remain unhurt even amidst the elements of destruction. Lord Jesus, may we practically know thee as this great Deliverer! Save us from the world; save us from the devil; save us from the awful flame which is kindled for the unholy and impenitent; save us from our worst enemy, ourselves—London Chris. Guardian.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 2, 1847.

To Correspondents.—It is almost superfluous, but still necessity compels us to inform "A Northern Light," that his article on the subject of Free Masonry cannot find a place in our columns, much as we would be pleased to insert it. Already some hard feelings exist, by publishing so much in relation to "Secret Societies," in consequence of which a resolution was formed some two weeks since, that we would publish no more. We have quite a number of communications on that subject,—none of which will be forthcoming. The Brother referred to above cannot take umbrage, because his does not appear.

☞ By a private letter from the Editor, dated, "Steubenville, Ohio, Saturday, August 28th," we are informed that No. 47, (August 26th,) of the "Western Recorder," had not reached that place at that date. We cannot account for it.—The fault is not here. They were mailed in time for the coach going east on Thursday, and should have been in Steubenville, by 12 o'clock the next day, (via Wheeling). Some of our Steubenville brethren will please inform us, if that Number is missing, and we will be pleased to forward it, so soon as we receive such information.

☞ Two letters from the Editor are given this week; one dated Waynesburg, Pa., and the other Wheeling, Va. He is now in attendance at the Muskingum Conference, in Youngstown, Mahoning county. He will return in a few days, but his stay will be short; as he will soon leave again, for the Ohio Conference, which meets in Cincinnati on the 15th instant. After the sitting of the Cincinnati Conference, he will again be found at his post; when the credits for money received during his absence, will be given: and all errors, if any have occurred, satisfactorily corrected.

To us it would be no small pleasure to see the Editor return. To take charge, even for a few weeks, of a Journal, having for its object the diffusion of Gospel light and liberty, pointing out the path of duty to others, and laying down rules and maxims for the young, of which their conduct in after years must speak, is a responsibility more easily felt than expressed. Hitherto we have looked upon it as a small matter; but upon trial, we find ourselves inadequate to the task.—We do not complain: but with cheerfulness push on, in the discharge of every known duty—ever looking upward. But after we have done what we believe to be our duty, or done the best we could, will all be satisfied? We trust they will; as our only aim is to please every one.

From Mexico.—News has been received by the "Zanesville Daily Courier," by Telegraph, and issued in an Extra, from which we have intelligence from Puebla, to the 6th ult. The Army under General Scott was to take up its line of march for the city of Mexico as follows:—Twiggs' Division on the 7th; Quitman's on the 8th; Worth's on the 9th; and Pillow's on the 10th. Col. Childs remains in command of the forces remaining at Puebla. General Pierce arrived at Puebla, on the 6th, without losing a man, notwithstanding the recent battle with the Guerrillas.

LETTERS FROM THE EDITOR.

No. II.

Waynesburg, Pa., Aug. 21, 1847.

We arrived here late on Thursday evening, and the first man we met with was our friend Roberts, with whom lodgings were prepared for us. The Pittsburgh Conference had been three days in session, and Brother G. Brown had been re-elected, President. On Friday morning, in connection with Br. M'Gwigan, late President of the Virginia Conference, we were favored with an introduction to the Conference, and granted an honorary seat. In the course of the day, Br. T. H. Stockton, of the Philadelphia Conference, arrived, and was received gladly. Br. Ragan, of the Muskingum Conference, is also here. We love to see these paternal visitations of brethren of different Districts. Wish our other brethren of the Ohio District had reached here. On Friday night, we were gratified to hear a sermon by Br. Reeves. He was our first colleague in 1830–31, since which time, we have not had the privilege of hearing him, save once, during the session of General Conference last year. The Conference has got along expeditiously with its business, as the President informs me. To-day it was determined that next session be held at Fairmont, Va., on the last Friday in August, 1848. The citizens having requested a temperance meeting this afternoon; the Conference adjourned at four o'clock for this purpose. The meeting was held in the open air, and was first addressed by Br. S. Clawson, and afterwards by Br. Stockton. Several lively temperance songs were also sung. The Conference is well sustained by the citizens, and much interest is taken by them in its deliberations. The house is daily pretty well filled, in good part by ladies. Its session will probably close on Monday night, or Tuesday next.

No. III.

Wheeling, Va., August 25, 1847.

The Pittsburgh Conference adjourned on Mon. evening last, after a session of just one week. Its business was disposed of in the utmost harmony and good feeling, and we understood that the citizens of Waynesburgh were very favorably impressed for the most part, in reference to the appearance and transactions of the body.—The various religious denominations evinced the most liberal feeling, not only by taking part in the entertainment of the members and visiting brethren, but by offering the use of their pulpits and churches, during the occasion. We had the honor to officiate on one occasion in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and once in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. For the Sabbath morning service, a place was prepared in a grove in a beautiful vale, half a mile from town. Here Br. Stockton preached to a very large audience. A Divine Providence still remarkably strengthens his slender frame, enabling him to preach Christ crucified to large assemblages, even in the open air. He is expecting to spend a month or two in the West, chiefly for the purpose of developing and explaining his favorite scheme of christian union and Brotherly Love. He will probably attend the session of the Ohio Conference.

As to membership, the Pitsburgh Conference has "held its own," and has had a very small increase. This is doing very well for such times of declension, and falling off. Committees of visiting brethren were appointed to attend the session of sister Conferences. Brothers Brown, Reeves, and Robinson, the Muskingum Conference; and Brs. Davis, Cowl, and Burns to attend the Ohio Conference.

We returned to this place yesterday, in company with Br. Watson, who is now appointed to Union Station. From here we expect to go north to Youngstown, Ohio, the seat of the Muskingum Conference, visiting Steubenville on our way.

Dont Forget.—Those who are indebted for the Western Recorder, will greatly oblige us, by paying up before the close of the present volume. It will be a convenient opportunity to send by the preachers or delegates to the approaching Conferences. We need to receive, about this time, several hundred dollars, to enable us to meet claims against us which have grown out of our publishing enterprise. Dont forget. We shall have to discontinue many at the close of vol. viii, if they do not pay up.

A Great Dependance is also placed in the liberality of those true friends of the paper, who pursue the good old custom of paying in advance. From them we trust we shall have some essential aid in entering upon our next volume. Read the next paragraph.

Annual Register, M. P. Church, 1848.—This little publication, so much demanded by the Church, is now in press, and will be issued at an earlier date than heretofore. An edition of 6000 copies of the first half of the pamphlet, including the Calendar, is already worked off from the press. And we only wait to obtain the statistics of the several Annual Conferences to be held within a few weeks, when we expect to make up the remaining part of the publication. Every subscriber for the Western Recorder who pays $2 in advance for vol. 9, shall have a copy of the Register sent him by mail, so soon as it is issued.

Information Wanted—Statistics of Conferences.—We are about publishing the Annual Register of the M. P. Church, for the year 1848, and are anxious to obtain, in view of this publication, the statistics of those Annual Conferences which have not published their Minutes in full. We desire to have the name of the President of each Conference, the number of Stations, Circuits, Missions, Itinerant ministers and preachers, Unstationed ministers and preachers, Members, and houses of worship in each District. Also, the time and place of the next session of each Annual Conference. If the secretaries, or any other having the information, will communicate it to us without delay, we shall be greatly obliged, and will be pleased to reciprocate the favor in any possible way.

Worthy Example.—Of the 722 congregations connected with the Free Church of Scotland, not one has failed to send up contributions to the Boards of Missions and Education, during the past year. The amount received for these objects is $350,000. What a rebuke to those in our own country, who are so slow to pay their preachers.

☞ From a telegraphic despatch in the Zanesville Daily Courier, of Monday, we learn that the Hon. Silas Wright, Ex-Goveror of New York, is no more. He died on Saturday night, 28th ult., at his residence, of apoplexy.

The Ladies' National Magazine, for September, 1847, has been received. It contains two original embellishments: 1st. "The Momentous Question," a superb Mezzotint, by J. Sartain. 2d. "Fall Fashions," in advance; colored in the latest mode. The reading matter is interesting: especially the poetry,—some of which is as good as any we have ever read. Address, C. J. Peterson, No. 98, Chestnut street, Philadelphia. Terms—$2,00 a year, in advance.

Religious Telescope.—This is the organ of the United Brethren, published weekly at Circleville, Ohio. The Telescope has lately commenced a new volume, with new type. Rev. D. Edwards is Editor. He makes it a useful paper.—It is stated in the first number of the new volume, that 126 new subscribers were received during the week previous. We are glad that our neighbor gets along so well. We wish our friends would do as well for the Western Recorder.—Perhaps they will when we commence our new volume.—Western Recorder.

We thank our Brother of the Recorder for his good wishes, and hope his desire in behalf of his paper may be fully realized. The Western Recorder, the organ of the Methodist Protestant Church in the West, published and edited by A. H. Bassett, is a good family paper, and deserves a good patronage. In interesting variety it is excelled but by few of its size, if any. Terms, $2,00 per annum in advance.—Religious Telescope.

Steamboat Sunk.—A little steamer, called the "Roundout," sunk on Monday afternoon at the Philadelphia wharf. No lives lost.

Printing.

Printing is a noble work! and though the printer be confined to a narrow circle, and amidst the hum of the busy world without, and the ceaseless noise of the politician and news-monger within—though compelled to inhale the noisome air of the printing office, and by the dim lamp at midnight,

> Work, work, work!
> With finger weary and worn—
> With eyelid heavy and red, yet does his bosom thrill, and his eyes glisten, as he 'sets up' the news of some 'great victory' of his favorite party, and gloats with delight, while at the same time he reads and puts in type the speech of his great orator! He enters into the spirit of all his work; he cannot be a mere machine—the very nature of his work sets his mind into motion; and while the 'types go click, click, in his stick,' he may, in imagination, be scrutinizing the inmost recess of some distant country, wandering amidst 'pleasures and palaces,' or riding on the sea. He smiles at the ludicrous, looks grave at the disastrous; the thrilling romance gives him a pleasant excitement, and poetry raises his thoughts to the sublime. Then he approaches the artist who works both with his head and hands.

Correspondence.

Written for the Western Recorder.

The Question Answered.

Yes, sir! we have a "Book Concern," and plenty of books, too. Brother N. T. Catterlin, of Frankford, has books in abundance—will visit the Indiana Conference prepared to supply all the demands that may be made. So, then, when our preachers are asked, "Have you any books?" can say, "Yes, sir—my saddle-bags are full"—take the books and give me the "tin"—so that I can buy more." And thus we can sustain our own concern. The time has come when every Methodist Protestant family in Indiana can be supplied with books.

Brethren, of the Indiana District, come to Conference with a determination that you will take to your new fields of labor a lot of books, and not be excelled by the Itinerants of the Wabash District, in sustaining our Book Establishment.

T. S. FALKINBURGE.

Boon co., Aug. 21, 1847.

Written for the Western Recorder.

To the Ministers and Delegates of the Methodist Protestant Church, Ohio District:

It is respectfully requested that all who can, consistently with their circumstances, leave their horses in the country, as each horse will cost our brethren in the city, two dollars and fifty cents per week. Now it is well known that our Cincinnati brethren, have manifested great zeal, and liberality for the promotion of the principles and doctrines of the church, by contributing through the preachers' Aid Society every year, more than all the District besides, to meet the deficiencies of the preachers, and they are still willing to be rich in good works; but we ought not to press them too hard.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Lord Palmerston and Relief.

The steamer of July 19 brought us a bitter speech from the British Secretary of Foreign Affairs, in regard to the indebtedness of the American States. It was accompanied by an offensive threat, not very congenial to American feelings, and therefore, treated with that response which seemed to be prompted by a proper self-respect. We are happy to see a speech, received by the steamer of the 4th of August, in a spirit entirely different. As nothing can be more undesirable and disreputable than to see Nations continually bickering and quarrelling, so nothing ought to confer more pleasure than to see them heartily united, and particularly two such Governments as Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. Brotherton, a member of Parliament, on the 20th ultimo, acknowledged the receipt of £169,000; received from America for the relief of Ireland. These contributions were spoken of by Mr. B., and by Mr. Brown, who followed him, as demanding a public expression of gratitude from the Nation, and afterwards drew forth the following speech from Lord Palmerston, who said:

I have very great pleasure in acquiescing in and supporting the motion of my hon. friend. The only regret I can feel on the occasion is, that although the despatch for which he has moved expresses in strong terms the feelings of her Majesty's Government and the feelings which we believe animate the whole of the British Nation, still I am sensible that no terms which could have been employed by me could adequately convey the feelings of thankfulness and admiration which the conduct of our brethren in the United States must have excited amongst all classes of her majesty's subjects.

As my hon. friend has stated, not only was the supply sent large, liberal, and generous in amount, but the manner in which it was sent, the promptitude with which it was forwarded, and the strong feeling of interest which was expressed on that part of all those who contributed to that supply, were more almost than could possibly be expected on the part of persons who, however united to us in origin, and bound to us by every tie of language and religion, of manners and habits, still, being separated by a mighty expanse of ocean, could not be animated by the same extent of sympathy by which our brethren in the United States have been so honorably distinguished.

I agree with my hon. friend that transactions of this nature are calculated to cement in the strongest manner those ties which ought to unite kindred nations, and it is this circumstance which ought not to be lost sight of,—that while on the one hand acts of generosity such as these bind and rivet the affections of those upon whom they have been conferred, on the other hand they tend, by the very exercise which accompanies them of good and kindly feelings, to increase the affection of those by whom they are done towards those who have been the objects of those generous acts.—And therefore, Sir, both in regard to the feelings which those actions proclaim in America, I am happy to think that whatever may have been the sufferings and calamities which gave rise to these acts, at all events they will so far have been attended with happy results, that they have afforded to our brethren in the United States an opportunity of doing that which will never be forgotten by the people of this country, and, hope, for a long time, will increase the good feeling of the people of the United States towards their brethren in this country. [Cheers.]

Lord Morpeth said, as he had had very peculiar opportunities of noticing the warmth of feeling which existed in every part of the Union towards the inhabitants of this, which they called "the old" country, he could not help declaring his participation in the feelings of satisfaction and thankfulness expressed by the hon. member and his noble friend. It was impossible to overrate the strength of those feelings, evinced by the warmth of sympathy which had been called forth in America, and by the liberal and substantial tokens which had accompanied it, and which, he trusted would be considered to be amply acknowledged by the despatch of the noble friend.

But he was not sorry that, before Parliament rose, feelings such as those expressed by the hon. members, had found a vent within the walls of that House. He had received letters recently from New York, describing the measures taken there for securing the health and comfort of the destitute emigrants from this country, and at Boston an island had been set apart for, and appropriated to hospitals. He believed that the same kindly spirit prevailed all over the Union, from Maine to New Orleans, and although occasionally causes of soreness and subjects of alteration would unavoidly arise between the two countries, as between other nations, the touchstone of calamity was only wanting to call forth at all times whatever was most generous and kind in our nature.—He bore with pleasure his testimony to the value of those feelings which the calamities of Ireland had elicited for America. [Hear, hear.]

The motion was then agreed to, and the following address moved to the Queen:

That her Majesty be graciously pleased to direct that there be laid before this House a copy of the letter from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to her Britanic Majesty's Minister at Washington, acknowledging the donations in food and money of the legislature and citizens of the United States of America for the relief of the famine in Ireland.

We have another evidence that the present is to be esteemed almost as an evidence of an era of good feeling. At the meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society on the 22d of July, the United States were warmly toasted by the Earl of Chichester, and met, with a warm return in a company of 1,200. Mr. Bancroft, the American minister, responded in a becoming speech, which was also well received. The following is an extract from Mr. Bancroft's very excellent speech: —Pitts. Gaz.

Although the minister of a foreign country, he was not altogether a stranger in that meeting, for nature had established bonds of union between the farmers of every nation on the face of the earth. The same sun shone upon them all; the same seasons as they returned furnished the seed time and ripened the harvest. The celestial influence to which he must look for a blessing on his exertions, might well blend in the breast of the husbandman with that spirit of brotherhood which had made the tillers of the soil—especially those of Anglo Saxon origin—the guardians of freedom and conservators of peace. Whenever the councils of the cultivators of the soil prevailed, there it was certain that nations would dwell in peace.

Mr Edward Norfolk, of Salem, Mass., has invented a loom, simple in its mechanism, noiseless in its operation, and capable, he says, of causing a saving of fifteen per cent, in the manufacture of cotton. The motion of the shuttle is derived directly from the lathe with a positive accelerated motion, and moves, therefore, directly at the speed of the lathe without noise. A girl can tend six of these lathes as easily as four of the common movement.

The Magnetic Telegraph.

It is becoming manifest that most of our telegraphic intelligence is conjecture. A letter was received in one of the eastern cities that Jobselin was elected Senator in a certain district. It appeared subsequently, this was Job S. Olin, Esq. Here were two points too little.

In another case it was registered on the Telegraph line that Col. Burns' body had been found. No body knew who Col. Burns could be. At last the name was recognised as that of Colburn, a Santa Fe trader, who had been murdered near Independence, Mo. Here was one point too little.

The latest guess, or rather series of guesses, is also the most ludicrous.

Day before yesterday we obtained word by the Fredericsburg line, that Lieutenant Tipton, of Ind., and Sergeant Penna. were dead of the vomito. Yesterday we got the same intelligence, via Philadelphia: Lieutenant Tipton and a Pennsylvania Surgeon are dead; and to-day the despatch with the same tidings from Pittsburgh reads Lieutenant Tipton and——Sergeant of Penna.

The whole business seems to be stenographic in its character, and requires a greater amount of general knowledge to the decipherers than is generally found, and was wanting in the first and second Pennsylvania surgeon cases.

P. S. This was written yesterday, and the delay in its publication gives a fourth and new face to the case last referred to. To day it comes Lieutenant Tipton——Sturgeon of Pennsylvania, died of vomito. As Mr. Senator Sturgeon of that state has two sons in Mexico, the probability is that we have now got at the truth at last.

Huzza for the fast line!—Cist's Cincinnati Advertiser.

The Remains of Mr. O'Connell.—A letter dated at Dublin, on the 1st ultimo, to the N. Y. Herald, says:

"Yesterday, at 4 o'clock, P. M., the steamer bearing the remains of Daniel O'Connell, was seen entering the Dublin harbor; as she came up the river, the quays on both sides, as well as every steamer and boat, large and small, were filled with dense crowds, drawn together by a variety of feelings, and all anxious to catch a glimpse of the temporary reposing place of the departed chief. A temporary chapel had been erected on the deck of Duchess of Kent steamer, hung with draperies of mourning and lighted up with tapers, —within lay the coffin, covered with crimson cloth and escutcheoned. It bore in Latin the following inscription: "Daniel O'Connell, Ireland's Liberator, while on his journey to the seat of the Apostles, slept in the Lord at Genoa, on the 15th May, in the year 1847. He lived seventy-one years, nine months and nine days. May he rest in peace." On arriving at the appointed place, the coffin was removed and placed on a hearse drawn by six horses, and attended by the members of his family, and followed by persons bearing wands adorned by white and black ribands. The hearse proceeded to Marlborough street chapel, where the coffin was finally deposited on a catafalque prepared for the purpose, where the remains lie in state until Thursday, the day appointed for the interment.

Changes in Boston.—A Boston correspondent of the Eastport (Maine) Sentinel, alluding to the increase of population and business in that city, speaks thus of the effects of the change in character of society there:

"Many of the old families of New England origin are leaving, and their places being supplied by new comers, mostly foreigners. One or two clergymen have lately resigned their charges on account of the falling off of their congregations from this cause. Some of the city missionaries, in their public reports, allude to the change which is going on, and are speculating as to the probable effect upon the character and prosperity of the Yankee metropolis."

An Untimely End.—Semmes, the young man who shot Professor Davis, some years ago, at the Virginia University, recently committed suicide at the house of his brother, in Washington, Ga. He shot himself with a pistol, the ball entering the left eye, and penetrating the brain, & lingered in a state of total insensibility about five hours. When his room was entered, he was found in a chair, placed at a table. A pistol was lying across his lap, and on the table was an open razor. On the table was found an open note, stating in the form of a certificate, dated July 9, 1847, that his death was occasioned by himself, and was brought about by either sword or pistol or razor.

Peter G. Stuyvesant Dead.—The papers announce the death of Peter Stuyvesant. It took place at Niagara Falls, where he was staying with his wife and niece, having left here about a week since on an excursion to the Lakes. He was in a plunging bath attached to the hotel when his demise took place from some cause not yet ascertained, as, though 75 years of age, he was in good health. The deceased was a direct descendant from Governor Stuyvesant, and inherited a large fortune, which had greatly increased under his skillful and cautious management. He is reckoned to have been the richest man in the City next to Mr. Astor. The value of his estate, which consists mainly of real estate, is of course many millions. He leaves a wife, but no children, having never had any; Mr. Stuyvesant was an active agent of the American Bible Society, to which he devoted much time and money. He became a member of this institution in 1832, and a Vice-President in 1839. Since then he often presided at the monthly meetings of the Board, and once or twice at the anniversary meeting of the Society.

Murder.—Mr. George Wagly, of Columbia, Kentucky, was shot through the breast by Francis Ewing, of the same town, on the 16th ult.—There was no quarrel at the time, nor even plausible excuse for the act.

Deplorable Accident.—James S. Lane, Esq., a respectable citizen of St. Louis, on the night of the 16th ultimo, got up in the dark with the intention of going on to a balcony from a window in his room but accidentally opened the wrong window, and was precipitated to the pavement below, causing his death in a few hours.

The last Martinsburg (Va.) Gazette says that during the preceding fortnight, not less than twenty slaves have absconded, or been detected in the attempt to escape from their masters in that vicinity. Three of them succeeded in reaching a "free state," one of whom had been caught and carried back to Martinsburg.

Mr. William Litle, the publisher of the Illustrated London News, has invented a printing machine which, it is said, will work 12,000 copies an hour.

Daring Robbery.—David Marsh, pedlar of Lancaster, was robbed of $1,932 on the morning of the 17th., on the Ridge, between Huntington and Alexandria. There were three robbers in company, who caught Mr. Marsh, tied him to a tree, and then robbed him. He has offered a reward of $100 for the recovery of the money and apprehension of the robbers.

Foreign Miscellany.

Italy has been spared the scenes of a bloody revolution, which was to have been consummated on the 17th of July. Persons were to be distributed among the crowd, with instructions to get up a quarrel, as a justification for military interference; disaffected portions of the regiments being then employed to make a general onslaught. The fugitives were to be waylaid in the back streets, and killed, by accomplices armed with stilettoes. The pretence for the attack was to be ill-treatment of the soldiers by the populace; and the sanguinary result was to be held up as the natural consequence of concessions to a people not ripe for freedom. In this way the tumult was expected to produce the desired reaction in the proceedings of Government. Some of the most notable persons of Rome were engaged in this conspiracy, and it is said to have been set on foot by Austria, and with the design of removing the Pope by force to Naples.

The Russians and Circassians have had a severe battle, in which 5000 were killed, and neither party obtained the victory. The Circassians are paying 300 Turkish piastres a pound for powder.

In China, the mob have threatened to burn the Palace of Keying, for his submission to the English, it is supposed the British fleet will have to make another demonstration against the city.

Keying has received his answer from the Emperor, approving all he had done, which was not expected by the Chinese merchants; it is said to consist of merely four characters, in his own handwriting, saying, "The sheaf must bend to the blast."

The Great Britain has been raised sufficiently to make the keel visible, and there is strong hope that she will be got off. The workmen were busily engaged in repairing the bottom, the vessel being suspended in the air by means of the lever, the wedge, the screw, and the large boxes of sand.

On Monday 115 ships entered the port of London, the whole of which were, with a few trifling exceptions, either partially or wholly laden with grain and provisions.

The accounts of the harvest received in Paris from all the department of France, and from Spain, Portugal, Italy and Africa, are of the most favorable description.

The London Atlas, speaking of the reported marriage of the Duke of Wellington and Miss Burdett Coutts, says—"There is no longer any doubt that the preliminary arrangements are nearly completed."

FRIGHTFUL LOSS OF LIFE IN A BELGIAN COAL MINE.—Brussels, July 19th.—On the night of the 16th July, a destructive fire broke out on the premises connected with the Marihaye Coal Works, near Seraing. It originated in the engine-room near the mouth of the pit, and rapidly spread, catching in its progress, and burning, the ladders and ropes which served for descending into the coal pit, and thus cutting off for the time all means of escape for 164 workmen who were at work therein. The first signal of danger was the appearance of dense columns of smoke which came down the mouth of the pit. The workmen immediately rushed to the ladders, but the foremost, after ascending them a short distance, were either suffocated and fell dead on the ground, or killed by the falling of burning materials from the top of the shaft. The fire was, after great efforts, mastered, and a descent into the pit made, when a most frightful sight presented itself. The dead, the dying, and the wounded, lay all scattered about the place. Forty-nine dead bodies were taken out of the pit, and thirty-one alive, but most of them badly wounded.—Search was being made for the remainder.

☞ THE RIGHT KIND OF TALK.—The owner of a new packet, now building for the Pittsburgh and Cincinnati trade, called on one of our Joiners the other day, and giving him the length and width of the cabin, told him to go to work and put up one of his best jobs without regard to expenses, and make out his bill at a fair price after the job should be completed. This is what we call giving our artizans a fair chance. Does any body doubt that the boat in question will be one of the completest ever turned out from this city? This is the right way to go to work. Select a mechanic that you are certain will do a first rate job, and then give him the "right kind of talk," and you will never regret it, and our mechanics will turn out such work as will astonish the world, for there is no city in the Union, we care not for the size of it, that can turn out the same number of good mechanics as the Iron City.—Pittsburgh Journal.

WROUGHT IRON FOR CRANK AXLES.—Wrought iron crank axles for locomotives, which has been tried on the Baltimore and Susquehanna road, does not answer well, as the repeated breaking of them proves. The locomotive Sampson, on Saturday, had one broken, which delayed the train, but did no personal injury. The fracture of the wrought axle plainly showed the defects to which wrought iron is unavoidably subject when large masses are forged into intricate shapes. The interior presented in the centre a spongy structure, surrounded with coarse crystalline granulations, gradually becoming finer towards the surface, evidently showing that its weaknes was owing to injuries sustained in the process of forging; and these imperfections are of such a nature that their existence could in no way be ascertained previous to the breaking of the axle, of which they are the immediate and unforeseen cause. In forming this part of the engine of cast iron, the mould is set upright, and the melted metal is caused to flow upwards through it by its own hydraulic pressure, carrying all the impurities on its surface, and rising some two or three feet above the top of the mould, so as to produce a sufficient pressure to cause a perfect solidification of the mass of metal intended for the axle. By this means the perfection of the internal structure rendered much more certain than is possible in a forged article. But one cast iron axle has been broken on this road.—Dollar Newspaper.

A STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM.—The Mercer Luminary gives the following account of a slave who recently passed through that place on his way to Canada: He was from Louisiana, and he had been three months in performing his pilgrimage journey, with nothing but the river for his guide and in a land of enemies, the greater part of his way, ready to seize and return him to his prison-house of bondage. He is about 25 years of age, and this is the second attempt made to gain his freedom. The first was made some years since, which proved unsuccessful, as he was recaptured and taken back, when he was put to work on a cotton plantation, with a heavy bar of iron attached to one of his legs. This was worn by him for years; when, supposing that the spirit of manhood was crushed in him, it was removed. He still cherished in his bosom a desire for liberty, and when an opportunity offered, resolved to make another desperate effort to gratify it. In this he has been successful.

A SAD ACCIDENT.—As the funeral procession of a young girl was moving through New Orleans on the 17th ultimo, the horse which was drawing the hearse started off at full speed. The coffin was flung on the banquet and the body rolled out.

ACCIDENT ON THE RAILROAD.—As the train of passenger cars from Baltimore, on Tuesday of last week, approached the tunnel between that place and Hancock, the watchman of the tunnel was lying across the track with his head upon the rail, and before the train could be stopped it passed over him. Of course he was crushed and instantly killed. It was not ascertained how he came in that position, but circumstances would favor the supposition that it was a voluntary act, and that the destruction of his life was deliberately determined on. When the train reached a point in the neighborhood of Ellicott's Mills, it encountered a burthen train which had run off the track and had obstructed the upward passenger train. The two passenger trains were then compelled to transfer from one to the other their passengers, mails and bagge, and return, the one to Baltimore, and the other in the other direction. —*Dol. PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE.—Martinsburg, Va., as we learn from the Gazette, of that town, was visited by a storm which had like to have been attended with most disastrous consequences. The house of Col. Edward P. Hunter, was struck by lightning, which tore off a large portion of the ceiling from one of the upper chambers, the one usually occupied by the children of the family. The sleeping infant had just been removed from the cradle. The office of the Gazette was the scene of some little confusion—the foreman being momentarily stunned. The German Reformed church was also struck, but received no great damage.

TROUBLE ABOUT A SLAVE.—We learn from the Boston Courier, that a crowd of persons, white and black, assembled in front of the Tremont House, on Wednesday afternoon, in consequence of the arrival of a family from New Orleans, who are accompanied by a female servant who is a slave. The woman wishes to remain with her master and mistress, and is not in any way restrained of her liberty, nor will she leave them if she is allowed to have her own way. She has been at Newport and New Bedford, where similar demonstrations have been exhibited.

THE FALL IN BREADSTUFFS.—The intelligence by the Cambria was of the sort to create a sensation among those who, in the face of the plainest indications that could have been possibly presented of the future, chose to anticipate a favorable reaction in the flour trade within the range of the British harvest. Ruinous consequences are expected to ensue, and well they may, where action referring to the future corresponded with a credulity that could flow only from the most insatiable and blind cupidity. The "Mark Lane Express" coolly observes, that 'foresight is a quality not very often practised in the corn trade,' and we agree with that sentiment if all that we hear in connection with current speculation is true. And we may add to this significant fact, which ever seems to be out of sight in the mania season, that no matter how great or how many the fortunes that are made, that somebody in the end must suffer a proportionate loss. There are only two parties to these transactions, the winners and the losers, and our word for it, the latter outnumber the former beyond all comparison; while the easy, helpless, good-natured, growling public pay tribute throughout the whole operation, and the unhappy poor, starve day by day, with the vain supplication upon their lips, sounding like a very mockery in their ears, "give us this day our daily bread."—Balt. Sun.

TO EMIGRANTS.—A gentleman who has lately visited Columbiana, Mahoning, and Portage counties, Ohio, has requested us to state for the information of the vast number of emigrants now arriving in this country, that there is a fine opening for a few hundred families in those counties, to work as laborers, gardeners, help in families, and on farms. There is a great deficiency of laborers in that part Ohio, and steady employment could be obtained, while the means of living are extremely cheap. If some few hundreds of the thousands of families of Irish and German emigrants, who now crowd the Lake and river thoroughfares, for the great west, or who linger in poverty about our cities, would settle themselves among the thrifty farmers in that beautiful section of Ohio, they would greatly better their condition—New York Editors may serve the emigrant and the west by noticing this.

THE FIRE AT NEW YORK.—The fire mentioned yesterday, in a telegraphic dispatch, as having occurred in New York on Sunday night, broke out in a two story wooden stable on Front street, near Gouverneur's slip, which extended through to Water street. By this fire, seventeen buildings were destroyed, all of which were two story dwelling houses, save the stable in which it originated and one distillery.—Ten of the buildings fronted on Water street, (ranging from No. 639 up to 657,) the remaining seven on Front street —eight were wooden and nine brick. About one hundred families, it is supposed, are thus rendered homeless.—$60,000, it is said, will not cover the loss.—Baltimore Sun.

DEATH OF WILLIAM FREEMAN.—This wretched being died at the County Jail in this village on Saturday morning last. He has been in a most miserable condition for some weeks past, and all who have seen him within that time, have become satisfied that whatever he may have been before he committed the horrid act for which he has been so long imprisoned, he had become a perfect idiot. All were aware, too, that he was gradually but surely approaching his end, a result which none can regret, and many will be glad to hear. A Telegraph dispatch was sent to Dr. Brigham of Utica, advising him of the fact, and on Saturday evening he visited Auburn and held a post-mortem examination upon the body. —Auburn Advertiser.

ACCIDENT.—Mr. John McLaughin of Derry township, Westmoreland county, was accidentally killed on Saturday last. He had been at a store in his neighborhood purchasing some articles, that were handed to him as he was mounting his horse, which becoming frightened, started off at full speed, the deceased hanging by the foot in one of the stirrups for some distance, until it was disengaged by the boot coming off. He was a highly respectable citizen, and his melancholly fate will long be mourned by his friends and acquaintances.—Pitts. Journal.

DOUGLASS AND GARRISON MOBBED.—William Lloyd Garrison and Frederick Douglass, now on an anti-slavery tour to the West, were quite ill-treated at one of the meetings in Harrisburgh, Pa., last week. Douglass furnishes an account of the fracas for the New York Anti-Slavery Standard. Several volleys of unmerchantable eggs," he says were poured through the windows, filling the room with the most disgusting and stifling stench, which he calls "slavery's choice incense;" and "one struck friend Garrison on the back, sprinkling its essence all over his honored head." A pack of fire-crackers was also exploded, causing much excitement and alarm. Cries of "throw out the nigger" were shouted by the mob outside, and stones and brickbats were hurled, when he left the house, projected by some of his friends. Douglass himself escaped without injury.

DEATH BY CRUELTY.—On Friday last the Coroner held an inquest at the house of Judge Dunica, a few miles south of the City, over the body of a negro girl, about eight years of age, belonging to Mr. Cordell. The body exhibited evidence of the most cruel whipping and beating we have ever heard of. The flesh on the back and limbs was beaten to a jelly—one shoulder bone was laid bare—there were several cuts, apparently from a club, on the head—and around the neck was the indentation of a cord, by which it was supposed she had been confined to a tree.—She had boen hired by a man by the name of Tanner, residing in the neighborhood, and was sent home in this condition. After coming home her constant request, until her death, was for bread, by which it would seem that she had been starved as well as unmercifully whipped. The jury returned a verdict that she came to her death by blows inflicted by some person unknown, while she was in the employ of Mr. Tanner.—The subject, we presume, will undergo a judicial investigation, and we hope the heartless persons who could inflict such cruelty on one of so tender years will receive the punishment due their crime. —St. Louis Republican, 16th.

MARYLAND LIGHT ARTILLERY.—This fine company, now at Fort McHenry, numbers upward of ninety men, and it may be said, are now ready for starting, although a few more men will be taken. On Saturday last, the company proceeded to the election of officers, and the following gentlemen were chosen:—Lloyd Tilghman, of Baltimore, Captain; Isaac Marrow, of Baltimore, 1st Lieutenant; Arnold Tensfield, of Baltimore, 2d Lieutenant; and David G. Griffith, of Anne Arundel county, 3d Lieutenant; Edward R. Petherbridge has been appointed 1st Sergeant, and John H. Barnard, 2d Sergeant. We doubt whether a finer body of volunteers have been collected any where, than can be found in this company. They are all active young men, not more than half a dozen, perhaps, reaching the age of forty years. They are to be attached to Colonel Hughes' regiment, and will doubtless give a good account of themselves.—Balt. Sun.

MILITARY DISASTER.—A few days since, a man, insensible to the attractions of matrimony, left his wife, and enlisted at one of the recruiting stations up town. The disconsolate lady, after searching around town for several days, at last found her faithless lord, standing on the Canal Bridge, Penn Street, day before yesterday. Many were the remonstrances and tearful reproaches of the good lady; but tears had no influence with the soldier, and he quietly puffed away at his pipe, in utter indifference. At length provoked at his careless manner, the wife changed her mode of reasoning, and, from weeping, took to fighting. Doubling her fists, and throwing off her bonnet, she rushed at her "lord and master," and pummelled him, until the bystanders came to his rescue. The son of Mars looked woe be gone enough, after this, his first battle. We think the officers had better enlist her instead of her husband.—Pitts. Journal, Aug. 26.

ATTEMPTED MURDER.—About three o'clock on Sunday afternoon, the 22d inst., George Swigler, living in the vicinity of Broad and Federal sts., committed a murderous assault upon his brother-in-law, Joseph McCoglin, with an axe. The latter was paying a visit to the house of the former, when, in consequence of both being rather the worse for the liquor they had drunk, a fight occurred, when Swigler picked up an axe and inflicted two cuts upon the head of McCoglin, and then struck him on the lower lip with the head of the axe, cutting out a portion of the lip and breaking his teeth. The wounded man was removed to the Hospital, where every attention was paid to him which his situation demanded.—Swigler and his wife were both committed by Alderman McCauley to await the result of McCoglin's injuries, which it is feared may prove fatal.—Dol. Newspaper.

YELLOW FEVER.—There were 27 deaths by yellow fever in the Charity Hospital at New Orleans, on the 16th instant. It may be proper to remark that the report generally gives nearly an equal number of yellow fever patients as discharged. The Delta, of the 17th, says:—"Whilst it cannot be said that the epidemic has abated in its violence, there are indications that it has pretty nearly attained its zenith, and under the influence of favorable weather, will begin, to decline."

VOLCANIC ERUPTION.—A violent eruption of the volcano of the island of Fogo, Cape Verd took place on the 9th of April. At about seven o'clock in the evening, a subterranean noise was heard, which was repeated about twenty minutes after, and again repeated about an hour later.—On the last occasion the craters of the volcano opened, a thick smoke issued forth and covered the horizon, enormous stones and showers of cinders were thrown in the air, and then burning lava flowed from the seven openings of the volcano in the direction of the convent of the Holy Sacrament, and finally arrived at the sea, taking about four hours to traverse a distance of about three miles. The lava continued to flow for some time, and rapidly increased every moment. The ground traversed by it is completely ravaged. Animals, vines, crops, houses, and buildings, have been swept away. The poor colonists have preserved nothing, and are in a state of the most frightful misery. The only loss of human life was that of a child of six years, who was surprised by the burning lava, and perished before he could be rescued; and four persons sustained injuries. The eruption was not at all expected, for the crators of the volcano had been closed for fifty years, and had not even emitted smoke.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—There was another large and disastrous fire in New York, on Monday night. (Not Tuesday morning, as reported by telegraph.) It broke out about 10 o'clock in the extensive foundery of Stillman, Allen & Co., known as the Novelty Iron Works, foot of twelfth street. It was an immense building, and gave employment to nearly two hundred hands. Owing to the inflamable nature of the materials, it was very difficult to extinguish it. The loss is estimated at between $30,000 and $40,000 by some of the papers, and at $10,000 by others—covered by insurance.

DISTRESSING ACCIDENT.—At Harrisburgh, Pa., a horse ran off with a carriage in which was Mr. Christian Carver, with his wife and daughter in-law. The carriage was broken to atoms, causing the death of Mrs. Darver, and leaving very little hope of the recovery of Mr. Carver or his daughter-in-law, who is a very estimable young lady, and but recently married. The occurrence took place on Sunday afternoon.

HORRID DESTITUTION.—Catharine Luce, a child of 7 years of age, died in New York almshouse on Monday, from exhaustion for the want of proper nourishment. She, on Sunday, arrived with her family from Ireland, on board a vessel that had no less than 600 passengers; and during the six weeks passage, the subsistence of this family consisted of oatmeal only. Two others of the children died on the passage, while the deceased and others became so emaciated as barely to cling to life.

Improvment.

Very frequently we hear complaints of the evils resulting from the progresss of improvement. Had it not been for such an improvement we might have lived and secured good wages—is the remark of many in these days:

There is an error on this subject which we wish to combat. It is true every improvement which enables one man to perform the labor of 20 or 100 persons, affects injuriously 19 or 99 laborers temporarily, or so long as they are procuring and perfecting themselves in some other occupation. But on the other hand, the cheapness of production, caused by this saving of labor, is a benefit which extends to thousands, in short, to all the consumers of articles whose production is increased by this improvement, and not for the present only, but for all future time.

Improvements in the machinery for the manufacture of cotton goods have multiplied the productive power of labor a hundred fold, and there are those who lament the departure from the old distaff and hand-loom. In the absence of these improvements, one of two things must necessarily have been the case. Either we must have been content with the hundredth part of cotton goods made, or ninety-nine more laborers for every one now employed in their production must have been employed, and we should want the articles they are now employed in producing.

Conceive, if possible, a state of society in which all labor-saving machinery is unknown, and men having nothing but their teeth and nails to assist them in their labors. Compare this state to the present, and then pronounce whether improvement has been a curse to our race.

But some will say, "there is a medium in all things, and there is a point at which even improvement ought to stop." But let no one say that we have arrived at that point, whilst small children and delicate females are employed thirteen or fourteen hours per day, in supplying the wants, natural or artificial, of the community.

Either mankind must contract their wants into a greater accordance with nature, or there is a necessity for still greater improvements, in order to reduce the hours of labor to a standard better adapted to foster our powers, physical, mental and moral, than exists at present.

A degree of physical effort is necessary to physical health, but it is no less true of the higher parts of our nature, that to secure their healthy action we must have time for their exercise. —Scientific American.

CHILD LOST IN THE WOODS.—On the 19th, it was known that the son of Mr. Ira Wheeler, of North Fayson, about five years of age, returning home from school, had wandered into the woods and lost his way. The alarm spread through the neighborhood—search commenced and continued through the night and the following day, but without success. On the morning of the second day, several hundred people assembled from Fayson and the adjoining towns, and divided themselves into companies of twenty, and resolved to search until the child was found, commenced scouring the woods. On the third day the number had increased to a thousand. The heat was intense in the forenoon, and in the afternoon it began to rain heavily. The search notwithstanding continued, and about 3 o'clock P. M. as the main body reached the highlands in Duxbury, some three miles east of Camel's Hump, they found him!—found him safe and well, and in no trouble except that he "wanted some bread and milk!"—Montpelier Patriot, Vt.

The number of deaths in Philadelphia last week was 146; of which 48 were adults, and 98 children. Forty-four died under one year; 23 from one to two, and 2 from old age, exceeding 90 years.

SOMETHING NEW.—A project is on foot to construct an Elevated Railway and Promenade above the omnibuses, in Broadway, N. Y. John Randall, Jr., the Engineer who in 1808 to 1820 laid out the city of New York into streets and avenues by direction of the corporation of that city, has completed a plan and constructed a model for that purpose. The model is made entirely of metal, is more than 31 feet long, and has cost over $3000 besides nearly two years of Mr. R's. time in superintending and planning the work. On this subject the Railroad Journal remarks:

The cars are to be propelled by stationary power with an endless rope, and pass above the level of the omnibus and highest loads, and will not obstruct the present ordinary travel of the street or sidewalks. The cars do not stop to take in or let out passengers—this is done by means of a tender, running upon another track, along side of the main track. Passengers may walk or be elevated from the pavement up to the promenade and railway.

Swindling.

A Mr. Tobin, who seems to be a verry unsuspicious kind of man, visiting St. Louis, was accosted at the public house where he put up, by a genteel looking stranger, who was also boarding there, and advised to beware of thieves and swindlers who would cheat him if they had a chance out of his last cent. The old gentleman listened with surprise. "Is it possible!" "Yes," said his friend, "they would to carry their point even advise you to leave it in their care, just for the purpose of saving it out of the hands of the very people they themselves are." The old gentleman by this time was thoroughly alarmed. "Well, my dear sir, what would you advise me to do with my money?" "Why, sir," replied his new friend, the best and safest thing you can do is to put it into my hands until you want to use it, when you know you can get it at a moment." Tobin accordingly handed his deposites amounting to one hundred and twenty dollars, over to his honest and disinterested adviser. He has seen neither friend nor money since.—Cist's Advertiser.

A SLAVE HUNT.—In passing eighth street, near Western Row, on Thursday, we saw a crowd of some 200 people, and upon inquiry, learned that there were two or three officers in the house, searching for fugitive slaves, which, after a most faithful examination of the premises they gave up as fruitless. The owners of the slaves were looking on the scene with deep interest. One of the men, on using some insulting language to one of the colored women of the house, received from the indignant tair one a brick bat, projected with considerable force, whereupon the ruffian drew a bowie knife, and rushed towards her in great rage and was restrained with difficulty, by the officers.

We understand that the people of the house offered to admit the owners of the slaves with any of the neighbors in the morning, without a warrant, but would not admit the whole crowd. This offer was not accepted, and warrant was obtained to search the house, not for slaves, but for stolen pistols. Why this duplicity was resorted to we are unable to say.

This circuitous mode of operation illustrates the increased difficulty of recovering Southern locomotive property. Had it not been for the efficiency and decision of one of the officers, there would have been both a row and bloodshed. Party feelings run very high. There were but two or three colored people in the crowd.—Queen City.

EXTRAORDINARY COINCIDENCE IN THE LIVES OF A MARRIED PAIR.—A Scotch newspaper of the year 1777, gives the following as the extract of a letter from Lanark:—"Old William Douglass and his wife are lately dead; you know that he and his wife were born on the same day, within the same hour, by the same midwife; that they were constant companions, till nature inspired them with love and friendship; and at the age of nineteen were married with the consent of their parents at the church where they were christened. These are not the whole of the circumstances attending this extraordinary pair. They never knew a day' sickness until the day before their deaths; and the day on which they died they were exactly one hundred years old. They died in one bed, and were buried in one grave, close to the fount where they were christened.

NOTICES.

INDIANA DISTRICT,—FRANKFORD CIRCUIT.—The Indisposition of Br. Bailey, (Superintendant,) and the absence of Br. J. Shipp, warrant the postponement of the Fourth Quarterly Meeting of Frankford Circuit, until the 9th and 10th of October, to be held in the town of Frankford. Brethren will please call and spend the Sabbath with our Frankford friends,—as the meeting will embrace the Sabbath previous to the sitting of our Conference.

MADISON CIRCUIT, INDIANA DISTRICT.—The fourth Quarterly Meeting, will be held at Liberty Meeting House, Scott county, to embrace the second Saturday and Sabbath in September, (11th and 12th days.) Ministerial aid is solicited. GEO. WHEATLEY.

Indiana Conference.—Inasmuch as the next Session of the Indiana and Wabash Conferences was appointed to commence at the same time, and being not far distant from each other, it is thought advisable that Indiana Conference change the time of its Session. I believe there is no provision in our Discipline in reference to this matter; and where there is no law there is no transgression. After having consulted about three-fourths of the members of Conference, and the District Committee, I am requested to publish to all, whom it may concern, that our next Session of the Indiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, will commence the twenty-ninth of September next, at Johnson's meeting-house, 7 miles West of Shelbyville, Shelby county. We earnestly solicit aid from sister Conferences. T. SHIPP.

TANNER'S CREEK CIRCUIT, Indiana District.—Our 4th quarterly meeting is to be held at the East Fork Chapel, embracing the 11th and 12th days of September next, with the expectation that those brethren who were appointed by the last session of the Indiana Conference as fraternal visitors to the next session of the O. Conference, will attend and assist us. May we not hope that Br. W. Pelan of Twin Creek Circuit will attend? All brethren, ministerial or lay who can make it convenient to be with us are invited to do so. W. W. PAUL.

The Law of Newspapers.

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered wishing to continue their subscriptions.

2. If the subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publishers may continue to send them till all cash charges are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their papers from the offices to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled their bill, and order their paper discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the paper is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

If papers are sent to a Post Office, Store, or any other place of deposite,, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the Postmaster, Storekeeper, &c., are responsible for the payment, until he returns the paper, or informs the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

POETRY.

I WILL ALWAYS PRAY.

"Evening and Morning and Noon will I pray."—PSALMS.

I will rise and pray, while the dews of morn
Like gems are scattered o'er tree and thorn,
Ere the sun comes up, in his glorious power,
To waken the bird and open the flower;
I will turn from the earth to heaven aspiring,
With faith unshaken, hope untiring,
And for strength to walk through the weary day,
To the God of love will I kneel and pray.

I will pray at noon when the fervid glow
Of the sultry sun is upon my brow;
When the flocks have sought the shading trees!
When the stream is silent, and hushed the breeze,
I will gaze o'er the beautiful earth abroad,
And praise the doings of nature's God.
Then closing my eyes on the glorious day,
To the God of love will I kneel and pray.

I will pray at eve, when the crimson light
Is passing from the mountain's height;
When the holy, solemn twilight hour
Is hushing the bird and closing the flower;
When all is at rest and the stars come forth
To keep their watch o'er the sleeping earth—
To Him who hath kept and blest throughout the day,
To the God of love, will I kneel and pray.

Then will I pray, for I find it sweet,
To be always found at my Maker's feet;
I will always pray—on the heavenly road—
I ne'er shall faint while I lean on my God.
I shall gather strength for my upward flight;
My path will be as a shining light;
It shall heighten to perfect, eternal day,
Therefore to God will I always pray.

Biographical.

MRS. MARGARET STONER.

Once more, before we close the Conference year, is it our painful duty to record the death of another beloved sister, belonging to this station.

Sister MARGARET STONER, consort of Brother Solomon Stoner, closed her earthly career on the evening of Monday, July 26th, 1847, in the 40th year of her age.

In her decease, Brother S. has sustained the loss of a faithful and affectionate wife; their six children, an indulgent and industrious mother; the church, one of her warmest friends, and most exemplary members; and the Monday class, one of its most useful and regular attendants. This last, the writer very sensibly feels, for that is one of the preacher's classes. Doubtless, all deeply mourn our loss. But, as she lived in the fear of God, so she died in his favor; and is only removed to another society, and transferred to another class.

In constitutional temperament, we are informed, sister S. was ardent, and at times, somewhat hasty, but such was her general meekness and gentleness of spirit, that few of her Christian friends were aware of this idiosyncracy. This shows the genuineness and depth of her piety. In her personal appearance, she was plain and unpretending; and in her religious duties, zealous and devoted. In secular prosperity, the same humble and circumspect Christian, as in less favorable circumstances. In a word, she was a good woman; and is gone to a better country, where she now enjoys better society than this vain world affords. O may we all be resigned to the will of God, in this affliction of his providence, and prepare to meet her in that happy land, where the inhabitants no more say they are sick, death is unknown, and parting will be no more. W. REEVES.

Pittsburg, Aug. 12, 1847.

Written for the Western Recorder.

MRS. NANCY ROBINSON.

Respect for the memory of the dead is a sentiment deeply in, and natural to the human mind. Its excitement calls into liveliest exercise some of the loveliest traits that can adorn the character of man. Under the hallowing influence of this sentiment enmity turns aside the point of its warfare, slander is silenced, and envy stands rebuked. There is a sacredness thrown around the memory of the deceased, a potency in the thought that they are no more, that, like a wiered charm wraps itself around the feelings of the heart, softening and subduing them into at least, a respectful regard for the living. But when worth and excellence, known and confessed, combine to elicit an exercise of this sentiment, the heart freely and gladly yields to its power, and indulges in contemplation of the worth and admiration of the excellence. There is a saddening sweetness in dropping a tear o'er the memory of one who, in life, established a character every way worthy of such remembrance.

MRS. NANCY ROBINSON, the subject of the present notice, was born on the 4th of July, A. D. 1790, and in the neighborhood of Carlisle, Cumberland county, Pa. When quite young she removed, in company with her parents to Beaver county, Pa., where she continued to reside until the period of her decease. At an early age she was united in marriage to Hugh Robinson, Sr., whose sorrowing and bereaved heart now feels and mourns in very bitterness of grief her departure. A companionship of more than forty years has not lessened the pain and anguish of a separation; and the ministrations of the hand of time alone can cicatrice the wounds made by the entrance of death.

In the spring of A. D. 1842, she became a member of the Methodist Protestant Church; a branch of which was then being organized in this place, and to her influence, I think I may safely say, New Brighton station is indebted for its present honorable position amid its sister denominations. For, when, in consequence of difficulties, the hearts of almost all the other members were failing them, her's remained firm: and when bowing beneath the weight of circumstances and pressure of untoward events, others spoke of ceasing in their efforts for the full and final establishment of a church founded upon the broad basis of equal rights, she nobly refused to listen to their words of despondency, but urged them to go on, they did so, and they have never had cause to repent. She loved the church of her choice; her feelings were identified with its success, and she gave the best evidence of the sincerity of her heart by embodying her sentiments in action.

The cause or causes of her death were rather complicated. For a number of years previous to her decease she was afflicted with a disease of the heart, attended with all its disagreeable accompaniments. But until within several months she was not confined to her room; being able to move amid her family, cheering them by her presence, and animating them by her example. Finally in consequence of a determination of blood to the head occasioned by the diseased state of the heart, hydrocephalus was induced, which probably hastened her demise. Upon the 7th instant, a decided change took place in her symptoms foreboding in their character. Upon the morning of the 8th, she took her final farewell of the members of her family—shortly after she became speechless, her vision having become entirely obscured some time previously.—In this state she lingered on through the Sabbath, until the morning of the 9th, when she fell asleep, as we fondly hope and have reason to believe, in Jesus, in the 58th year of her age.—She has gone. The family-church" and neighborhood mourn and feel her loss.

As a wife, sister Robinson was kind and affectionate—as a mother, she was tender and attentive; the happiness of her family, in the training of which she was, under the smile of Providence, eminently successful, was closely linked with her own. And towards those who were at distance from home and parents she ever exhibited a mother's care and a mother's kindness. As a friend, she was warm and generous. I would that I were able to do ample justice to her character. But those who have known her, and in whose hearts her memory is embalmed, I need make no excuse for this imperfect tribute of respect. To know her, was to love and esteem her. G. B. M.

Ladies' Department.

A woman of Good Taste.

The following very happy and equally true sketch is from the London Quartely Review.

You see this lady turning a cold eye to the assurances of shopmen and the recommendations of milliners. She cares not how original a pattern may be. if it be ugly, or how recent a shape, if it be awkward. Whatever laws fashion dictates, she follows laws of her own, and is nevev behind it. She wears very beautiful things which people generally suppose to be fetched from Paris, or at least made by a French milliner, but which as often are bought at the nearest town and made up by her own maid. Not that her costume is either rich or new; on the contrary, she wears many a cheap dress, but it is always pretty, and many an old one, but it is always good. She deals in no gaudy confusion of colors, nor does she affect a sudied sobriety; but she either refreshes you with a spirited comrast, or composes you with a judicious harmony, not a scrap of tinsel or trumpery appears upon her. She puts no faith in velvet bands or gilted buttons or twisted cordings. She is quite aware, however, that the garnish is as important as the dress; all in her inner borders and beadings are delicate and fresh, and should anything peep out which is intended to be seen, it is quite as much so as that which is. After all, there is no great art either in her fashions or her materials. The secret simply consists in her knowing the three grand unities of dress—her own station, her own age, and her own points.—And no woman can dress well who does not. After this, we need not say that whoever is attracted by the costume will not be disappointed in the wearer. She may not behandsome or accomplished, will but answer for her being even tempered, well informed, thoroughly sensible, and a complete lady.

FEMALE PIETY.

The gem of all others which enriches the coronet of a woman's character, is unaffected piety. Nature may lavish much on her person; the enchantment of the strength of the intellect; yet her loveliness is uncrowned, till piety throws around the whole the sweetness and power of its charms. She then becomes unearthly in her desires and associations. The spell which bound her affections to the things below is broken, and she mounts on the silent wings of her fancy and hope to the habitation of God, where it is her delight to hold communion with the spirits that have been ransomed from the thraldom of Earth, and wreathed with a garland of glory. Her beauty may throw a magical charm over many; princes and conquerors may bow with admiration at the shrine of her beauty and love; the sons of science may embalm her memory in the page of history; yet her piety must be the ornament, her pearl. Her name must be written in "The Book of Life," that when the mountains fade away, and every memento of earthly greatness is lost in the general wreck of nature, it may remain and swell the list of that mighty throng who have been clothed in the mantle of righteousness, and their voices attuned to the melody of Heaven. With such a treasure, every lofty gratification on earth may be purchased; friendship will be doubly sweet; pain and sorrow will lose their sting, and the character will possess a price far above rubies; life will be but a pleasant visit to earth, and death the entrance upon a joyful and perpetual home. And when the notes of the last trumpet shall be heard, and sleeping millions awake to judgment, its possessors shall be presented faultless before the throne of God with exceeding joy and glory that shall never wear away.

Such is piety. Like a tender flower, planted in the fertile soil of a woman's heart, it grows, expanding its foliage, and imparting its fragrance to all around, till transplanted it is set to bloom in perpetual vigor and unfading beauty in the Paradise of God.

In conclusion I will say, following this star it will light you through every labyrinth in the wilderness of life, gild the gloom that will gather round you in a dying hour, and bring you safely over the tempestuous Jordan of death into the haven of promised and eternal rest.—Phil. Sat. Cour.

COQUETRY.—It is strange, yet nevertheless true, that a virtuous woman will occasionally encourage, unwittingly, and to a certain degree unwillingly, improper addresses. The lover may ask pardon for his indiscretion, but offends again while asking forgiveness. She herself will excuse his love on the plea of innocent intentions. She will then pity his sufferings, while she continues to listen to him as an agreeable flatterer: she exhorts him to fortitude while secretly admiring his generosity; and while she endeavors to instil virtue in his mind she perils her own.—When such a woman succumbs to seductive arts, like Cæsar, she displays dignity in her fall.—There is nothing more absurd and coquettish than a woman pretending to be displeased at the declaration of a love which she already knows to exist, her receiving the visits of an admirer sanctions the declaration, and proves it to be grateful. The pleasure of being loved finds its way into every heart, and Madam de Stael has justly maintained, that we cease to love ourselves if we are not beloved by another. This is a dangerous truth that has tripped up many a woman in the path of rectitude. Our vanity cannot conceive any circumstance more painful and degrading than that of meeting with utter indifference.—How maddening must be such a conviction in the mind of a coquette.

A Mother's Love.

There is nought
In all this cold and hallow world, no fount
Of deep, strong, deathless love, save that within A Mother's heart.

A Mother's love! Who has not known it? Who is there so poor and miserable that has not been thus blessed? And what is there so strong, so sure and undeviating as a dear Mother's Love?

The world may boast of its friendships and truth, and at times dazzle us with its seeming splendor and greatness; man may prove himself worthy of our affection and frankness, and continue to show us true disinterested attachment:—and in the passing events of life, time may produce other congenial souls whose spirits will unite with ours, and thrill and glow with one common sympathy and delightful ecstacy of passion and around whose hearts our best affections and desires will entwine and be nourished, strengthened and beautified by their kindred thoughts and love, until at last by a beautiful and silent quickening influence, & constant nourishment, these tender plants of affection will unite in one common stem, be strengthened by the same warmth, and soon grow up a beautiful and majestic tree, which will be rendered the more lovely and noble under the chilling blast of sorrow or misfortune, and thus long continue to unfold one after another of its heretofore unknown and hidden beauties, until at last it is cut off by the cold and piercing frosts of life's winter, death.

But these ties of affection, although very dear to the heart, are entirely different, these all may change when submitted to the world's fiery ordeal and cannot fully compensate us for a mother's patient, vigilant, and unceasing love.

In childhood, happy childhood, when the world appears so bright and beautiful, and we gaze with such wonder and delight on all that it contains, not knowing and unconscious of its treachery and coldness, we think all are as frank and generous hearted as ourselves: and we seize with such avidity and delight upon each new amusement, and so eagerly participate in all their separate pleasures, until, at last, tired and fatiged, we cast it aside almost wondering what made it so long pleasing or else abandon it to catch some other, which to our childish imagination, appears more attracting.

Amid all the changes of the world, and through all the trials and vicissitudes of life, there is one who cannot change—what has constantly blessed us from infancy with her overflowing kindness, and will continue through all life's varying scenes, to show us real, sincere, undying love, which will continue to grow stronger as afflictions gather around us, and cling the more closely when trouble's dark clouds hover near us, whose countenance will beam with greater kindness when others frown upon us? It is our Mother—the Mother who has always blessed us—whose heart will continue to pulsate with warmest, truest love, when all others become cold and changed—which will ever remain with us through life, until death's cold and inexorable hand shall chill that dear mother's heart with its icy touch, and make her form become cold, inanimate and lifeless, and our mother lies mouldering in the dark and silent tomb. And even then, (if, as some tell us, the spirits of the blessed hover around us here, on earth to protect and guide us,) perhaps, O! glorious thought! she will even then be watching us, as a kind guardian angel, still to protect the cherished child whom she so long continued here to bless and make happy with a Mother's Love.

THREE FAULTS OF NURSES.—1. To lisp in a baby style, when the same words, in an endearing tone, would please as well; the reverse should be—the voice clear, emphatic, and each syllable distinctly articulated for imitation. 2. To tell of witches, ghosts and goblins; such superstitions, impressed upon young minds, are rarely gotten rid of. 3. To direct a child to act like a man; whereas it is not often becoming for little boy to ape the man, but only to conform his demeanor to his age; every age has its own peculiar decorousness.—New England Galary.

LAY OF REFORM.

"WHY STAND YE HERE ALL THE DAY IDLE?"

Hear ye not still those searching words?
Ye who so idly stand!
Say not "no man hath hired us"
To till the Master's land!

Enter with self-devoting will,
And purpose firm and strong;
The earnest worker ne'er shall want
For compensation long.

Should e'en the eleventh hour arrive
Before your work's begun,
The master will as freely pay,
As if ye more had done.

Now, as in days of old, believe,
'Tis not by hours alone
The recompense shall measured be,
Nor yet by progress shown.

No! not by such a slavish rule,
In the vineyard of Reform,
Are workmen judged and recompensed,
In sunshine or in storm.

The SPIRIT, rather, which we show,
Shall measure be of pay,—
The heart must beat in unison
With all the hands essay!

Ho! then, ye idlers! dream no more!
Behold the vineyard wide,
And enter willingly at once,
E'en at life's even tide!

The Power of Kindness.

The human heart, in its natural state, is prone to indulge feelings of revenge towards those whom it regards as enemies, and where these feelings exist, actions corresponding with their nature generally follow as opportunity presents. In this way, it is supposed, our enemies are treated as they deserve, and will in the end be most effectually reduced to submission. Never, however, was there a greater mistake. A more certian course to defeat the object designed could not be adopted. If we wish to subdue an enemy, the most effectual method that can be adopted is to treat him with kindness. Kind feelings and kind actions carry with them a power which cannot be resisted. Even the most hardened and obstinate must yield to their influence. Kindness not only effectually subdues our enemies, but also adds largely to the number of our friends.—A kind man is sure to gather many around him who will cheerfully do any thing in their power to promote his interests and happiness. The power of kindess, no man hath measured, for it is boundless; no man hath seen its death, for it is eternal. In all ages of the world, in every clime, among every kind, it hath shone out, a bright, a beautiful star, a beaming glory.

Look at the case of Saul and David. Bitter and blasting jealousy filled the heart of Saul, and "he sought to take the young man's life."—With hellish hate he hunted him even to the dens and caves of the earth. But David conquered his enemy—even the proud spirit of haughty Saul, to be humbled. And how? Not with sword and spear—not with harsh words and coarse contumely—for these did never touch the heart with gentle influence. No: but with a weapon, simple as the shepherd's sling, yet sure as the arrow of death. 'Twas kindness! This killed the rankling hatred, and left Saul to live. And when it had done its work, Saul said to David, "Thou art more righteous than I, for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil." Was not here a victory more glorious, more godlike, than Wellington ever knew?

See Joseph in the hands of his wicked brethren. For a few pieces of paltry silver, they sold him into Egypt. Providence, in kindness, broke the bands which held him in slavery, and made him a ruler there. Famine spread over the land her dark mantle, and the cruel brethren of Joseph hungered. They went to Egypt for corn. And now, how acted Joseph? More than once he filled their sacks and then returned them their money; and then he made himself known. "I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt!" Here was kindness—forgiveness.—And it crushed to death the spirit of jealousy, that had made him a slave. He had conquered!

Come further down in the world's history, and tell me what word of all those spoken by the "meek and lowly Jesus, the prince of peace, the Savior of the world," was best calculated to soften and subdue the hard hearts of his persecutors? Are we not asked to listen to the soft, sweet tones of that voice—"Father, forgive them!" Oh, here was kindness!—Weekly Messenger.

GOOD ADVICE.

Where'er and erring brother
Departs from honors path,
Reprove him not too harshly,
Nor turn away in wrath;
But point out to him kindly,
The path he should have trod—
And thou will gain his blessing,
And the approval of thy God.

CONSCIENCE.

Conscience is God within us. It is a man's best friend, or his dreaded enemy. Where sin has made it an enemy, it haunts a man everywhere. He has no power to resist it, and he lies perpetually at its mercy. It is a flame kindled in his soul, which inwardly torments and consumes him. It is a viper which twines about his heart, and stings him in the tenderest places. It is a hungry vulture, a never-dying worm, which secretly plays upon his vitals, and fills him with agony and dismay. But where conscience is enlightened and obeyed, it is a friend indeed—a friend at home—an inward, intimate, truly bosom friend. It never deserts us even in the greatest extremity, and is precious beyond all earthly connexions. The friendship of conscience will compensate for the enmity of worlds. He who has a friend in his own heart, possesses the most solid ground of consolation and peace. In the midst of storms, encompassed with dangers, oppressed with sorrows, loaded with undeserved reproach, involved on all sides in impenetrable gloom, he still enjoys inward, unutterable peace and serenity of spirit, which the world knoweth not of, and conscious of integrity, his heart is at rest, trusting in God.—Brooks.

EARLY RISING.—There is no time spent so stupidly as that which inconsiderate people pass in a morning, between sleeping and waking. He who is awake, may be at work or at play; he who is asleep, is receiving the refreshment necessary to fit him for action; but the hours spent in dozing and slumbering are wasted, without either pleasure or profit. The sooner you leave your bed, the seldomer you will be confined to it. When old people have been examined in order to ascertain the cause of their longevity, they have uniformly agreed in one thing only, that "they all went to bed, and all rose, early."—The Circulator.

HOW TO SPEAK IN PUBLIC.—When you mount the stand, be puzzled to know where to put your hat. Look ronnd as though you were quite cool and collected, and suddenly put your hat on the floor. Then turn to the audience, pass your fingers lightly and gracefully through your hair.—and say, "Fellow citizens"—extend your right hand—put your left on your vest, on which ever side it is your private opinion your heart lies—swell your chest as though all the Goddesses of Liberty in the world had left their respective countries, but had taken board in your expansive bosom, and were now struggling to find their way out at the front door. Repress their generous efforts for a while, and then out with them in a blaze of glory.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

The Downward Course of Sin.

1 Men enter and initiate themselves in vicious practices by smaller sins. Heinous sins are too alarming for the conscience of a young sinner; and therefore he only ventures upon such as are smaller, at first. Every particular kind of vice creeps in, in this gradual manner.

2 Having once begun in the way of sin, he ventures upon something greater and more daring. His courage grows with his experience. Now, sins of a deeper die do not look so frightful as before. Custom makes every thing familiar. No person who once breaks over the limits of a clear conscience knows where he shall stop.

3. Open sin soon throws a man into the hands of ungodly companions. Open sins determine his character, and give him a place with the ungodly. He shuns the society of good men, because their presence is a restraint, and their example a reproof to him. There are none with whom he can associate but the ungodly.

4. In the stage, the sinner begins to feel the force of habit and inveterate custom; he becomes rooted and settled in an evil way. Those who have been long habituated to any sin how hopeless is thir reform! One single act of sin seems nothing; but one after another, imperceptibly strengthen the disposition, and enslave the unhappy criminal beyond the hope of recovery.

5. The step in a sinner's course is to lose the sense of shame, and sin boldly and openly. So long as shame remains, it is a great drawback. But it is an evidence of an uncommon height of impiety when natural shame is gone.

6. Another stage in the sinner's progress is to harden himself so far as to sin without remorse of conscience. The frequent repetition of sins stupifies the conscience.—They, as it were, weary it out, and drive it to despair. It ceases all its reproofs, and, like a frequently discouraged friend, suffers the infatuated sinner to take his course.—And hence,

7. Hardened sinners often come to boast and glory in thir wickedness. It is something to be beyond shame; but it is still more to glory in wickedness, and esteem it honerable. Glorious ambition indeed!

8. Not content with being wicked themselves, they use all their arts and influence to make others wicked also. They are zealous in sinning, and industrious in the promotion of the infernal cause. They extinguish the fear of God in others and laugh down their own conscientious scruples. And now,

9. To close the scene, those who have thus far hardened themselves, are given up of God to judicial blindness of mind and hardness of heart. They are marked out as vessels of wrath fitted to destruction.—This is the consequence of their obstinacy.—They are devoted to the judgment they deserve.

Reader! view it with terror.—Dr. Witherspoon.

A Parable.

A child went out one fine morning into the orchard, and saw the fruit tree all in bloom. The scene gladdened him beyond all expression: the great joy, like an ocean, floated a new cargo of beauty into his soul, and ever afterwards he was a greater and better being.

But in a few days he went out again, to behold the rich sight, and the corolla had all fallen off, and leaves only clothed the tree.

Then the child wept, and would not be pacified. Even when his mother told him of the luscious fruit that would be the result of the flowers next fall, he could not believe it. He could see no life emanating from that death, and could accept no promise that such should be the case. His sight was too short to see so far forward; nor was his faith strong enough to believe the prophecy.

But he lived till autumn, and then saw the fruit, with a greater joy than the flowers had given him; and the following winter he ate of the fruit, waxing strong and great thereby.

Ever afterwards the child had more faith. Even when he had became a man, long afterwards, and this lesson had also grown to a stature fitted for the man, when his own feminine counterpart became a prey to death, torn rendingly from his side, he sorrowed not; for he knew the truth which the orchard taught him when a child.

VARIETY.

Do Not Touch It.

One of the greatest difficulties in bringing up young persons into good habits, is that convincing them of the necessity of constantly watching over themselves; so as to avoid the begining of evil. A child can scarcely be brought to understand how one litle fault passed over, can bring about a great sin; yet nothing is more certain than the fact, that this is taking place continually. I dare say, my young friends; that your parents, and teachers, and preachers have, each and all of them, tried to convince you of this; but children require to be told of the same thing over and over again, therefore, though others may have tried to put you right on this subject, there can be no harm if I should try too.

I remember once some children thoughtlessly setting fire to a furze-bush; in five minutes the fire spread to another bush, and soon some hundred of furze-bushes were in the flames; the farmers around had enough to do to prevent their hay-ricks and corn-stalks from being burned to the ground.

I remember, too, some mischievous boys making a hole through the bank of a large pond; at first the water ran out in a very little stream; but, soon after, the hole got wider, and the water come through it, faster and faster; at last the bank gave way, and the water rushed in a flood over an adjoining field, and did much mischief.

Now, as it was with the furze-bush. and the hole in the bank of the pond, it is with every sin; if it be not stopped at once, it will increase in strength, until no one can tell what mischief it may occasion.

Children! you have the seeds of sin in your hearts; and when you consider for a moment that though an acorn be small, yet it will grow into and oak tree, you will perceive how wise it is to take care that your acorn sins do not become oak tree sins; you will see how necessary it is to root them out before they get so strong and sturdy as to defy every effort to remove them.

O lord of grace and glory! deign
Our help and strength to be;
Nor let the seed of sin become
A wide and spreading tree.

CLEANLINESS.—Be ye cleanly. Cleanliness is a virtue. Who loves not a rosy mouth, with clean white teeth beyond? A person may have a fine form, and be really beautiful, but if she is slovenly in her dress, and cares not for her general appearance, who respects her? There are those who appear well outwardly, but never enter a bathing tub from one year to another. No wonder such persons are not more healthy. The little pores of the body are completely stopped, and a race of diseases are thereby engendered. Look at the flesh of such through a powerful magnifying glass, and the body would have some such appearance as the carcass of a dead horse. Attend to the washing of your person, and you will have better health, and live to a greater age. The seeds of disease and death are often sown beneath a foul skin.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

O! in our sterner manhood, when no ray,
Of earlier sunshine glimmers in our way:
When girt with sin and sorrow, and the toil
Of cares, which tear the bosom that they soil;
O! if there be in retrospection's chain
One link that knits us with young dreams again,
One thought so sweet, we scarcely dare to muse
On all the hoarded raptures it reviews;
Which seems each instant, in its backward range,
The heart to soften and its ties to change,
And every spring untouched for years, to move,
It is—The Memory of a Mother's Love!

The Resting Place.

However dark and disconsolate the path of life may have been to any man, there is an hour of deep repose at hand, when the body may sink into a dreamless slumber. Let not the imaginations be startled, if this resting place, instead of the bed of down, shall be the bed of gravel, or the lone, forgetten and cheerless pavement of the tomb. No matter where the poor remains of wearied man may lie, the repose is deep and undisturbed;—the sorrowful bosom heaves no more, the tears are dried up in their fountains, the aching head is at rest, and the stormy waves of the earthly tribulation roll unheeded over the place of graves. Let armies engage in fearful conflict over the very bosom of the pale nations of the dead, not one of the sleepers shall heed the spirit stirring trump, or respond to the rending shouts of victory.

How quiet these millions slumber in the arms of the mother earth. The voice of thunder shall not awake them; the loud cry of the elements—the winds, the waves, nor even the giant tread of the earthquake, shall be able to cause an inquietude in the chambers of death. They shall rest securely through ages; empires shall come and pass away; the last great battle shall be fought, and then a silver voice, at first but just heard shall rise to a tempest tone, and penetrate the voiceless grave. For the trumpet shall hear its voice. There is, however, but one class of persons who may derive comfort from these reflections—those only who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

SCOLDING.—Much injury is done to children by scolding. It should be a prime object with the teacher as well as the parent, to gain the affections of his children; and frequent scolding renders this almost impossible. It alienates the hearts of young children. Depend upon it, they cannot love you as well after you have berated them, as they did before. You may approach them with firmness and decision—you may punish them with severity adequate to the nature of their offences—and they will feel the justice of your conduct, and love you notwithstanding all. But they hate scolding. It excites bad feelings, while it discloses weakness in you, and lowers you in their estimation.—School Friend.

OH YE RUMSELLERS.—The Pittsburg Banner says that a young lady of that city threw herself into the river on Tuesday week, and was drowned before assistance could be rendered. Family difficulties, growing out of intemperance, drove her to the mad act. The kindness she often received was no longer her daily portion; the arm that once folded her in fond fraternal embrace, spurned her; and the lips that once whispered in the language of fondness, now spoke in tones of harshness! Oh, ye rumsellers, what misery you make in this world!

A WISE RESOLUTION.—A man who had evidently just recovered from a hard spree, went into the Fonntain Saloon yesterday, and asked it that was the Temperance Hall, and on being answered in the affirmative, said he wanted to sign the pledge, because if he had minded his business and kept sober, he would have been $147 better off. He is pilot on a flat boat, and had been drunk had lain down night before last with the money in his pocket, and woke up next morning finding his pocket cut and his money gone. Now said he "I'm going to sign the pledge. Never shall another drop of Rum pass my lips." A pledge was drawn up and he put his name to it. This small loss may be his everlasting gain.—Cin. Gazette.

STRIKING ANECDOTE.—Charles XII, King of Sweden, drank sometimes to excess, so as even to disturb his reason. In one of his drunken bouts, he lost the respect which was due to the Queen, his mother. She retired to her chamber, overwhelmed with grief, and remained there on the following day. As she did not make her appearance, the King inquired the cause. This being told, he took a glass of wine in his hand, and went to the Queen's room. "Madam," said he to her, "I have learned that, yesterday, in my cups, I forgot myself towards you. I come to ask your pardon; and to prevent a recurrence of such a fault, I drink this glass to your health; it shall be the last during my life." He kept his words, and from that day he never tasted wine.

NEWS ITEMS.

LOSS OF THE U. S. MAIL SLOOP LEADER.—By a slip from the office of the Charleston Courier, we learn that the sloop Leader, employed in carrying the U. S. mail between Charleston and Key West, when near Jupiter on the 13th inst., started her cut water and broke her lower pintle, which caused her to leak. Although in this crippled situation, by the combined efforts of her officers and crew she was kept afloat until Sunday, July 18, when she encountered heavy gales which increased the leak so that all hands working at the pumps could not keep her free. The Captain at 4 o'clock in the afternoon bore away for the nearest land, with much difficulty succeeded in landing the crew, mail bags, passengers part of their clothing. After remaining on the beach three days, they were taken off by a wrecker and carried to Key West. The hull & materials were sold at Key West for $5,650, and the cargo of butter, rice, wine, &c. for $7,516.

Correspondence of the Pittsburgh Gazette.

CONFLAGRATION AT NEW YORK.—On Sunday night a fire broke out in the city of New York, in a store belonging to Messrs. Rogers and Creon on Front near Governor's street, destroying four wooden buildings, on Front, and twelve on Water street, principally occupied by poor families. One hundred persons are rendered houseless by this calamity!

Little or no insurance had been effected on the property.

ROBBERY AT NEWARK.—The American Hotel at Newark, Ohio, was entered on the night of the 11th instant, by false keys it is supposed, as all the doors were found unlocked in the morning, and some eight large trunks were taken out rifled of their contents. One trunk was represented to contain five hundred dollars. A quantity of wearing apparel, ladies' jewelry, &c., was taken from the trunks.

P. S. We learn that since the robbery, circumstances induced the suspicion that the gentleman claiming to have lost the $500, was a party to the robbery, and he was accordingly arrested. Two persons supposed to be his accomplices, were also overhauled at St. Louisville, and imprisoned, and the officers were in pursuit of two more.—Weekly Ohio State Journal.

SMOKE.—The People of Pittsburgh seem determined to get rid of the smoke nuisance in that city, if possible. It is stated in the Gazette that in addition to the $100 offered for the best method of consuming smoke in ordinary household stoves and cooking apparatus, gold medals of fifty dollars each are offered to such persons as shall, within three months, present the most satisfactory results in their application of a smoke preventive, or smoke consuming apparatus, in a furnace or factory, and on a steamboat.

CHUCHES IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.—According to Doggett's new Directory, the number of churches of each denomination in the city, is as follows: Baptist 26; Congregational 7; Dutch reformed, 15; Friends, 4; Jewish, 9; Lutheran, 3; Methodist Protestant, 1; Methodist Episcopal, 31; Presbyterian 33; Associate Presbyterian, 3; Protestant Episcopal, 41; Roman Catholic, 17; Unitarian, 4; Universalist, 4; Welch, 2, Miscellaneous 12;

MORE BARNS BURNT.—On the night of the 16th inst. the barn of Daniel Snively, in Paris township, Stark county, was struck by lightning, and entirely consumed, with all its contents—including a Threshing Machine, Wagon, and many others things. Loss 15 or $1600.

On the same night the barn of Mr. Whiteweather, about two miles from Minerva, in Carroll county, was struck by lightning, & burned to the ground. The barn contained nearly the entire harvest of Mr. Whiteweather.—Weekly Ohio State Journal.

CURIOUS CIRCUMSTANCE.—A short time since while a child of a gentleman in this place was playing in the yard, says the Old Colony Record it was suddenly attacked by a large rooster, and severely injured. The rooster struck it in the head with his spurs, cutting through its cheek and making other deep gashes in its face; it also picked the child's head and breast, and would probably have killed it if the father had not fortunately happened to come into the yard in time to rescue it. The rooster was immediately killed.

POETRY.

From the Christian Chronicle.

THE PILGRIM'S LAY.

BY MISS R. A. RHEES.

"Let me go, for the day breaketh."
"Oh! that I had wings like a dove, for then would I fly away, and be at rest."

Let me depart! Why should my spirit wander
An exile from its Father's house on high?
Why its rich gifts of thought and feeling squander
On aught that will not live beyond the sky?

Earth's brightest light, though glorious in its seeming,
Has failed to satisfy my longing heart;
A softer radiance from above is streaming
Upon my spirit's gaze. Let me depart!

Upon Earth's fairest skies the storm-clouds gather,
Its brightest hues the soonest pass away,
Its loveliest blossoms are the first to wither,
Its treasure, as we clasp them, turn to clay?

Let me depart! My very soul is weary,
Life's stony path-way I would tread no more,
The world, with all its glow and glare, is dreary,
Let me depart, and seek a brighter shore.

There is a brighter shore. Its light is breaking
Across the dark recesses of my soul,
Its loftiest powers into life awaking,
Bidding its earthly feelings own control.

There is a brighter shore, a heavenly dwelling,
Where from the eye no tears of anguish start.
Where not a single breast with grief is swelling;—
There is a better land. Let me depart!

That better land! Upon my raptured vision,
Its fadeless flowers, its glowing prospects swell!
That better land! Amid its bowers Elysian,
The blest and beautiful forever dwell!

Let me depart! I have no home but Heaven,
Where only can I rest my weary heart;
The strongest tie of Earth to me is riven,—
I would not linger here. Let me depart!

LIFE IN EARNEST.

It is the eternal lifetime that makes the lifetime of earth such a solemn thing. Sever the living here from the living hereafter and man's longest being on earth is little more in importance than the flutter of a leaf,—his death but the falling of a blossom. But fasten on the infinite and the eternal to our present existence, and everything in life becomes mighty, momentous, solemn. The pang that shoots through our frame and makes each fibre quiver, is such as even a weak woman might endure—were it but for a moment—were it to die with us and be buried in the same tomb,—were there no capacity of eternal anguish in our nature, or no eternity in which that capacity might develope itself. The sting of a moment is a trifle, but the eternal stinging of the undying worm is terrific, beyond all utterance. In like manner the thrill of fresh joy which makes the whole man throb with delight, would be scarce worth the having or the losing, were it only like the lightning, flashing intensely bright, and then quenched forever. But a nature gifted with faculties for infinite enjoyment, and with a whole eternity wherein these joyous buds shall expand themselves in undecaying beauty and fragrance, turns our whole life into a deep and awful reality. A flower that folds its leaves, and withers down at sunset, may be carelessly trodden under foot; but a star that shall roll round forever in its orbit,—either effulgent in its brightness or dark in the gloom of its own chaos, is an object of wonder and awe.

Such is the life of man,—not of one man, or of some men, but of every man. By itself it may seem a plaything; in connection with the everlasting future, it becomes awfully real and solemn in its aspect. We may be poor, unlettered, obscure, hard-toiling men, still our life is an infinite reality,—no mere shadow, or vision, but an inconceivable reality in all its parts great or small.

We must then live in earnest. No other kind of life deserves the name. Life is not life if it be not in earnest. Any thing short of this is gross inconsistency,—an utter mockery of life. In truth, there can be no rational medium between flat infidelity and the most glowing fervor. If there be any thing in real life, or any thing real in eternity, we must be in earnest. If our souls have any value beyond the trees of the forest, we must be in earnest. If heaven be no fable and hell no dream, we must be in earnest. If God so loved the world as to give his Son for us, we must be in earnest. If Jesus died and rose again, and lives in heaven for us, we must be in earnest. 'Whatsoever our hand findeth to do, let us do it with our might.'

Gedenke zu leben,—think of living, is one of Goethe's thoughtful aphorisms. And Carlyle's commentary upon it is worthy of himself. 'Thy life, wert thou the pitifulest of all the sons of earth, is no idle dream, but a solemn reality. It is thy own. It is all thou hast to confront eternity with. Work, then, like a star, unhasting yet unresisting.'

There are some so-called Christians, who never seem to work at all. At least they work none for Christ. They lay claim to the name of Christian as their undoubted birthright, and are blinded enough in their self-complacency as to fancy that they deserve it. But they work none for Christ. The speak none for Christ. They have never even sought to glorify him. His honor, his kingdom, his cause, are things, or rather words, of no practical meaning to them. As to self-denial or sacrifice for his sake, or in behalf of his people, they never thought of such a thing. And as to seeking to win souls to him, that is altogether without their range of duty or circle of exertion. They are wells without water, trees whose fruit withereth,—twice dead, plucked up by the root. Of a life in earnest they have no conception. Eternity to their eye is nothing but distant vacancy.

There are other Christians who work, but they are not in earnest. They move forward in a certain track of duty, but it is with weary footstep.—Their motions are constrained and cold. They do a good many things, devise a good many schemes, say many excellent things; but the vigorous pulse of warm life is a wanting. Zeal,—glowing zeal,—elastic and untiring, is not theirs. There is more about them of the machine than the man. They neither burn themselves nor do they kindle others. They are neither inspired nor do they inspire. There is nothing of the star about them except its coldness. When the Master comes what recompense do they look for? What crown do they expect to wear?

There are others who are in earnest, but it is the earnestness of mere impulse. They are earnest only by fits and starts. They cannot be safely counted on, for their fervor depends so much on the humor of the moment. At one time none can be more zealous than they,—at another none more indifferent. A naturally impulsive temperament, of which they are not sufficiently aware, and which they have not sought to crucify, renders them irregular and uncertain in their movements. These are difficult to deal with, and sometimes a little dangerous too. Their intermittent earnestness effects comparatively little. They do and they undo. They build up and they pull down. They kindle and quench the flame alternately. There is nothing of the 'star' about them at all. Might they not learn to work 'like a star, unhasting yet unresisting.'

There are others who are always in earnest, but it is the earnestness of bustle and restlessness. They cannot live but in the midst of bustling and scheming, and moving to and fro. Their temperament is that of nervous, tremulous, impatient kind, that any thing like rest or retirement is positive restraint and pain to them. These seldom effect much themselves, but they are often useful by their perpetual stir and friction for keeping or setting others in motion, and preventing stagnation around them. Their incessant motion prevents them from being filled within with the needed grace. Their continual contact with the outward things of religion hinders their inward growth and mars their spiritually. Certainly these are like the star, 'unresisting,' yet not like it 'unhasting,' for they move forward with such haste, that they have no time to gather light or to give it forth. They would require to be taught what a life in earnest really is.

There are others somewhat like these last, yet not entirely of the same tremulous mould. They are steady, earnest, persevering workers; not laboring by fits and starts, nor stirring and bustling as if quiet were pain. They work with energy and patience, 'not wearying in well-doing.' Yet there is something awanting. They work so much more than they pray, that they are often like vessels without oil either for themselves or others. They grudge no toil nor sacrifice; they are always ready at their post, yet they so much neglect the inward preparation, that their hours of communion with God bear a very small proportion to their intercourse with their fellow-men.—These are like the star both unhasting and unresisting, yet their light is dim. Its reflection upon a dark world is faint indeed. They take but little pains to increase its brightness, and remove all interposing shadows, so that, though they do not possess light, yet it shines with feeble and ineffectual ray.

The true life in earnest is different from all these. It possesses some elements in common with some of these, yet it is not the same. It is a thing of depth and intensity. It is a thing of solemnity and greatness and power. It carries ever about with it the air of calm and restful dignity. It is fervent but not feverish; energetic but not excited; speedy in all its doings but never hasty; prudent but not timid or selfish; resolute and fearless but not rash; unobtrusive, and sometimes, it may, be silent, yet making all around to feel its influence; full of joy and peace, yet without parade or noise; overflowing with tenderness and love, yet at the same faithful and true. And all this coming forth from a soul at peace with God and living in realizing consciousness of assured reconciliation with its Father in heaven. For no motives however animating,—no influences however stimulating, can ever produce true life in earnest, apart from the peace and joy of God within. It is the joy of the Lord that is our strength. It is in knowing our standing and our obligations as redeemed by the blood of God's eternal Son, that we feel as Paul felt when he said, 'I am debtor both to the Greeks and the Barbarians, both to the wise and the unwise.'

What is there after all, worthy of an immortal being but a life in earnest? Less than this may do for the beasts that perish, but nothing less than this will do for the being that is to live forever. We shall soon be passing into eternity, and should we not be in earnest? Can we afford to trifle? Have we time to be idle? The Master had none—shall the servant have? W. S. S.

"The way they do here."

NO. V.

Mr. Editor: I now proceed to communicate some further particulars relative to the deplorable schism which has found its way into our society as mentioned in my last. And will state as briefly as possible the extent of the division—the effects it produced and its final disorganization, also its reorganization as an independent society, and its final and present standing; which would occupy considerable time and space to give any thing like a correct and full history of the events that I shall endeavor to put into as small a compass as possible.

Towards the close of the time before spoken of, frequent disappointments on the part of the ministry had a tendency to heighten the perplexity of the society, and gave some an excuse to attach themselves to the sect that had caused their first uneasiness, and to others it was considered just cause of abandoning the place and the society to follow the inclinations of their own appetites. But the majority continued true to their trust as though nothing had occurred to mar their peace, with the exception that they had taken the privilege to think and speak for themselves on a certain tenet in theology which the higher functionaries were not very well pleased with.

To put an end to this heresy, a preacher was dispatched whose arbitrary character and particular favoritism for the peculiar dogma was well known to be any thing else than reconcileable to the condition and feelings of the society. And acting probably from misinformation, he assumed a position which he would doubtless have avoided if he had been personally acquainted with those he had to deal with and the situation they were placed in. Consequently his presence only gave a fresh impetus to the work already begun, and hastened to a termination the critical and extremely doubtful destination of this unfortunate commotion that none could foresee the end thereof.

The first act of this new and arbitrary executive was to publicly denounce the whole band, and then citing the principal in what his honor was pleased to call "the sedition" to appear before the proper tribunal to hear and decide such cases, declaring at the same time that the accused was not nor could not be considered a member of the church while under an arrest until the court the offenders were amenable to had decided on the accusation. And then taking his leave, proceeded to lay the case before the body referred to which was to be in its regular session in a short time, some forty miles distant, out of the reach of defence or evidence in the case.

While absent the society at one of its regular meetings (the next Sabbath) declared the procedure against themselves, and one of their number particularly, uncalled for, and that they would sustain the accused whatever might be his fate, then in the hands of an ecclesiastical judiciary, without a shadow of evidence except in the person of the prosecutor, and him without any personal knowledge of the allegations. But as rumor is never wanting for something to occupy the idle mind to speculate upon, so in this case, rumor laid a foundation and malevolence built upon it a great structure, & temerity had it to demolish, regardless of consequences, either past, present, or future, visible or invisible.

But suspense was soon removed from the minds of those interested, for a decision was had without much ceremony, and the preacher dispatched to bear the tidings to those concerned, and to execute the judgment of the Reverend court. When he arrived and preliminaries properly adjusted, he proceeded as a summary punishment to publicly read the "criminal" out of the church, and concluded by warning all present and the society in particular, to beware of the excommunicated brother and regard him as a very dangerous person; and in a very eloquent exhortation portrayed the evils arising from such a course. Whereupon he was informed of the action of the society in behalf of the expelled brother. "Then," said he, "you have expelled yourselves with him and have no place or standin the —— —— Church," and immediately departed, leaving them to themselves and to do as they best could.

Things passed on in this situation for months as though nothing had occurred to interrupt the 'even tenor of their way.' Meetings were as frequent and as interesting as they formerly had been, and no alteration seemed to have taken place than that they were confined to a smaller sphere of action than when under the protection of a large and popular church that was capable of guiding the destiny of the thousands that implicitly obeyed the mandates of those bearing rule over the confiding adherents. And notwithstanding the cord of confidence had been unmercifully cut asunder, after a length of time a compromise was proposed from "head quarters," but it would not take for the reason that the wound had been made too deep to admit of being healed on the principles proposed, and finally an agreement to disagree brought all connection to a close between the two parties that had hitherto existed, and it now became necessary for the society to adopt means and measures exclusively for itself, which was effected by an independent organization, free from the trammels of all other denominations, sects, or associations known to it. This organization took place on Christmas evening after a protracted prayer meeting of about three day's duration, and when organized the whole number amounted to about twenty.

After a length of time a preacher was heard of at a distance that was entertaining congregations with a dispensation of the gospel wherever he could meet with an opportunity, and being of a new denomination to any that had been known hereabouts, and bearing the singular name of "Radical," gave rise to various conjectures. The association being without both preacher and preaching, gave him an invitation to preach at their place of worship and the invitation was accepted, an appointment was made and filled and other appointments made until the old man had attended several times. At length a protracted meeting was proposed and the preachers of the same order were called upon to assist. A general satisfaction was given to all that attended, and to those particularly for whose benefit it was appointed, and before it came to a final close proposals were made for the purpose of receiving the associated church into the folds of the Methodist Protestant Church, which was duly considered and acceded to. Since then we have had various scenes to pass through, "but hitherto the Lord hath helped."

Although these short sketches have not been carried to the extent they were at first intended, I have thought my inadequacy to the task would fail to give the interest they deserve. Therefore, Farewell. N. C.

Good Advice to a Young Minister.

An extract from a private letter, written by an aged minister, to a young man entering upon the duties of the sacred office:

* * "Your position is an important one, and will impose—especially on the shoulders of a boy—most solemn responsibilities.—But "it is good to bear the yoke in youth." Buy and borrow all the books you can, and use them as you do your dictionary, as mere sources of reference. But few books are worth reading through.—Read with pen in hand and lay by in the store-house, from which you must draw every week, suitable materials for sermons. In actual preparations for the pulpit, avoid as much as possible the drudgery of committing; but make yourself as familiar as time will permit, with both thoughts and words of the manuscript containing notes previously arranged. If this is done, there will be no difficulty in constructing sentences in extempore delivery. When you are in the pulpit the less you are encumbered with notes the better. I have kept none before me for the last twenty years. Make all your sermons as perfect on paper as time will allow; so that at any future time, in case of emergency, a brief review will enable you to use them. It is always better, however, when you can, to prepare a sermon in view of the present wants of the congregation to whom it is to be delivered; for a fresh discourse will generally take a deeper hold on your own feelings, and of course on the feelings of your audience. Never let your sermons exceed an hour in length. If your hearers do not profit by what they hear in that time, they will not be likely to do it afterwards.

A weekly prayer meeting, a monthly concert, and an efficient Sabbath School, will be indispensable to the prosperity of your congregation. To aid the latter, ask the church for a few dollars to procure for the children a Juvenile periodical. Have the numbers sent to your address, and distribute them in person to the children on Sabbath morning. When read, require the papers to be returned to school, and send them out again to irreligious families, for the purpose of drawing their children also into the school. Much will depend on the Superintendent of your school. In selecting that officer the inquiry should not be who will take the station as a burden, but who is best qualified for its duties, and will most faithfully discharge them? I would also add that it would be well to have a quarterly examination of the pupils, and a sermon adapted to their capacities." * *

A Sermon on Popery.

The following paragraphs written by the Rev. John Wesley, we regard as a whole system of political and moral policy, worthy of adoption by all Protestants for the regulation of their feelings and conduct towards Roman Catholics.—The sentiments are not unkind, but firm, not cowardly, but cautious, not cunning, but wise: they constitute a whole controversy brought to a point. They evince a correctness of observation, and maturity of judgment worthy of the founder of Methodism. We commend them to our readers.

B.

"The generality of Roman Catholics, wherever I have been, are of the same principles, and the same spirit, with their forefathers. And, indeed if they had the same principles, it could not be doubted but they would be of the same practice too if opportunity would serve.

"These principles openly avowed by their forefathers of priestly absolution, Papal indulgences, and no faith to be kept with heretics, have never been openly and authoritatively disavowed, even unto this day. And until they are, a Roman Catholic, consistent with his principles, cannot be trusted by a Protestant.

"I would not hurt a hair of their head. Meantime, I would not put it into their power to hurt me, or any other person whom they believe to be a heretic. I steer the middle way. I would neither kill nor be killed. I would not use the sword against them, nor put it into their hands, lest they should use it against me; I wish them well, but dare not trust them."—Ch. Reps.

Six Hundred Pastoral Visits.

We heard a clergyman in this city make a statement before his congregation on Sunday last, that during the present year of his labor, he had made six hundred and fifty pastoral visits among his people. We were struck with this exhibition of faithfulness on the part of the pastor.—The state of the church, as might be reasonably expected, is prosperous and good. The minister knows all his members, and not a word of complaint is heard of neglect of pastoral duty. All are seen, conversed with, and prayed with. No man on earth is entitled to more respect and honor than the faithful minister of the Lord Jesus.—His aim is the best good of his people, and all his powers are engaged for their spiritual welfare.—What a rebuke for the unfaithful pastor. He cares nothing for his flock, and as is very natural, they care but little about him. The church is revived and blessed under the ministration of one, and sinks and groans under the neglect of the other.—Gen. Evan.

TEMPERANCE.

The Drunkard's Wife.

The following is an extract from the prize tale of Mrs. H. Livermore, published in the New England Washingtonian. It is founded on facts:

One winter afternoon, when huge drifts of snow blocked up the narrow and irregular street of the city, when the fitful wind which blew from all points of the compass, dashed hither and thither through the keen air, the broad snow-flakes, Mrs. Austin, scantly clad, and illy calculated to brave the raging tempest, left her home to seek one of the numerous seamen's clothing stores, called "slop-shops," which were scattered throughout Ann street and its vicinity. In her hand was a large bundle of work, just completed by herself, George and Emma, and upon the payment she was expecting for her labor, the family was depending for their evening meal. During her absence, her husband staggered homewards in a shocking state of inebriety, where Emma and Charles, the younger son, were endeavoring to amuse the infant Charlotte, not yet a year old, who, always delicate, was now helpless as infancy itself, from a recent severe illness, and who lay in the cradle, wailing her mother's absence. As Mr. Austin approached the little one, and raised her in his arms with the natural kindness which not intemperance could banish from his nature, Emma, unaware of her father's deep intoxication, accustomed as she was to seeing him more or less so constantly, and perceiving that the babe was quiet, ran down stairs to the almost empty wood-shed, where her brother George was seeking fuel to prepare their supper, and Charles followed after her. Mr. Austin moved towards the fire-place, and endeavored to seat himself; but, loosing his balance, he fell, and in falling, the babe rolled from his arms, with its face downwards, into the fiery bed of glowing coals that lay on the hearthstone. The child was too much enfeebled by recent illness, to extricate itself, the father so dreadfully intoxicated, that some minutes elapsed before he was fully aware of its condition, or could recover his feet; its cotton garments were then blazing; its tender face, neck, and bosom were hissing on the hot coals, & its efforts to shriek were only convulsive and agonized gasps.

One glance at his infant's excruciating pains, drove the fumes of intoxication from his brain, clearness came to his head, steadiness to his hand, and with the quickness of lightning he drew the burning babe from the flames, dashed over it a vessel of water, and was hastening to the door for assistance, when the fleet and anxious footsteps of his wife sounded on the stairs, and whiter than the sheeted dead, his tongue rigid with horror, with the reeking, blistered, blackened form of his babe in his arms, he stood face to face with its mother.

Oh, God! who can tell the unspoken agony of the moment! paralyzed, rooted to the floor as if transformed to stone, with parted lips, from whence issued no sound, her heart beating loud and heavily, so that she almost reeled from the force of its sickening throb, she fixed her eye steadily on her husband for a moment, as if to read the whole tale, and then, prompted by the instincts of her maternal heart, she threw off her trance of horror, and flew to seek relief.

But the poor little innocent inhaled the scorching gas of its fiery pillow, and the severest of its burns, terrible as they were, externally, could neither be seen or reached. The small veins of the neck were tense and knotted, under the quivering flesh; its very breath caused convulsive throbs, and rolling upward its sightless eyes, spasmodically clenching its feeble hands, its delicate sinews tightened with agony, the half released soul that hung quivering on its lips, was speedily freed.

It was months ere Charlotte Austin could throw off from her spirit the horrible torpor which settled upon her, after the agonizing death of her delicate babe.

It seemed as if paleness would never more leave her check, as if her eye would never more burn steadily, nor her voice be cleared of huskiness, as if she had forgotten even to smile or to converse, for she moved about as if all but the animal mechanism of her life were paralyzed. None knew the secret of the accident which had occurred, save the parents, and the vague reply of Mrs. Austin, "that the babe fell into the fire during her absence," fastened upon her the charge of carelessness and neglect among her neighbors, and in the multiform accounts of the occurrence that found their way into the city. She never repelled the charge, but Christ-like, was content to bear the sins of him who had so cruelly wronged her and hers, and to receive the odium which he deserved. With the same meek, uncomplaining kindness, she continued to minister to his wants, uttering no word of harshness, looking no rebuke, save what was conveyed by the mournful gaze of her eye.

What I do if I Vote for License.

I license every retailer of liquors in the township to make me, my children, and my neighbors drunkards, if he can, and thereby:

I license him to get from me my farm, my town lot, my tools, my plough, my bed, my furniture, my bread and meat, and the clothing from the backs of myself, my wife and my children. And all for worse than nothing.

I license him to take from me my character, my happiness, my health and my hope of Heaven!

I license all my neighbor's cruelty to his family, who has been made a drunkard at the licensed coffee-house—and when I see his wife and children suffering hard-biting poverty, woe, wounds, sorrow and neglect, I may comfort myself with the reflection, I licensed all this.

I license all the swearing, gambling and fighting, which may be done at the licensed coffee-house-tavern, or grocery!

I license all murders which may be committed under the influence of the liquor sold at the licensed shop!

Is a quiet conscience worth anything for a death-bed? Then write carefully on your ballot, & independently, but firmly vote NO LICENSE. —Marion Tract.

Disastrous Shipwreck.—The Moreton Bay Courier Extraordinary, of March 18th announces the wreck of the Sovereign steamer, with the loss of nine cabin and sixteen steerage passengers, seventeen of the crew, and a cargo of wool. She grounded on the bar at Amity point, (Australia) and afterwards foundered in four fathoms water. The pecuniary loss is estimated at £20,000.

Miscellaneous.

Send me the Paper.

1. "Because I am wiser than I was last year at this time. I then wrote, 'Stop!' on a valuable religious periodical, and sent it to the Editor. I am now wise enough to write stop, on such a course of folly.

2. "Send me the paper, because I have been no gainer by stopping it. I do not know that there is a penny more in my pocket for writing stop! and I do know that, spiritually, I am lean and thin-visaged. The truth is, I have been starving this twelve-month. Shame on the man, says my conscience, that can suffer the children of this world to be wiser in these matters than the children of the kingdom. Send me the paper, therefore. I must know, I will know, the joys and sorrows of Zion. I will sympathise in her sadness, and glory in her triumphs. I will once more look out on the moral features of the world. I will not hide my face from the gloom and misery of a race perishing in sin. I will not shut my eyes from what I ought to see, know, and feel. Stop my paper? No. I am ashamed of that. It is stopping eyes, and ears, and heart. It is stopping love, and zeal, and prayer, and usefulness. It is stopping up fountains of happiness, No! I will not stop the paper; so send it Mr. Editor; and when you see stop! written on another of my papers returned, you may be assured it has been done for one who has gone to the poor-house, or the mad-house, or the house appointed for all the living."

How many families are actually starving, mentally and spiritually, for want of wholesome nourishment; ignorant of the diffusion of light; the state of perishing millions? Why is it so? are they poverty-stricken? Is time redeemed; temperance and frugality consulted in every thing? Cast your eye upon that table. What seest thou? Likewise, behold the external decorations, the gew-gaws, the artificials, the folly and frippery of fashion! Money expended for what? to ruin body and soul; sufficient to purchase books, and a score of periodicals, to store the mind with knowledge pure and infinite.

What! an individual loving God supremely, his cause above every thing, thirsting for the water of life, and not abandon forever his tea and coffee, his cigar and snuff-box, with every poisonous luxury? Can it be? and still plead poverty as an excuse for not furnishing himself and family, richly, with mental and spiritual food!!

Keeping Folks in Meeting.

When Mr. Moody, (Handkerchief Moody,) was on a journey, I think in the western part of Massachusetts, he called on a brother in the ministry, on Saturday, thinking to spend the Sabbath with him, if agreeable. The man appeared very glad to see him, and said,

"I should be very glad to have you stop and preach for me to-morrow, but I feel almost ashamed to ask you."

"Why, what is the matter?" said Mr. Moody.

"Why, our people have got into such a habit of going out before meeting is closed, that it seems to be an imposition on a stranger."

"If that is all, I must and will stop and preach for you," was Mr. Moody's reply.

When the Sabbath day came, and Mr. Moody had opened the meeting and named his text, he looked around on the assembly, and said,

"My hearers, I am going to speak to two sorts of folks to-day, saints and sinners. Sinners, I am going to give your portion first, and I would have you give good attention."

When he had preached to them as long as he thought best, he paused, and said,

"There, sinners, I have done with you now; you may take your hats and go out of the meeting house as soon as you please." But all tarried and heard him through.

Wants a Husband.

Rather a spicy law question has come before one of the Paris Courts, giving publicity to the following dramatic circumstances out of which it grew: A certain young and pretty actress, who, by shrewd management and economy, had contrived to lay up a serviceable fortune, became inspired with the unprofessional desire to exchange her untrammelled celibacy for an orderly marriage. Looking around among her admirers, she cast her eyes upon a young man of honorable connections, who by a course of headlong dissipation, had plunged irrecoverably in debt. Her immediate resolve was to bring about a bargain—the payment of his debts in exchange for the right to call her by his aristocratic name. Sure of a refusal while in free air, she proceeded to buy up the claims against him, and threw him into prison. Here he received her conditional first offer—"Prison of marriage in exchange for prison of stone." The young man declined, and still continues to decline the alliance, declaring that she may deprive him of his liberty, but he will not stain the escutcheon of his family by a disgraceful alliance. Once a month, however, she calls, and repeats the offer, and there have been large bets, as to the final results, based on the probable strength of the love of liberty.—Sat. Ev. Post.

Accountability.

How little do we think of our accountability to God! Money is not ours to hide in a napkin; good thoughts are not ours to be kept hid in the bosom; power is not our to elevate ourselves; influence is not ours to lie dead. We must render an account to God for the manner we use every thing he has given us. Our voices, our purses, our eyes, our hands our lives, our whole influence should speak in lessons of wisdom and mercy. A thousand streams of gladness should emanate from us to fertilize the moral soil, and prepare it to be transplanted at last, to a more congenial clime. At the bar of heaven, that man must stand confounded whose whole life has been spent in selfish acts, and from whom no good influence has gone forth to regenerate and save the wretched and lost. May not such a doom be ours.—N. Y. Organ.

Parent, remember, "there is no greater defect in educating children, than neglecting to accustom them to work." "Every boy should have his head, his heart, and his hand, educated. Let this truth never be forgotten."

A destructive fire occurred in New York city on Monday morning, destroying 14 buildings near the corner of Front and Water streets. The loss of property is very great, but mostly covered by insurance. It is not known how the fire originated.

CONFERENCE PROCEEDINGS.

From the Waynesburgh (Pa.) Watchman.

APPOINTMENTS OF THE PITTSBURGH ANNUAL CONFERENCE.—(M. P. GHURCH.)

The Methodist Protestant Church opened its session in this place, agreeably to appointment, on Tuesday last, at 9 o'clock A. M. An able introductory sermon was delivered by the President, Rev. G. Brown, after which the usual routine of business was transacted.

On Wednesday, the election of President resulted in the choice of the present worthy incumbent for another year.

The following resolutions were submitted and adopted:—

WHEREAS, The 23d article of religion of the Methodist Protestant Church, recognises the Government of the United States as sovereign and independent and ought not to be subject to foreign dictation and jurisdiction. Therefore,

Resolved, That this Annual Conference will not confer the ordination of Deacon or Elder, or admit into her Itinerant ranks any individual who is an alien, and who will not declare his intention to be a citizen of the United States by taking the oath of allegiance according to Law.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Annual Conference be, and are hereby tendered to the citizens of Waynesburg and vicinity for the friendly reception and hospitable entertainment extended unto its members, accompanied with the assurance that while the kindness thus manifested is now reciprocated in feeling and sentiment, it shall also ever remain a source of pleasant and agreeable reminiscence.

On Sunday, at 11 o'clock, Rev. T. H. STOCKTON, of Philadelphia, preached to an audience of about one thousand persons, in the Grove at the east end of town. The large auditory was held in wrapt attention for an hour and a half, by the eloquence and elevated thought of the speaker.

The several pulpits in town were supplied by the members of Conference, during its session, to the general acceptance of the community.

Report of Committee on Finance.

DEAR BRETHREN: Your Committee on Finance find with deep regret, that the Conference Steward's report will exhibit a great delinquency on the part of the Circuits and Stations, in meeting the disciplinary allowance of the Itinerant Brethren who have labored for them during the past year; & we have felt a deep anxiety to ascertain the true cause or causes of this evil among us, that this serious hindrance to the prosperity of our church may be removed.

We cannot be persuaded that it arises from a want of ability on the part of the District to support its ministry, nor do we conceive that our people are unwilling to render a righteous compensation to those who break to them the Bread of Life.

But we think this unpleasant state of things has been (at least in part) produced by the premature division of Circuits and setting off Stations, we are induced to the belief that the wholesome restriction of our discipline on this head, has not been duly regarded by this Annual Conference, in creating new Circuits and Stations.—The discipline says, "No Station or Circuit shall be divided unless each part have ability to support one or more preachers." This we think has been frequently done, and the consequence is, that we have a number of small Circuits and Stations that are not able to support their preachers in a creditable manner.

Again: The Superintendants have neglected, in many instances, to see that the plan of the Annual Conference for raising the means of support for its Itinerant laborers, has been carried into effect, and it has been ascertained that in almost every case where the scheme alluded to (the subscription plan) has been faithfully carried into effect, that our preachers have received their salaries; and where it has been neglected they have not; and it is well known that all denominations of Christians in this land, who pay their ministers, have adopted the subscription plan.

In view of the embarrassed state of our financial affairs, the question has frequently occurred to our minds, what can be done?

All feel the necessity of adopting some energetic measures and vigorously carrying them into effect.

In view of improving the condition of our financial affairs, we recommend the passage of the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1st. That the plan of raising means of support by subscription, for the travelling preachers of the Pittsburgh District, be adopted in all our Circuits and Stations.

2nd. That it shall be the duty of each class or society, to select a person or persons, whose duty it shall be to call on each member of the church, and those who set under our ministry, to subscribe what he or she may feel able to pay, during the year, in quarterly instalments, be it much or little, and enter the same in a book or paper kept for that purpose.

3rd. That it shall be the duty of each superintendent on his first round on his Circuit, or at the first leaders meeting in his Station, to publish this plan and see that some one be appointed in each class, to raise subscription as aforesaid.

4th. That it shall be the duty of each person appointed to raise subscribtion, to hand over the subscription paper or book, to the class leader or Steward of the class, and it shall be the duty of such leader, or Steward, to collect in quarterly instalments, each ones subscription, and also to report to the first Quarterly Conference the amount subscribed.

5th. That it shall be the duty of the chairman of each Quarterly Conference, to enquire particularly of each collector, whether suitable efforts have been made to collect the quarterly instalments.

6th. That it is the opinion of this Conference, that it is the duty of every member of the Meth. Protestant Church, to contribute to the support of the ministry; and the wilful neglect of this duty shall be disposed of as in all other cases of delinquency.

W. REEVES,
J. COUP,
P. KENEDY.

A communication was received by the Conference, through the President, Br. G. Brown, from Br. Elias A. Wheat, a member of the committee of correspondence, of the Genesee District, of the Methodist Protestant Church; recommending "the calling of a convention of the church, for the purpose of altering the constitution and Discipline, so as to exclude slavery." And,—"That in case a majority of Conferences will not sustain the call for convention of the church, that a call be made for a convention of the Northern Conferences, for the purpose of a distinct organization."

A special committee was appointed, to whom the document was referred. That committee, after mature deliberation, reported adversely to the calling of a convention, for the purpose specified, at this time, for several reasons, assigned by them at length. The report was received & adopted by the Conference.

WESTERN REGORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 9, 1847.

☞A fourth letter from the Editor is given this week, which will be read with interest.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"International Copyright—Its Justice and Necessity," by B. C. W., will appear next week.

Poetry, by T. B., we are sorry to say, cannot find a place in our columns.

W. S. S., writes us in a private note, that he does not know whether he will "oblige or disoblige" us again. We hope your mind will be settled on that subject, and that you will continue to oblige us, by sending more communications, such as the one furnished this week.

Cost of Printing a Paper.

We were not a little surprised at receiving a letter this week from our much esteemed friend, "G. G. C.," in which he says he thinks we could do better, or he could do better for us, if we were to reduce our terms to One Dollar per annum, instead of two; and gives as a reason, that other periodicals, as large as the Western Recorder, are furnished at that price. As we profess to be a practical Printer, and, therefore, know something of the costs of publishing a paper, and know, also, how it is that other periodicals are furnished so cheap, we will assume the responsibility to give our worthy Brother an explantion. We will first ask him a few questions:

1st. Where is there a religious newspaper, the size of the Recorder, East or West, published at the low price of One Dollar? 2d. What kind of papers are printed at that price, and where are they published? There are none save literary papers, and they are printed in the East. 3d. Why are they printed so cheaply? In N. York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Boston, where these dollar papers are issued, it is often the case that five or six are issued at the same office; and the matter put in type for one, answers for all, with some slight alteration. Hence, the expense of setting their type is only one-sixth, (in proportion to the number of papers published in the same office) of that of a paper published separately from others. Other expenses, such as ink, paper, &c., are the same, or nearly so.

Now for the expense of printing the Recorder: In one column there are 160 lines; in each line, 20 ems; making 3,200 ems in each column; which, at 25 cents per thousand, costs 80 cents. Not less than 22 columns are given weekly, making a fraction over 70,000 ems per week; which at the same price, costs $17,50. Within a few quires of 3 reams of paper are used per week, which, at $2,50 per ream, the lowest cash price, is $7,50. Other expenses, such as ink, writing paper, wrapping paper, &c. &c., cannot be exactly estimated here, but may safely be put down at $1,00 per week. Thus we have it:

Cost of setting types	per	week,	$17.50
Cost of paper,	"	"	7,50
Various other expenses,	"	"	1,00
Total,			26,00

And the nett cost for publishing the Recorder for one year, $1,352.

The subscription list is now a fraction over 12,00. Deduct from this, 150 for exchange papers, and travelling preachers, who act as agents, and from whom nothing is received, or even wished, and we have left 1050 subscribers. We know not how many of these fail to pay, but from the letters received from Post Masters during the absence of the Editor, we may safely make a deduction of 10 per centum; which will leave us 950 cash subscribers. These, at two dollars per annum, would bring us $1,900. Deduct from this the cost of publishing, (1,352) and we have left $548, to defray the expenses of a family, and a number of other expenses, accruing about the office, which a man who is not a Printer knows nothing of.

Now solve the following: How large an increase of subscribers would enable us to furnish the Recorder at $100 per annum?

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR.
No. IV.

Youngstown, Mahoning, O., Sept. 2, 1847.

On our return from the Pittsburgh Conference, having an interval of several days before the convening of the Muskingum Conference, we enjoyed a pleasant sojourn in Wheeling until Friday morning last. We have there a small but valuable society. Our friends have had to struggle with adverse circumstances, but have stood firm. Br. Watson leaves with their warmest regards, for another field of labor, and is to be succeeded by Br. Davis. During our stay, with the kind assistance of Br. Sands, we procured several new subscribers, each of whom paid in advance, and were also quite successful in collecting dues of the paper. We took an interest in visiting various large establishments in Wheeling, amongst them, the extensive rolling mill of Stephens & Co., at the north end of the city. Another establishment of the same kind is in progress of erection at the point, at the mouth of Wheeling Creek, upper side. This will be something to excel. A cylindrical stack is being built, which is to rise 150 feet high. Two lines of telegraphic wire, one for Pittsburgh and the Atlantic cities, the other connecting with Zanesville and the great West, here cross the Ohio river, at a single span, and at an elevation, high above the passing steamboats. On Thursday, great interest was excited in the deliberations of the Board of the Balt. and O. R. R. Company, in sessionat Baltimore. And duringthe day, despatches were received, bringing intelligence, entirely favorable to the interests of Wheeling. We here met with our friend, Capt. Lucas of Steubenville, and embraced the opportunity of visiting his new boat, which is nearly ready for service. She is of the large class of steamers, of remarkably strong construction, and not to be excelled in the convenience of its arrangements. In connection with its furnace is placed the apparatus of the Smoke Consumer, so lately introduced into this country. It is said to be a great saving of fuel. Capt. Lucas calls this boat, the Mary Stephens, for the lady of our friend E. W. S. of Wheeling.

We came to Steubenville by stage on Friday, and remained till after Sabbath. We had our lodgings with the kind family of Br. Lucas, who also came home on Saturday. During our stay, we had the pleasure of visiting numerous friends, and amongst them our Masonic brethren, whose note we published, a week or two ago. We found them exceedingly kind and good natured, & entertaining no intention of discontinuing their patronage of our paper, since the discontinuance of the controversy which they considered irrelevant to our columns. On Saturday, with Brs. Brown, Dr. Dorsey and others, we visited the premises of Rev. Mr. Scott's Academy, which is immediately adjoining, and overlooking the city of Steubenville. Commodious buildings, and fifteen acres of land are embraced, and now offered for sale for the sum of $8,000. Propositions were made to the late Pittsburgh Conference, and the same will also be laid before the Muskingum Conference, in view of a purchase of the Institution. Should the propositions be entertained, more will be said hereafter on the subject. We were gratified to find the Methodist Prot. Church in this place in prosperous condition, under the charge of Br. Andrew. A season of revival has been enjoyed during part of the year. The congregations are very good, and the Sabbath school quite prosperous, under the superintendence of Br. Laughlin. We endeavored to preach on Sabbath morning, at the request of the pastor; & also had the pleasure of hearing a sermon in the afternoon by Br. Maynard, and another at night, by Br. Davis, of the Pittsburgh Conference. Meanwhile, quite a number of brethren from Circuits west and south, had reached town, on their way to Conference.

Br. George Brown kindly gave us a seat with him in his buggy, in going from Steubenville to Youngstown to attend the Muskingum Conference. We set out, on Monday morning, our company nine in number, which increased to twelve in course of the day. We proceeded up the river road as far as Wellsville. Some six miles above Steubenville, at the head of Brown's Island, Br. B. pointed out to us the place where many years ago, his father was drowned, in attempting to ford the Ohio, which he had before, often done with entire safety. At a little distance, on the Virginia side, in what is called Holliday's Cove, was the residence of Br. B's. parents, at the time of his nativity. This however was not the place of his nativity. Alarmed by the inroads and depredations of the Indians, the family had retreated across the Pennsylvania line, which is but a few miles distant, and in that State our old friend happened to be born. He tells us pleasantly that he ought to have been born in Virginia, but the savages would not allow it. In the course of our journey, we embraced the opportunity to have much conversation with our friend, respecting the early history of reform in this part of the country, his own secession from the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1829, and the organization of our church in these parts, in which he took a very active part. We trust he will find it convenient to prepare for publication in our columns, some sketches of his reminiscences.

We dined at the house of Br. J. L. Diselm, an unstationed minister, near Port Homer. Had a short, but agreeable visit. At Wellsville, which we passed in the afternoon, the telegraph line from Pittsburgh branches off, one wire extending down the river to Wheeling, and the other to Cleveland on the lake. We were informed that a station and office is established at Wellsville, and another at New Lisbon, c. h., Columbiana county, which place we reached in good time, before sun setting. We were kindly received and entertained by Br. H. Springer, and family. Br. S. was a pioneer of our cause in this place. We soon met with Br. Cushman, the superintendent, who had made arrangements for preaching at night. Heard a sermon by Br. Andrew, from the words of the Lord to Job, "Wilt thou also disannul my judgment?" On Tuesday, we resumed our way, and proceeded some 15 miles to the village of North Lima, where we fed our horses, and dined at an inn, twelve in number. In the afternoon, a drive of eleven miles through a fine country, brought us to the pleasant village of Youngstown, Mahoning county. It is situated on the Mahoning river. The canal extending from Akron, on the Ohio Canal, to Beaver, Pa., on the Ohio river, passes here, and is in constant operation, packets running daily. We are here within five miles of the Pennsylvania State line, and in the midst of the Connecticut, or Western Reserve. We drove up to the Methodist Protestant Church, where we found numerous brethren who had arrived before us, and a committee to distribute us to our places of entertainment. The writer found himself highly favored, in being appointed to sojourn with Rev. C. A. Boardman, the Presbyterian minister of the place, and his excellent family, where we were cordially received, and made to feel ourself at home. At night, Br. J. H. Hamilton preached, from Psalms, 104, 34, "My meditation of him shall be sweet." On Wednesday, 1st inst., the Conference opened with an appropriate sermon by Br. John Burns, from 2 Cor. 5. 20. "Now then we are ambassadors for Christ." The President, Br. Clancy presides, his health being quite re-established. A good attendance was found to be present on the first day, but few of the brethren being absent from their places. We were favored with the privilege of an honorary seat during the session, as were our travelling companion of the Pittsburgh Conference, and our kind host, who in a few remarks, welcomed the Conference to the village, to its families and its churches, praying for Heaven's blessing upon its deliberations. At night we had an interesting sermon by Br. T. Potter, on the model revival of religion, from Acts 2. 41. "The same day, there were added unto them, about three thousand souls."

We here close, lest our letter should fail to be in time for next week's paper. More hereafter.

A. H. B.

P. S. This afternoon took place the election of President and Stationing Committee. Br. G. Clancy was re-elected President. The Stationing Committee, consists of Brs. J. Burns, J. Nichols, P. Lewis, and J. Wells.

ACCIDENT.—Winthrop Foy, a resident of Zanesville, while coming up the river road, near the residence of Mr. Laughhead, where the bridge washed away a short time since, was thrown by the upsetting of the waggon, loaded with coal, into the water and mud, and crushed or drowned. He was between 50 and 60 years of age.

GOVERNOR DORR DEAD.—The New Bedford Mercury, on the authority of a letter to Colonel Hatch, reports the death of Thomas W. Dorr, (Ex-Governor of Rhode Island,) at Providence, on Thursday, August 26th.

☞We are happy to be enabled to give the appointments of the Pittsburgh Conference, M. P. Church, this week, as taken from the "Village (Pa.) Watchman." We would, however, have been much better pleased to have acknowledged the receipt of the same last week, from the publishing committee; and thus saved disappointment to many of our readers. We will make no promises, as to the proceedings of the Muskingum Conference. May possibly be enabled to give them next week.

☞Prospects of peace with Mexico, we are sorry to say, are still gloomy. "War to the death," appears to be the only alternative. Much anxiety exists as to the result of the march of our forces upon the city.

Wonder if the volunteers who started off in such high glee, will still sing,

"We are going down to Mexico,
To have a little frolic."

☞As the Circus fever is prevailing to some extent in and about the vicinity of Zanesville, we clip the following from an exchange paper, and insert it for the consideration of those who will give the last "quarter" they have, rather than be absent from such a place, while thousands are destitute of the necessaries of life—and millions who have not heard of the glad tidings of the gospel.

Shall I go to the Circus?

Shall I go to the Circus? Certainly, young man, if you have no character to sustain, no heart to keep pure, no intellect to expand, no brains to exercise, no profitable way of spending time, and a fool's head to fill with vulgarity and froth and immortality.

Shall I go to the Circus? Certainly, young lady, if you have no modesty to preserve, no purity to keep uncontaminated, no place in the circle of uncorrupted innocence, no graces to refine, no mental or moral worth to cherish. Certainly, by all means if you would countenance buffoonery, indecency and folly, and welcome the addresses of the low and the vile.

Shall I go to the Circus? Certainly, Christian if you are possessed only of the name, if you have no real piety, no true virtue, no soul to save—do not fail to go, and follow each actor in all his efforts to be an ape or a fool, if you have no Savior to follow. Devour each word of extravagant folly, & inwardly digest the same at your leisure. if you have no heavenly teachings to contemplate or upon which to meditate. Do not miss this opportunity to identify yourselves with the lewd ones of the baser sort, if you have a relish for such associations.—Do not go alone. Take along your children and servants. give them all a place "in the pit," and accelerate their preparation for the pit below. Bid them mark the attitudes, antics and grimaces of the actors, especially of him who is heralded the prince of clowns. Bid them take especial care to learn the very desirable art of being a fool. Draw near the ring. Let them not miss the very choice melodies of white men who have learned, by great perseverence to be "a nigger." No doubt they will reward you for your kindness by frequently rehearsing these happy melodies in your hearing, when the pageant has passed to other ports. Do all this, if you, your children and servants have no souls to save, society, religious or moral interests to care for, and the cause of Christ no occasion for your countenance, labor and sacrifice Go, and as you go, repeat with the heart engaged in the exercise, "Where two or three are together in my name, there am I in the midst of them," and ask yourself how the promise will apply to your present assemblage.—Gen. Evan.

MISS MARY LAYTON.

Departed this life, July 19th, 1847, Mrs. Mary L., wife of Churchill Layton, near this place, at the age of 44 years, 6 months, and 20 days. Her funeral discourse was preached by the Rev. C. S. Callihan, on the following day, to an audience of weeping relatives, neighbors and friends, from Job, xvii—13. Mrs. Layton joined the Methodist Protestant Church, in this place, the winter of 1843—4, under the ministry of the Rev. W. Reeves. Her profession of faith in Christ was modest, yet firm and consistent, and she died as she lived, in the blessed assurance of that hope that maketh not ashamed. Having no children of her own, Mrs. L. adopted several orphans into her family, who received a large share of her personal attention. Few mothers exhibit more interest in this particular than did she for those who had become the subjects of her charge.—And it is a melancholy thought that in her death, they are brought again to a state of orphanage.

WM. PAINE.

On Monday evening, the 30th ult., Wm. Paine, of Hopewell, Muskingum county, Ohio, was brought to death under the following circumstances: In the morning he left home and went to Mr. Barley's, one mile east of Mt. Sterling, for whom he was working. On that day he was engaged in cutting large timber for shingles; and about 4 o'clock, P. M., the last tree was heard fall in the direction where he was at work. At supper-time he was called three times, by the usual signal, the blowing of the horn. But he was gone! and nought but the blast of the archangel's trump, or the voice of God can call him back.—The last tree he cut, fell partially against another tree, which threw back a limb that struck him on the top of the head, cutting it open from front to back, and dislodging a portion of the brains.—He had evidently fallen backward when struck, and the limb which struck him on the head fell across his breast. In this position he had lain dead, for he had evidently never struggled, from about 4 o'clock, when the tree was heard fall, till about 9 o'clock, when Mr. Burley and his neighbors, with lanterns, went in search of him. No special search had been made for him till near that hour, for Mr. Burley supposed he had gone home, he having stated that he intended to return home in the evening.

Mr. Paine was in the thirty-fourth year of his age, just in the prime of life; he was a moral, honest, and industrious man, a worthy citizen, and a good neighbor. He leaves a wife and 3 children.

He was a member of the order of the Sons of Temperance. His funeral was very respectfully attended in Brownsville, by three Divisions of that order, together with a large concourse of relatives and friends. WM. M. ROBINSON.

MARY ANN MITCHELL.

Dparted this life the 28th of July, 1847, in Middleborough, Wayne county, Ia., Mrs. Mary Ann Mitchell, daughter of Mr. John Purvoiance, and wife of Dr. Mitchell, in the 26th year of her age. She has left a disconsolate husband and an interesting little boy 2 years old, and a large connexion of relatives and friends to mourn her departure. But they mourn not as those without hope. Sister Mitchell joined the Methodist E. Church six years previous to her death, and shortly after professed religion. She remained a consistent and useful member in that church until last January. She united herself with the Methodist Protestant Church in consequence of the coldness and want of union in the former church, Although this was afflicting to her it did not impede her christian progress, for she could in the class room still speak in thrilling accents of the goodness of God and shout his praises aloud.—From her mild and benevolent disposition, she was universally esteemed and beloved by all who had the privilege of her acquaintance. She knew how to administer to the wants of the needy, and to soothe the sorrows of the sick and afflicted.—Her door and heart were ever open to the Missionary and Minister of God. She was a kind and affectionate wife, a devoted mother, and true friend; her death will be felt as far as she was known. But our loss is her eternal gain. She has gone where no discordant sound will ever be heard—where all will be in unison with her own happy spirit. She was much afflicted in body the last years of her life; but the meek and quiet spirit with which she bore her afflictions, give full evidence of the religion which she professed. During her last illness which was occasioned by the flux, she suffered extremely, both in body and mind, being called to witness the death of her oldest son, in the seventh year of his age, from the same disease; he was a very promising and interesting child. She bore it all with christian fortitude and patience. A few days after the death of her son, she was sensible that her dissolution was fast approaching, and said to her friends around her, she had thought the grave and winding sheet would have terrors for her, but they had not, although she had been very happy in her life, she was never as happy as she then was. She retained her senses to the last, and bid farewell to her friends, exhorting them to meet her in heaven. She was enabled to shout victory in a dying hour. May our last end be like hers.

Dearest sister thou hast left us,
Here thy loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis God that has bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal.

Yet again we hope to meet thee,
When the day of life is fled,—
Then in heaven with joy to greet thee,
Where no farewell tear is shed. S. S.

PRICES.—From late foreign arrivals we see that the European grain and provision market has greatly declined; causing a fall in the price of flour in our eastern markets; as will be seen in another column, under the head "Markets."

In Putnam and Zanesville Wheat is selling at 75 cts. per bushel—tendency downward. Flour is retailing at $4,25.

DONT FORGET.—Those who are indebted for the Western Recorder, will greatly oblige us, by paying up before the close of the present volume. It will be a convenient opportunity to send by the preachers or delegates to the approaching Conferences. We need to receive, about this time, several hundred dollars, to enable us to meet claims against us which have grown out of our publishing enterprise. Dont forget. We shall have to discontinue many at the close of vol. viii, if they do not pay up.

A GREAT DEPENDANCE is also placed in the liberality of those true friends of the paper, who pursue the good old custom of paying in advance. From them we trust we shall have some essential aid in entering upon our next volume. Read the next paragraph.

ANNUAL REGISTER, M. P. CHURCH, 1848.—This little publication, so much demanded by the Church, is now in press, and will be issued at an earlier date than heretofore. An edition of 6000 copies of the first half of the pamphlet, including the Calendar, is already worked off from the press. And we only wait to obtain the statistics of the several Annual Conferences to be held within a few weeks, when we expect to make up the remaining part of the publication. Every subscriber for the Western Recorder who pays $2 in advance for vol. 9, shall have a copy of the Register sent him by mail, so soon as it is issued.

INFORMATION WANTED—STATISTICS OF CONFERENCES.—We are about publishing the Annual Register of the M. P. Church, for the year 1848, and are anxious to obtain, in view of this publication, the statistics of those Annual Conferences which have not published their Minutes in full. We desire to have the name of the President of each Conference, the number of Stations, Circuits, Missions, Itinerant ministers and preachers, Unstationed ministers and preachers, Members, and houses of worship in each District. Also, the time and place of the next session of each Annual Conference. If the secretaries, or any other having the information, will communicate it to us without delay, we shall be greatly obliged, and will be pleased to reciprocate the favor in any possible way.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the Baltimore Sun, Sept., 3.

Arrival of the Steamer Caledonia.

Five Days Later from Europe. Continued Decline in Breadstuffs. Dullness of the Cotton Market. Fine Prospects of the Harvest—Still Greater Depression in Breadstuffs Anticipated— Effect of Mercantile Failures.

The steamer Caledonia arrived at Boston at 1 o'clock yesterday morning, having left Liverpool on the 16th ult. She arrived at Halifax on the 31st ult., at 30 minutes past 7, and left again at 11 A. M. on the same day. She brings 137 passengers.

We received our commercial dispatch from Boston shortly after noon yesterday, and immediately issued a "Sun Slip" for the accommodation of the mercantile community. We annex much fuller details, however, received during the evening.

The Cambria, hence on Wednesday for Liverpool, anchored in the Roads on account of the dense fog, at 1 on Thursday morning, having been detained 12 hours.

The Caledonia passed on the 20th, off Kinsale, steamer Sarah Sands, from New York.

The following is the despatch from our correspondent at Liverpool, which has been evidently made up by him under the impression that the Caledonia's news would reach this country before that of the Guadalquiver. It must be read, as a letter from Liverpool:

LIVERPOOL, August 19—11 A. M.

A rumor was in general circulation yesterday, that Louis Lhillippe had been assassinated. The London papers of this morning bring no confirmation of it. The elections are nearly at an end, and show an increase in favor of Liberal ministers.

The Queen has arived in Scotland. Her tour will be completed in about three weeks.

Lieut. Munroe, late of the regiment of life guards, was yesterday found guilty of the murder of Col. Fawcett, whom he slew in a duel about four years ago. The verdict of the jury has caused considerable excite and surprise.

The political aspect of France is threatening enough. A fierce contest is waging between the government and opposition press. The latter charges the ministry with corruption and a failure of the financial administration.

The French funds have largely participated in the embarrassment caused by the raising of the rate of discount in England.

Portugal is quiet, and the Spanish forces have been withdrawn from Oporto.

For Switzerland the Federal diet has required the dissolution of the Catholic Sonderabondas, being hostile to the general welfare.

The accounts from Italy are various. The progress of liberal opinions, particularly in the papal States, is viewed with great alarm by both France and Austria.

In Ireland the elections have been somewhat more stormy than in this country, and the returns will stand very much as they did in the last Parliament.

O'Connell's funeral was celebrated with great pomp. The event has left no excitement of any consequence.

Gen. Armstrong goes out by the Caledonia with dispatches.

The Caledonia takes 30,000 pounds in specie.

COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL.—The money market, owing to a variety of causes, has become seriously depressed since our last advices per Cambria. The pressure continues to affect all branches of trade with an unrelaxed severity.

Foreign prices are downward, necessarily limiting operations to the smallest possible scale. The primary causes of this state of things are the advanced rates of discount required by the Bank of England, whose example is followed by all, the private and joint stock banks of the empire, and a succession of disastrous failures in the West India and American trade.

Up to last night the actual bankruptcy stoppages were little short of two million pounds, and it is apprehended that many of these will fall heavily upon American houses. Yesterday, in London, the public securities had somewhat recovered from the depression of the preceding day, and fluctuated merely from the turn of the market.

Among manufacturers business wears a most gloomy aspect, nor will there be any hope of improvement until the monetary restrictions shall be eased. This is the natural result of a state of things which renders all bills of London dates than those for three months unavailable, & which not only paralyzes our colonial trade but seriously effects our commercial transactions with America.

A serious downward tendency has taken place in the grain market since the departure of the steamer of the 4th inst., only occasionally arrested by the broken weather; this, however, has failed to give a firm tone to the market.

The certainty of a bountiful harvest at home, coupled with the continued large imports of foreign breadstuffs forced upon our market by necessities of holders, must exercise a still stronger depressing influence upon the trade, and it may be fairly inferred that the markets have not as yet retrogaded to any thing like the point to which they appear destined to fall.

In the London market a similar languor has taken place, which, accelerated by the alarming failures that had taken place, almost precludes the possibility of re-action. Up to the closing of the corn market in London yesterday a very limited quantity of English wheat had come to hand, and though there were scarcely any samples to offer, the demand was tolerably steady at average prices. There was rather more enquiry for foreign wheat of the best quality, but middling and inferior kinds were quite neglected. Foreign oats were dull at a reduction of 6d. per quarter.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

From the Rio Grande.

Correspondence of the Picayune.

MIER, Aug. 5, '47.

Gentlemen,—Yesterday a party of gentlemen arrived here from Monterey, and bring the intelligence that, on the 30th of last month the express mail, with an escort, going from here to Monterey, was fired on by a guerilla party beyond the Papagallos, and a lieutenant in command of the escort was killed, (lieutenant of Capt. Reed's company of Texas Rangers,) but the mail escaped.

On the next day two wagons and forty-eight mules (the mules loaded with merchandize) were attacked two miles this side of Papagallos. The mules and one wagon captured; one man, and the driver of one of the wagons, killed.—The wagon that was taken, I am told, contained "the kit," of "a couple of French gentlemen," who were going up to take the bust of General Taylor. All the material was captured and they only escaped with their lives.

These are merry thieves, are they not? However, there is one thing I know: If they have got the mouth and nose of General Taylor, there is no Mexican can ever make a finish of him.—They can keep what they have got, but he has got his eye on some of them from the way he turns his head towards San Luis Potosi.

The prospect here brightens as August clanks on apace. The other day I saw the Old General look over in the direction of San Luis, and then he cast his eyes on the Star Spangled Banner floating near him. I thought this was ominous; and directly afterwards an order was issued to the quartermaster to hurry up the ammunition from Camargo. I came right down here, and am now scrubbing up my old shot gun: and if I get it clean by the 1st of next month I think I will cross the mountains.

Men and officers are improving rapidly under their discipline in camp. There are many on the sick report, but I understand it is not considered that their diseases are from the effects of this climate.

General Lane has again made his appearance amongst us, and looks "ready for action." He, I think, will report at once, in person, to Gen. Taylor.

The Delta has several letters: from one, dated near camp Meir, August 7th, we take the following—

The troops at Mier are undergoing a complete state of discipline. They stand the climate as well as troops drawn from the Southern States—in fact, enjoy better health. There is now at this place nearly four regiments of infantry:—10th, from the Southern States, promiscuously; 13th, from Alabama and Georgia; 16th, from Kentucky and Indiana; and 14th Indiana volunteers. The Ohio regiment of Infantry is stationed at Matamoras.

General Joseph Lane, of Indiana, arrived at camp last evening in fine health and spirits.—His arrival was a source of great satisfaction.—Col. Gorman, Lt. Col. Dumont, and Maj. McCoy, are in fine health.

A Matamoras letter of Aug. 12, says—

To-day the opinion is prevalent that no advance on this line is intended by the Government. This arises from the letter of the Secretary of War, to Col. Jefferson Davis, brought in a late number of your paper. Much dissatisfaction is apparent among the volunteers and the officers newly appointed.

Four companies of Dragoons are now encamped near this city. One company (that of Captain John Butler) marched yesterday to escort a wagon train for Camargo. Colonel Brough's Ohio regiment of volunteers is likewise with us. The Rio Grande is still navigable without difficulty by the ordinary class boats. Every thing is quiet above.

In a letter of August 15th, from the mouth of the Rio Grande, it is stated that much sickness prevails at Gen, Wool's camp, and from three to five burials daily.

THE CORN CROP OF OHIO.—The Cincinnati Chronicle says:—"We have had during the summer, and especially within a few days, many opportunities of observing the Corn Crop. The conclusion we draw from our observations is, that the Corn will be exceedingly abundant this year. The upland fields look as well as the bottoms, and the ears are very heavy. The ground planted is also greater: and we think the Corn Crop of the United will scarcely fall short of six hundred millions of bushels."

Affairs in California.

From the St. Louis Republican of the 28th ult., we extract the following—

We have before us files of California papers as late as the 5th of June.

Very marked discontent seems to have pervaded the "California Regiment," at the time of its discharge from service. This regiment had been enrolled by Colonel Fremont, and promises of pay were held out, which, it seems, were not realised. We infer from what is stated, that a portion, only, of the pay was given to the men, and that they were compelled to receive 'certificates' for the balance, and that the payment of this amount is made to depend on relief to be granted by Congress.

A letter from Sonoma, on the 8th of May, says that Governor Boggs had received a letter from Kearny, appointing him Alcalde of that town.—But that Mr. Nash, the old incumbent, who was elected under Commodore Stockton's proclamation, refused to surrender the books of the office; and that in consequence they had no civil magistrate.

The California Star, in announcing the departure of General Kearny and Colonel Fremont, for the United States, indulges in some pretty severe strictures upon the conduct of the latter, while in California. It charges that his movements while in that territory have been ill-judged, and producing complete dissatisfaction. His proceedings are said to have been "in direct opposition to the best interests of his countrymen in California," and it is remarked, that "it will require an effort, and an immense one, to reinstate his lost fame in California."

Of General Kearny, the editor speaks mincingly: he can neither 'commend' nor 'condemn.' "It may be that he has used his best endeavors to promote the welfare of the people, and that he has been ever regardful of their interests. We are not to determine."

The exportation of quicksilver from California, is strictly prohibited by an order of Commodore Biddle.

MELANCHOLY CASUALTY.—While the children of a Catholic school in New York were on an excursion on Tuesday, a number of the boys left the main party and went in bathing, when several of them were drowned. Among the lost were Michuel McGowan and John Mullin

The Cincinnati Commercial tells of a novel balloon adventure that happened in that city, during the storm on Tuesday last. A little girl was seated upon the top of a hay wagon holding an umbrella over her head, the sudden gust which came up, carried her entirely clear of the wagon, through the air to the sidewalk, upon which she alighted safely! The umbrella served, of course, as a parachute, and she clung stoutly to it.

The Suspension Bridge, projected, over the Niagara river, just below the Falls, seems certain of success. The Toronto Patriot says that ex-consul Buchanan, who attended at Hamilton on the 17th, to receive subscription for 5000 shares of the stock, at £25 per share, sold the whole within three hours; as fast, indeed, as the money could be counted, and receipts filled. Such a work will greatly augment the intercourse between the two shores.

AN HONOR TO HIS MOTHER.—"John," enquired the domine of a hopeful pupil, "what is a nailer?" "One who makes nails," said John.—"Very good. What is a tailor?" "One who makes tails." "O, you stupid fellow," said the domine, biting his lips, "a man that makes tails?" "Yes, master," returned John, "if the tailor did not put tails to the coats he made, they would be all jackets!" "Sit down, John, you are an honor to your maternal parent."

AN HONEST FELLOW, TRULY.—A good man—he must have been conscientious (and verdant also)—residing in the country and employed as a sort of agricultural laborer, having contrived to scrape together fifty dollars, took it to his employer, with a request that he would take charge of it for him. The request was complied with. The year rolled round, and the laborer applied to another friend to know what would be the interest upon it. He was told three dollars. "Well," said he, "I wish you would lend me three dollars for a few days. My boss has been keeping fifty dollars for me, for a year. and I want to pay him the interest for it." This is true.

Election Returns.

KENTUCKY.—The Frankfort Commonwealth has the returns of the vote on the Convention question, from all the counties but 17, which show a majority in favor of the Convention, of upwards of 12,000. It thinks the total majority in the State will be at least 20,000.

IOWA ELECTION.—We learn from the N. York Tribune, of Saturday, that the two Democratic candidates for Congress in this State have been elected. The democrats will have a majority on joint ballot, in the Legislature, thus securing the two United States Senators to be elected next winter.

TENNESSEE.—The Legislature just elected in Tennessee stands as follows, giving the Whigs a majority of each House, and a majority of eight on joint ballot:—A United States Senator is to be elected by this Legislature to fill the seat lately occupied by Mr. Jarnagin, whose term of service expired with the late Congress. Senate, 13 Whigs, 12 Democrats. House, 41 Whigs, 34 Democrats.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.—Amos Kendall is publishing a series of communications in the Washington Union, concerning Morse's Telegraph. He maintains that Morse's patent embraces any and all combinations of machinery moved by electro-magnetism, "which may be used to imprint signals upon paper or other material, or to produce sounds in any desired manner tor the purpose of telegraphic communication.

Again, he says:

"House's patent only covers a mode of arriving at an end already patented to Morse, and secures nothing but the right to use House's instrument, after having obtained from Morse the privilege of using the electro-magnetic power to make marks or sounds for telegraphic purposes. The use of House's instrument, therefore, without having first obtained the right to use Morse's prior invention, in a direct infringment of Morse's patent.

In copying this statement it is not our purpose either to affirm or deny its correctness, but simply to show the extent of Morse's claim.

FRUIT.—The Trenton News says the apple crop in New Jersey will be a failure. The fruit is small in quantity and bad in quality. In the neighborhood of Trenton, the trees apecar to have been beset by some insect, which has occasioned the young fruit to fall off, and has greatly injured what remains. Quinces, plums, &c., also yield badly. Peaches are scarce and dear. The orchards generally bear, but not abundantly. The fruit is, however, very fine, and as prices are high, the peach men will probably make as much as usual. We should think that the crop was about half the amount of the flush yield last year.

Latest From Texas.

The Steamship Ohio, Capt. Swiller, Jr., from Galveston, the 23d, arrived at New Orleans on the 26th ult.

The schooner Robert Kidd, Capt. Champion, arrived at Galveston on the 21st, from Corpus Christi. There have recently been several arrivals of traders from Laredo, and other parts of the Rio Grande. General Lamar's command at Laredo has had a salutary tendency in suppressing robberies and other acts of violence.—Some confidence in the security of the country begins to be felt.

The following articles are taken from the Austin Democrat of the 14th ult.:

A portion of Colonel Hays' new regiment were to leave San Antonio on yesterday for Mexico.—Lt. Col. Bell will be left in command of the remaining forces on our frontier.

Mr. Cochrane, of Capt. Henry McCulloch's company of Rangers, arrived in this place on Monday last, bringing some important Indian news, if it be true. He stated that he had been in company with the Wacoes for several days, by whom he was informed that it was the avowintention of the Camanches and Tonkewas, who are now hunting together, to commence open hostilities against the Americans, so soon as the intended boundary line shall have been designated and marked out.

Major Neighbors has been after the Camanches to have a talk with them, and learn their intentions, but they kept out of his way.

We have no confirmation of the Indian news contained in our last number, taken from the Victoria Advocate, says the Galveston News of the 21st. Mr. Hudson, with about 30 men, had been some 150 miles above San Antonio, and serious apprehensions for his safety were entertained.—He has now returned in safety. The Indians discover symptoms of hostilities. Santa Anna—the Indian, not the Mexican warrior—professes to be still friendly, but Buffalo Hump openly threatens war. They have removed all their women and children out of the way. This is considered a bad omen.

The reports in relation to the crops, from all sections of the country, continue to be highly favorable.

DEATH OF AN OLD SOLDIER.—An old soldier, named Fugitt, living at Washington city, who was in Washington's army during the Revolution, died on Thursday, aged 98 years.

It is stated that the Hon. John A. Dix, of New York, will resign his seat in the Senate, on account of the illness of his wife.

ALABAMA ELECTION.—We have at length the official returns from this State. The majority for Chapman, Democrat, for Governor, is 6834. The Legislature stands as follows:—Senate, 17 Democrats, 16 Whigs. House, 62 Democrats, 38 Whigs. The Congressional Delegation stands 5 Democrats to 2 Whigs.

MOBOCRACY IN IOWA.—The peaceable citizens of Lee county, Iowa, have, for a few days, past, been harassed, stoned, beaten, and otherwise disturbed, by a party of law-breaking rioters. They attacked a house of an old revolutionary soldier by the name of Hatch. He left the room to get his gun, and seeing some one moving about in the yard, and not knowing that his wife had, in the meantime, gone out, fired, and killed her instantly.

LOWELL MANUFACTURES.—It is stated that 1,800,000 yards of cotton cloth are made at Lowell. Mass., every week, amounting to 93,000,000 yards per year—enough to extend twice around the entire world! Six-five thousand bales of cotton are worked up anually. Of printed calico there are made 14'000,000 yards per year. In these manufactures one millions of pounds of starch are anually used.

LOSS OF THE BRITISH BRIG LEILA.—The brig Leila, of Galway, McDonnough, master, from N. Y., laden with corn meal, &c., for cork and market, was foundered in the heavy Easterly gale, on the 5th of August, in lat. 41, lon. 67 30, having sprung a leak, with both pumps choked. The crew, numbering twelve, including the officers, remained by the wreck until the 7th, when they were taken off by the schooner Leander, from Boston, bound to St. Domingo. They wereafterwards put on board another vessel, & on Saturday, they arrived at Baltimore. The crew saved nothing from the wreck but what they stood in. —Al. Messenger.

A BRUTAL OUTRAGE.—A letter published in the Limerick (Ireland) Examiner, under date of July 23d, gives the particulars of a scene of ejectment in Ireland, which for cruelty and brutality is unequalled.

"The scene of this outrage upon humanity was near Charleville, in the county of Cork.—On the 13th of July, according to the statement, and in the village called "Glen," on the estate of the Earl of Cork, ejectments were executed by the sub-sheriff of Cork, aided by the military and police force, on forty-eight tenants. Their houses or cabins were thrown down, and the forty-eight families, numbering about four hundred human beings, were turned out upon the high road. Of these it is alledged that more than one hundred were suffering from fever. They were obliged to take refuge in a neighboring churchyard. The church-yard of Ballysally contains many flat tombstones and grass covered graves; and among those graves the ejected families slept four consecutive nights, huddled together. One poor woman was taken off her bed four days after her confinement, and placed by the side of the ditch with her infant, both in a state of helpless exhaustion. Another woman had a family of seven, all suffering from fever. In a third family there were ten persons in fever at the time of ejectment."

DISPATCH TO GEN. SCOTT INTERCEPTED.—The Jalapa Boletin of August 6, contains what purports to be an intercepted dispatch of our government to Gen. Scott, stating that there was great difficulty in obtaining men and money, and expressing confidence in Gen. Scott's management, under any difficulties. The letter is without date. The following is the close:

"I much fear you will have to remain in the centre of Mexico in a state of inactivity. Very unexpectedly, the fate of Gen. Taylor's division will also depend upon your skill and foresight; but I am confident you will employ well the resources which you are going to receive, and those which I will furnish you hereafter, fomenting the desirable revolution which you announced to us which is to open for us the gates of Mexico, and to put an end to the false position in which the Union finds itself. If the revolution should not be as far advanced as you expected by the 4th of June, you will have tact enough to obtain an armistice, amusing these people with propositions for peace, and neutralizing in the meantime the movements of these guerillas that so much annoy you. Do you give us any hope, general?"

The Picayune says:—We cannot believe the letter to be genuine, though hitherto we have not detected the Mexicans in palming off pretended letters from the government at Washington for genuine ones.

The Late Conspiracy at Rome.

A late number of the London Times says:—We observe that the organs of the French Government treat all these matters very lightly:—they laugh at the popular leaders, disparage the Pope, and deny the conspiracy. The motives of this conduct on their part are perfectly transparent. M. Guizot is in no condition to repeat the bold stroke of Ancona; and whatever the Austrian Cabinet may have prepared, will be executed without let or hindrance on the part of France. But we most sincerely trust that Lord Palmerston, who sometimes displays an excess of enterprise and resolution on far less momentous occasions, will vigorously assert and maintain the independence of the minor Italian States, and more especially of the Papal dominions.—Nothing can be more favorable than the present crisis for a declaration on the part of this country, that, while we oppose the policy of invention in Switzerland, where we have no direct means of action, we shall resist it in Italy, where our ships have an easy access to every part of the coast.

Threatened by Austria and abandoned by France, we are not surprised to learn that it is to England that the leaders of the moderate Liberal party in Italy have turned their eyes. All they require is that other States and more oppressive governments should not be allowed to interfere in their domestic concerns, or to arrest their progress in reforms which are promoted with equal zeal by some of the Princes and by all the people of the country. Let Austria govern Lombardy, since treaties have assigned to her that magnificent province. But South of the Po every Austrian is an alien and an enemy: and we cannot doubt that the advance of an Austrian army would throw the whole country into insurrection, while it is not impossible that the national forces of Sardinia and Piedmont might, in the present state of public excitement, make common cause with the cities of central Italy.

The firm interposition of an English Minister, supported by the Mediterranean squadron might in all probability avert the greatest calamities, and secure to the Papal Government sufficient time to restore tranquility and justify the confidence of the people. Such a service in Italy would not have been rendered to an ungrateful people, and nothing would conduce more to improve our position in the Mediterranean by ties which future occurrences may render of the utmost utility.

Tremendous Battle!!

There was a tremendous battle at Camp Ohio, on Monday, in which not less than one hundred of the volunteers, country and city, engaged.—The weapons were clubs, stones, and knuckle bones, and the cause similar to that which led to the rupture between Greece and Troy. Those who witnessed the fight, represent it as exciting in the extreme,—the hostile parties being about equal, and fighting inch to inch! The shouts and uproar might have been heard for a mile, and at times the air was filled with stones, clubs, and all sorts of missiles. Clothes were torn off, eyes blacked, and heads cracked. Some twenty or thirty of the combatants carried bloody evidence of the battle's fierceness, and with it, no doubt, regret, that their blood has been spilled to so little profit or honor. The fight occurred on the side hill, to the north-east of the camp. The pluck exhibited by all in this disgraceful collision, certainly gave earnest of invincibility against such foes as the Mexicans—and we hope that, now, since their pluck has been tested against one another, they will withhold future hostile demonstrations, uniil they meet with our country's enemies.—Cin. Com.

DEATH OF SILAS WRIGHT.—The circumstances of Mr. Wright's death, are thus stated by the Ogdensburgh Republican—

About half-past eight o'clock, A. M., Mr. W. called at the Post Office, apparently in his usual health. While seated in a chair in the Post Office, reading a letter, the young man, clerk in the office, who was alone, perceived that he dropped the letter, and appeared as if seized by sudden pain. He was alarmed and enquired of Mr. W. what was the matter? Mr. Wright putting his hand to his heart, replied that he was suffering extreme pain in his chest—that he had twice before within the week felt similar pain, and that upon sitting down it passed away. But this was more severe, he felt it passing into his left arm and neck. He rose and went to the door but returned to his seat, and desired the young man to go or send for Dr. Clark. The young man sent for Dr. Clark, who soon came into the office and gave Mr. Wright some medicine which seemed to relieve him, and Wright, accompanied by the Doctor, walked home, a few rods from the office.

The Doctor remained with Mr. Wright at his house some time, and left him lying upon his bed in a gentle perspiration, supposing him to be better. Very soon after he left him, a message reached Dr. Clark that Mr. Wright was dying, and before the Doctor reached him he was dead.

MURDER MOST FOUL.—Five slaves, on Sunday last, ran away from their master, living five miles back of Cynciana, Ky., opposite Ripley in this State. They were overtaken by a Mr. Roberts, who was in pursuit. The slaves had jumped into a skiff and were in the act of shoving off, for the purpose of crossing to this side of the Ohio, when Roberts caught hold of a rope attached to the skiff, and was towing them back.

The slaves told him to desist or they would shoot him—he paid no attention to their threats. They fired their pistols at Roberts' head; one ball penetrated his forehead, one his neck and shoulder, the other his side. He was dying when our informant left on the Daniel Boone.—Cin. Com.

"I WAS DRUNK!"—The St. Louis Union of the 30th ult. states that Stewart who shot Tarney on the Die Vernon, visited the wounded man at the hospital on the 28th. Tarney acknowledged that he alone was to blame, that he was drunk at the time of the difficulty and had done wrong.—They shook hands, and Tarney told Stewart that he forgave him and entertained no ill-feelings towards him. He died at 4 o'clock, on the 30th, at the Marine Hospital. Stewart left St. Louis the previous morning.—Cin. Gaz.

MELANCHOLY OCCURRENCE.—The Dayton Transcript of Saturday last, records a very melancholy ocurrence, which happened on Wednesday previous, and is detailed substantially as follows: Mr. Wilson, a teacher in the town of Middletown, with his wife and child were travelling in a buggy on the tow-path of the Lebanon Canal, when the horse took fright, backed into the Canal, upsetting the buggy and precipitating the wife and child into the water. The Canal being deep and the horse becoming entangled in the harness, Mr. Wilson not being able to swim, found it impossible to extricate either his wife or child. He therefore ran about a quartet of a mile for help. On returning to the scene of disaster with aid, he found his child floating near the edge of the Canal apparently lifeless, yet warm—it appeared that the mother, true to the instincts of nature, had put forth her dying effort to save her child, by trying to cast it upon the shore, but in vain. The body of Mrs. Wilson was found, but the vital spark had fled. The horse was drowned.—Cin. Com.

MYSTERIOUS AFFAIR.—On Monday evening last, an elegantly dressed young lady got into one of the Yorkville omnibuses in the Bowery and went out to Carter's Hotel. She was shown into a back parlor, where she remained a long time without calling for any thing or speaking to any body, when at last Mr. Carter, being suspicious that there was something wrong, went in and told her that if she wished to remain in his house all night he would accommodate her with a private room. She replied that she would not remain there long to trouble him or any body else, as she would very soon die. Mr. Carter then called in his wife, who soon discovered that the young lady had swallowed a large quantity of laudanum; an ounce and a half vial was found under the table empty. An officer of the police and a physician were immediately sent for, and by means of the stomach pump her life was saved. She has since refused to tell her name or give any clue by which her home may be known or her motive for attempting to destroy her life. She still remains at Mr. Carter's Hotel, Yorkville. —N. Y. Mirror.

NOTICES.

INDIANA DISTRICT,—FRANKFORD CIRCUIT.—The Indisposition of Br. Bailey, (Superintendant,) and the absence of Br. J. Shipp, warrant the postponement of the Fourth Quarterly Meeting of Frankford Circuit, until the 9th and 10th of October, to be held in the town of Frankford. Brethren will please call and spend the Sabbath with our Frankford friends,—as the meeting will embrace the Sabbath previous to the sitting of our Conference.

T. S. FALKINBURGH.

Indiana Conference.—Inasmuch as the next Session of the Indiana and Wabash Conferences was appointed to commence at the same time, and being not far distant from each other, it is thought advisable that Indiana Conference change the time of its Session. I believe there is no provision in our Discipline in reference to this matter; and where there is no law there is no transgression. After having consulted about three-fourths of the members of Conference, and the District Committee, I am requested to publish to all, whom it may concern, that our next Session of the Indiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, will commence the twenty-ninth of September next, at Johnson's meeting-house, 7 miles West of Shelbyville, Shelby county. We earnestly solicit aid from sister Conferences.

GIVE.

"Give to him that asketh thee."
If the poor man pass thy door,
Give him of thy bounteous store;
Give him food, and give him gold,
Give him shelter from the cold:
Aid him his lone life to live,
For 'tis angel-like to give.

Though world riches thou has not,
Give to him of poorer lot;
Think thee of the widow's mite;
In the Holy Master's sight,
It was more, a thousandfold,
Than the rich man's hoard of gold.

Give; it is the better part;
Give to him, the poor in heart;
Give of love in large degree,
Give of hope and sympathy;
Cheer to them who sigh forlorn,
Light to him whose lamp is gone.

Give the gray-haired wanderer room;
Lead him gently to the tomb;
Let him not in friendless clime,
Float adown the tide of time;
Hear the mother's lonely call,
She, the dearest one of all.

And the lost, abandoned one,
In thy pathway do not shun;
Of thy kindness she hath need;
Bind with balm the bruised reed;
Give, and gifts above all price,
Shall be thine in Paradise.

NO. IX.

On September 8th, I set out with my wife and two children, and Brother Joel Dalbey, jr., for our second Camp-meeting, to be held about twelve miles above Cincinnati. It being upwards of 40 miles, we did not reach there until midnight; but the moon being about the full, we drove safely and pleasantly, and were received joyfully by the brethren, and we were well paid for our trouble and fatigue, for we were favored with the manifestations of God's awakening, converting, and sanctifying grace: there were between twenty-five and thirty sinners converted to God, and many of our brethren in the Methodist Episcopal Church, who came there filled with prejudice, were melted down, and joined with us in prayer and praise, being convinced that the good Lord was with us. O, praise the Lord my soul, for he is good, and his mercy endureth forever! At a prayer-meeting in a tent, two young women, sisters, both obtained the witness of pardoning mercy at the same moment. Twenty-three joined our Church at the close. As we had no Sabbath included in this Camp-meeting, we struck our tents on Saturday. We reached home on Sunday, about ten o'clock; after taking some refreshments, though much fatigued and very unwell, I rode eighteen miles to reach my appointment in Xenia at four; got there in good time, and found our beloved Brother Saul Henkles,—got him to preach, and God blessed the word. Being very hoarse and unwell, I prevailed on Brothers Towler and Henkle, to fill three appointments for me, and let me go home and rest. On Saturday 19th, went to our Quarterly-meeting at Bellbrook,—we had a glorious time in love-feast, and while I was trying to preach, God blessed the word, and was with us at his table. Some Presbyterians and E. Methodists communed with us. O, how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! O, Lord! drive sectarian bigotry to its native hell. At night Brother Baker and Brother Metcalf, both prayed and exhorted with judgment and energy, and God blessed their efforts. I invited mourners and three fell to their knees and cried for mercy, and joined the church. After resting four days, I rode twenty miles to Br. Wilkes on the 19th; preached on the next day, —met class, and preached at night at Brother Wellers': sinners were convicted, and the people of God were greatly blessed. October 2d, rode 16 miles to Monroe,—preached at night,—found all the class reformers in sentiment, but like thousands more, remain under the yoke, and support the power that oppresses, and the principles that deprive them of their rights as men and Christians. Saturday 3d, rode to Brother Voughres', preached in the afternoon in the New Light Church. I then invited all who wished to hear our Articles read, to meet me immediately at Br. V's.; eight or ten did so, and just as I was closing, J. Elliott came in and attacked me with a volley of abuse; I said nothing to him until the company had dispersed, except three or four: he charged me with telling a lie while I was preaching: but I reasoned with him, and proved that I had not made the statement he had been informed I had made; he cooled down, and begged me to forgive him,—acknowledged he was too hasty, and wished to renew our old friendship, which gave me great comfort to comply with his request. Seventh, rode to Brother Magers', and he sent his boys round to let the people know that I would preach in the meeting-house that night. Here I met with strong opposition by two or three who had always claimed me as their father in the Gospel; they finally agreed to leave it to the congregation, whether I should preach or not, and it was soon decided by a large majority that I should. I concluded to leave an appointment for the Sabbath evening following—then went to Bellbrook, preached, and met the class. Saturday 10th, had the pleasure of meeting with Brother Richmond, one of our itinerant fellow laborers, and sufferers in the cause of Christian Liberty, who preached in my place that night, an excellent sermon,—God blessed it to many. Eleventh, went on to Hopewell meeting-house, and as I fully expected, my opposers were there before dark, and three or four got into the pulpit, in order to keep me out, and commenced their exercises. One after another tried to exhort, but failed. The house was crowded; I went out,—many followed and wanted me to preach out there by moonshine: but I told them I thought it would be best not, that they were doing more good for our cause than I could by preaching. Brother Magers said his house was open for us to preach in at any time. My opponents at this place, were determined that I should not preach in the meeting-house. They bored a hole through each leaf of the door, and run a halter chain through, and round the post, and put a pad-lock on it. A friend of mine, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, went in the night, and melted lead, and poured it into the lock, so when they wanted to get in on Sunday, they had to get a file and cut the chain off, before they could get in.

PARENTAL.

Starting Children in the World.

"Many an unwise parent labors hard and lives sparingly, all his life, to give his children a start in the world. Setting a young man afloat, with money left by his relatives, is like tying bladders under the arms of one who cannot swim: ten chances to one, he will lose his bladders, and go to the bottom. Teach him to swim, and he will never need the bladders."

Is it not frequent, very frequent, for parents to toil and tug, drag out a miserable slavish life with miserly parsimoniousness; refusing to contribute to objects of real benevolence? And, for what? to give their children a start! enable them to make a dash! What has been the result? This same wealth, hoarded by cringing parsimony, has proved a curse to body and soul! God has testified his disapprobation of this course most fearfully!

"There is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth." Lay up treasure in heaven; be rich toward God. Cultivate the mind. Train your children to habits of industry and virtue; give them a sound, thorough education, on Bible principles. These will be of more value to them, than the wealth of the Indies, the gold of Peru.

Hint as to Schooling.

A common error into which many parents fall, is to send their children to an interior school first, and afterwards to place them in an establishment where they may, as it is termed, "finish" their education. Not only is the pupil a severe loser by this method, but the master, to whose care he is at length confided, experiences much additional trouble. He has not only now to lead the youth into a right path, but to lead him back from many a wrong one; not merely to urge him to the further acquisition of good habits, but to endeavor to root out many that are faulty. It is related by Quintilian that those who went to learn music of Timotheus, paid double price if they had received any previous instruction—a safe-guard I would recommend a general adoption by good teachers. But there are other evils connected with such a system, not to mention those which result from change of plans to the student himself. It is obvious that no tutor can be expected to take much interest in the progress of children who are placed with him only as a temporary thing. Whereas, if it is understood that they are to continue with him so long as his treatment of them is what it ought to be, he has an incentive to diligence in the highest degree effective. He looks upon them as the future ornaments of his school; and they immediately come under the influence of those well-regulated stimuli which urge them on to fill up the ranks of those who are about to finish their scholastic course. A well-directed establishment, where the morals, intellectual improvement, and health of the pupils are carefully and assiduously attended to, presents advantages which ought to be appreciated by parents, though they are seldom valued by the pupils.—Monthly Prize Essay.

Example; Look to It

Let every parent, look well to his daily and hourly example; for children, says an able writer, make more use of the eye than the ear; and the expressions are clearer and stronger from the one than the other—they will not be influenced so much by what you say as by what you do. In vain do you exhort them to be spiritual while you are worldly. In vain do you point them to the narrow path which leads to heaven, while you decline to walk in it. In vain do you warn them from carnal indulgences, in which you seek your gratification. You must live what you teach; you must be what you desire them to become. This is the necessary price of a happy state of religion in the family; and it is, alas! a price many parents decline to pay.

From the American Messenger.

Suggestions in Regard to Dress.

"Dress is intended for warmth, decency, and comfort; not for gaudy show, nor to excite vanity and pride. Be careful then, never to sacrifice health, decency or comfort to a love of finery.

Bestow but a small portion of your time, money, or thoughts, upon dress; there are things of far greater moment.

Always have something better to recommend you than the garments that cover your person. If these are your chief recommendation, it is a proof that they occupy the chief place in your heart; that you are a vain and frivolous character.

Guard against the love of dress, lest it should lead you to self-flattery, extravigance, dissipation, and ruin. Remember that neither fine dress, nor personal beauty, will last long. In a very few years, at most, we shall have nothing to wear but a shroud and a coffin, and instead of being admired, we shall be loathed.

There is only one robe that will never fade nor wear out, the robe of Christ,s righteousness:

'It never fades, it ne'er grows old,
Nor fears the rain, nor moth, nor mould;
It takes no spot, but still refines;
The more 'tis worn, the more it shines.'

Seek, above all things, to be clothed in that robe, and to be adorned with the graces to the Holy Spirit; these will fit us to dwell in that heavenly world where we shall be clothed in the raiment which angels wear.

The medium of propriety in dress may be expressed by the terms, plain, becoming, and dignified.

Let your dress be neat, modest, appropriate to times and seasons, and as far as is consistent with the foregoing cautions, agreeable to those with whom you associate."

What more ruinous to a community, than for the mind & heart to be occupied chiefly in decorating the body? Was this evil ever more apparent? Where the distinction between saint and sinner? If the higher classes set the example, are not the lower sure to imitate, even at the expense of starving the intellect? Do we not see this? Are there not families in our midst comparatively ignorant of the first principles of education, who nevertheless, labor and toil to decorate the body, to look fine? Christian, are you furthering this folly and wickedness by your example? Beware, God will visit.

How profoundly silent is the Pulpit on this subject! Is there no cause of alarm? Is God silent? Read Isaiah 3: from verse 16, to the close; also, the Epistles. Adorn yourselves in decent apparel, with modesty and sobricty, "with good works." These, "in the sight of God, are of great price."

The Evils of the Tongue.

SCOLDING AND FRETTING, OR THE CAUSE OF OLD AGE.

"A pleasant, cheertul, lively, generous, charitable-minded woman is never old. Her heart is young at sixty or seventy, as it was at eighteen or twenty; and they who are old at sixty or seventy, are not made old by time. They are made old by the ravages of passion and feelings of an unsocial and ungenerous nature which have cankered their minds, wrinkled their spirits, and withered their souls. They are made old by envy, by jealously, by hatred, by suspicions, by uncharitable feelings, by slandering, scandalizing, ill-bred habits; which, if they avoid, they preserve their youth to the very last; so that the child shall die, as the Scriptures say, a hundred years old. There are many old women who pride themselves on being eighteen or twenty. They carry all the characteristics of age about them without even suspecting that they are old women.

"Pride is an old passion, and Vanity is as grey as the mountains. They are old women that have much of either. They are dry, heartless, dull, indifferent. They want the well-spring of youthful affection, which is always cheerful, always engaged in some labor of love which is calculated to promote and distribute enjoyment. They pine, repine, yawn and stretch themselves; they murmur, grumble, long, fret, frown; they snap, snarl, carp, and vapor. They go to bed in the morning; they breakfast in bed; they find fault with this, that, and t'other thing: they make even their own children run away from them, and take refuge in the cellar, or the back kitchen, or any other place, that they may rid them of the old woman."—[London Despatch.

Good Wife.

That young lady will make a good wife who does not apologise when you find her at work in the kitchen, but continues at her task until the work is finished.

When you hear a lady say, I shall attend church and wear my old bonnet and every day gown, for I fear we shall have a rain storm, depend upon it she will make a good wife.

When a daughter remarks—"Mother, I would not hire help, for I can assist you to do all the work in the kitchen," set it down that she will make somebody a good wife.

When you overhear a young woman saying to her father——"Don't purchase a very expensive or showy dress for me but one that will wear best," you may be certain she will make a good wife.

When you see a female rise early, get breakfast and do up her mother's work in season, and then sit down to sow or knit, depend upon it, she will make a good wife.

When you see a female anxious to learn a trade, so as to earn something to support herself and perhaps assist her aged parents, you may be sure that she will make one of the best of wives.

The best qualities to look after in a wife are industry, humility, neatness, gentleness, benevolence and piety.—Where you find these there is no danger. You will obtain a treasure and not regret your choice to the last period.

Woman.

How much the world owes to the influence of woman! Wealth, power religion, intellect—all that is good and great does homage to her.—Whether as a son, a husband, or a father, we love cherish and respect her. Perhaps a more beautiful compliment was never paid to female character than that rendered by the late John Randolph, of Roanoke. When minister to France, he said he was kept from whirling down the tide of infidelity, which was then carrying everything before it, by the remembrance that when a child his dear mother would put his little hands together and teach him to say "OUR FATHER WHO ART IN HEAVEN! Touchingly beautiful as is this little story, it is but the history that thousands of others might relate with equal interest. Then honor to woman: she has ever been foremost in every good work. In the language of another: "From the time of the Sabines to Theodora's conquest of Justinian, women seems to have been at the bottom of almost all the memorable events of the Roman history. Lucretia, Virginia, Vetura, Fabia, the wife of Lucinius, who became at her instigation the first Plebian Consul, are illustrious examples of this; and whatever may be the changes of manners and opinions, as Hume has well remarked, all nations, with one accord, point, for the ideals of a virtuous matron, to the daughter of Scipio, & the mother of the Gracchi." Who then will doubt the influence of women!

From Neal's Saturday Gazette.

Choosing a wife.

Never marry a woman merely because she has a handsome face or a well turned figure; for we soon become insensible to angelic forms and faces. If her countenance has life and intelligence—if her figure is passable—if her walk and carriage are modest and ladylike—and if her whole appearance indicates she has mind, heart, & soul, why she is worth all the simpering, mincing, flirting, affected misses, that ever brought good looks as their only marriage dower. If the fair one you are addressing is rich in houses, lots, farms, bank-stock, or railway shares, her worldly gear should not prove an insurmountable objection; but if she is poor, like yourself, so much the better. There is nothing like a young couple starting in life with fond hearts, clear heads, easy consciences, and empty pockets. You have something to live for, to hope for, to work for, to love for! Your early struggles with the crosses of this cross world, will only bind you the closer to your young, ardent and loving wife; and then those long, cold, cozy winter evenings, how delightful to sit by your humble hearth, after the toils of the day are over, conjuring up bright visions of the future, occasionally looking down to catch a look from a pair of dark, loving, sympathising eyes, that fairly dissolve your heart in one sweet, gushing, trembling stream of tenderness, affection, pure devotion, and bright, joyous and undying love. Never marry a girl without having some faint idea of her temper and disposition. It is possible you have been visiting her nightly for a twelvemonth; but still you don't know her. Remember, every time you pay her a visit you put on, not only your best clothes, but your best looks; and you may take our word for it, that on all such occasions she is in the same predicament. Depend upon it, if your wife possessed all the riches of the Indies—if she was the mistress of every known and unknown accomplishment—if she had the voice of a Syren and the grace of a Sylph—if she was as beautiful as the morning, and shone with the glittering brightness of the constellated firmament of night—if she was mistress of all these natural and acquired gifts, with the encumbrances of a bad temper and an unamiable disposition, you may rest assured that your wedded days would be days of vexation, anguish and sorrow. A correct estimate of your "intended's" character, it is quite likely, may be formed by ascertaining the character of her parents; for you may set it down as one of those fixed rules which should be recieved on credit, without the painful test of experience, that the children of low and disreputable parents seldom make good wives or good husbands. Never marry a girl who treats religious matters as mere trifles. If she is a professing christian so much the better; for her sweet example, and sweeter influence, will wean you from the broad path which leads only to destruction. In conclusion, if you can find a girl that possesses all the qualities which we have described, and who is free from the imperfections which we have hinted at, you may take her little white, soft hand, and murmur your long concealed hopes and wishes in her listening ears. If tears starts to eyes, and color to her cheeks, and she hides her face upon your beating breast, (a plan generally adopted,) you may be sure you have wooed & won a girl that you will always love—always be proud of. In adversity or prosperity—in sickness or in health—hatred or caressed—avoided or sought after—friendless or idolized—in the bloom of manhood or bent by accumulated and accumulating years—she will ever prove to you a true, fond, faithful, loving wife. Her sweet voice will be the music of your life, & her sweeter smile the sunlight of your soul.

PRESS ON.

We find the following noble sentiment, the key to fortune, in a little English periodical:

"The mystery of Napoleon's career was this, under all difficulties & discouragements to "press on." It solves the problem of all heroes: it is the rule by which to judge rightly of all wonderful success and triumphal marches to fortune and genius. It should be the motto of all, high and low, fortunate and unfortunate, so called—"press on," never despair, never be discouraged, however stormy the heavens, however dark the way, however great the difficulties, or repeated the failure, "press on." If fortune has played false with thee to-day, do thou play true for this to-morrow. Let the foolishness of yesterday make thee wise to-day. If thy affections have been poured out like water in the desert, do not sit down and perish of this, but "press on—a beautiful oasis is before thee, and thou mayest reach it if thou wilt. If another has been false to thee, do not thou increase the evil by being false to thyself. Do not say the world has lost its poetry and beauty: it is not so; and even if it be so, make thine own poetry and beauty, by a brave, a true, and above all, a religious life."

THE INFANT'S PRAYER.

"Though we are simple, weak and young,
The Lord will listen when we pray;
For never from the infant's tongue,
Did Jesus turn his ear away.

No, he assists the humble prayer,
Grants the importunate request;
Tells us, that should we trust his care,
He'll ever make us truly blest.

O may his love renew our hearts,
And consecrate our fleeting days,
And when our life on earth departs,
Eternal life be spent in praise."

Something more Wonderful than the Magnetic Telegraph.

Conversation between a father and his two sons, Thomas and George.

"Is not the Magnetic Telegraph the most wonderful thing you ever heard of, father?" said Thomas.

"No," replied his father, "I have heard of things more wonderful."

"But, father," said George, "you never heard of any message being sent so quickly as by this means, have you?"

"Yes, I have, my son."

"And received an answer as quickly?" added George.

"Yes, much sooner," replied his father.

"Are you in earnest, father?" said Thomas, drawing his chair close to his father, and looking eagerly in his face. "Is it possible you know of a more wonderful way of communication than by the Telegraph?"

"I never was more in earnest, my son, than I am when I say 'yes' to your question."

"Well, father," said George, "do tell me what it is, and in what respect it is better than the Telegraph."

"In the first place," said his father, "you do not have to wait to send your message while others are attended to; for your message can go with thousands of others, without any interruption or hindrance."

"And in the next place," continued his father, "there is no need of wire, or electricity, or any machinery, to aid the mode of communication of which I speak; and what is more wonderful than all, is the fact, that you need not even express the nature of your communication, as, before you do so, your answer may be returned, though it is quite necessary that you truly and sincerely desire a favorable reception for your request.

"Besides all this, the plan of communication of which I speak is superior to all others, from the fact you need not resort to any particular place to send yout request. In the lonely desert—on the trackless ocean—in the crowded city—on the mountain top—by night or by day—in sickness or in health, and especially in trouble and affliction, the way of communication is open to all. And the applicants can never be so numerous that the simplest desire of the feeblest child, properly presented, shall not meet with immediate attention."

"Is there any account published of this wonderful manner of communicating your wishes?" inquired Thomas.

"Yes, there is, my son, and I hope your interest will not be diminished when I tell you it is to be found in the Bible.

"In the Bible, father!" exclaimed both the boys.

"Certainly, my sons, and if you will both get your Bibles, I will tell you where to find the passage confirming what I have said."

The children opened their Bibles, and found, as their father directed them, the twenty-fourth verse of the sixty-fifth chapter of Isaiah, which Thomas read as follows: "And it come to pass, that before they call, I WILL ANSWER, and while they are yet speaking, I WILL HEAR."

Next, George found and read the ninth verse of the fifty-eighth chapter of Isaiah: "Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am."

"Now turn," said their father, "to Daniel, ninth chapter, twenty-first, second, and third verses."

"And while I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin, and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplications before the Lord my God; yea, while I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel," "being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. And he informed me, and talked with me and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am come to show thee, &c."

"I see, father from these passages," said Thomas, "that you refer to prayer."

"And I am sure you will both agree with me that this mode of communication with heaven is more wonderful than any other, for by this means our desires can be immediately known to our Heavenly Father, and we receive an answer."

Agricultural.

Cut the Bushes.

Now is the time to be cutting up and exterminating the bushes which infest the cultivated grounds, or grounds that ought to be cultivated. Nothing can be more unprofitable than a rank growth of alders, or willows, or hardhacks, or brambles of any kind, in arable, mowing, or pasture lands, and it is well to put a "stub scythe" to them during this month and cut them down.—Some think that the time of full moon in August is just the right time to cut them, and that, when cut at such time, they don't dare to start up again. Now we don't suppose that the moon, whether full or empty, has anything to do with it. The probable reason why bushes cut at this season of the year are not so apt to spring up again, is this—the growing season being nearly over, the system of the bush or tree is not in a condition to push up suckers so quick and vigorous as at earlier portions of the summer. Cut them down and burn them—"their room is better than their company," and their ashes of more value than their living bodies.—Main Farmer.

The Woodpecker.

In more than fifty orchards which I have myself carefully examined, (says Wilson, the Ornitholigist,) those trees which were marked by the woodpecker, (for some trees they never touch, perhaps because not penetrated by insects,) were uniformly the most thriving, and seemingly the most productive; many of these were upwards of sixty years old, their trunks completely covered with holes, while the branches were broad, luxuriant, and covered with fruit. Of decayed trees, more than three-fourths were untouched by the woodpecker. Several intelligent farmers, with whom I have conversed, candidly acknowledge the truth of these observations, and with justice look upon these birds as beneficial; but the most common opinion is that they bore the trees to suck the sap, and so destroy its vegetaion; though pine and other resinous trees, on the juices of which it is not pretended they feed, are often found equally perforated. Were the sap of the tree their object, the saccharine juice of the birch, the sugar maple, and several others, would be much more inviting, because more sweet and nourishing than that of either the pear or apple tree; but I have not observed one mark on the former, for ten thousand that may be seen on the latter. Besides, the early part of the spring is the season when the sap flows most abundantly; whereas, it is only during the months of September, October, and November, that woodpeckers are seen so indefatigably engaged in orchards, probing every crack and crevice, boring through the bark, and what is worth remarking, principally on the south and south-west sides of the tree, for the eggs and larvæ desposited there by the countless swarms of summer insects. These, if suffered to remain, would prey upon the very vitals, if I may so express it, of the tree, and in the succeeding summer give birth to myriads more of their race, equally destructive.

Here, then, is a whole species, I may say genus, of birds, which Providence seems to have formed for the protection of our fruit and forest trees from the ravages of vermin, which every day destroy millions of those noxious insects that would otherwise blast the hopes of the husbandman, and which even promote the fertility of the trees; and, in return, are proscribed by those who ought have been their protectors, and incitements and rewards held out for their destruction! Let us examine better into the operations of Nature, very many of our mistaken opinions and groundless prejudices will be abandoned for more just, enlarged, and humane modes of thinking.

MEDICINE FOR HOGS.—The American Farmer furnishes the following:—When your hogs get sick, you know not of what, give them ears of corn first dipped in tar and then rolled in sulphur. It is ten to one that it arrests the disease and restores the pig to perfect health.

DEFERRED ITEMS.

Dreadful Conflagraton.

Melancholy loss of Life—two Men killed—Fifty Wounded.—The Philadelphia papers bring us the sad intelligence of a most destructive fire that occurred in that place on Saturday night (Aug. 21,) last. It orignated in the immense seven storied building on Broad st., owned and occupied by G. L. Broom as a sugar refinery. The contents being of a highly combustible character, the fire soon spread and extended upward, and as most of the doors and windows were of iron, the firemen experienced the greatest difficulty in reaching the raging element with their streams, and at last when the flames had by their own fury forced themselves to view, such was the intensity from the confinement out of which they burst, that the water thrown on them was converted into fine steam and dissipated like hot mist ere it reached them. Every thing in the building—machinery, fixtures, and a stock valued at $60,000—was destroyed. It was hoped that the flames would have been confined to this building, and with that view the firemen were engaged in putting water on the adjoining property, but unfortunately they were doomed to disappointment, and to witness a most horryfying and heart-rending sight. At a moment when there was a scene of terrific sublimity, the reality of which the pen can afford but a faint idea, the south gable wall gave way, crushing in its fall the rear of a large brewery, causing the back wall of this buildiug to fall into Broad street—overwhelming in its ruins several engines and a large number of firemen, about 50, who were more or less seriously injured: two were killed. Several of the adjoining buildings were greatly injured. The total loss is estimated at about $200,000: a small part only was insured. It is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary.

HORRID MURDER IN LOUISVILLE.—A man named Farrel was taken up in Louisville, on Thursday, on a charge of having poisoned a man named Skidmore, a returned volunteer, who had served with the Louisville Legion, and who had just received the money for his land warrant. The Courier says:—

It is supposed corrosive sublimate was administered to him with some victuals, after eating which he survived but eight hours. Farrel is an Irishman, and keeps a boarding house on water street, between 5th and 6th. After Skidmore was taken sick, Farrel exhibited the most horrible brutality, by thrusting the unfortunate man into the street, where the poor fellow remained several hours, and where he finally died! A good hearted Irishwoman attempted to take Skidmore into her house, a short time before he breathed his last, but Farrel prevented her from doing so, and for her humanity the brute knocked her down.

We hear that the money S. received for his warrant is not to be found. It is a horrible affair throughout, and we trust the proper officers will see that the matter is thoroughly sifted.

STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.—The barn of Peter Thompson, near Miltonville, Butler county, was struck by lightning on the 5th inst., and burned to the ground. It was filled with grain, hay, &c., all of which was consumed: also one horse.

PITIABLE DEATH.—A woman, named Sophia McGowan, fell dead on Sunday in the office of the commissioners of immigration, at New York. She arrived from Ireland on Friday, was deserted by her brother on Saturday, and died from exhaustion on Sunday.

GREAT FIRE IN RUSSIA.—On the 22 ultimo a terrible fire broke out at Kasan, in Russia, which enterely destroyed 106 houses and two churches. The Emperor sent 25,000 effective roubles (100,000f,) to be distributed among the persons whose property was destroyed, and 21,000 roubles toward the expense of reconstructig the houses.

DEPLORABLE ACCIDENT.—James S. Lane, Esq., a respectable citizen of St. Louis, on the night of 18th ult., got up in the dark with the intention of going on to a balcony from a window in his room, but accidently opened the wrong window, and was precipitated to the pavement below, causing his death in a few hours.

SHOT HIS WIFE BY MISTAKE.—Dr. J. B. Pierce, of Troy, Pa., shot his wife by mistake, on the evening of the 22d. Mistaking her for a robber breaking into the house, he seized his gun and fired. The whole charge entered her breast, and she fell dead on the floor.

A fatal rail road accident occured on the 30th ult., on the Columbia road, three miles from Manchester, Pa. Two fast cars came violently together, by the breaking of an axle, and two men were crushed to death. They belonged to Ohio, and were accompanied by their wives, one of whom had her collar bone broken by accident.

MORTALITY.—The aggregate number of deaths in New York, last week, was 400—87 men, 87 women, 122 boys, and 104 girls; under 2 years of age 168. Cholera infantum carried off 65, consumption 27, convulsions 28, debility 12, diarrhœa 20, dropsy 23, drowned 7, typhus fever 30, other fevers 27, disease of the heart 10, inflammations 23, old age 4.

CREATION.

IN WHICH ARE DISPLAYED THE POWER AND BENEVOLENCE OF THE CREATOR.

Before the world from chaos sprung,
Or sun and moon their rounds began,
Ere morning stars for joy had sung,
Or heaven's eternal arches rung,
God was, as yet, the great 'I AM.'

Let radiant light dispel the gloom,
And drive the misty shades away;
Thus speaks Jehovah from His throne,
'Tis done, for He is God alone,
Good in His sight, He calls it day.

Again He speaks; the heavens appear,
Then smiling waters next rejoice;
The earth is formed by His desire,
Huge mountains rise, and seas conspire
To praise the Lord with mighty voice.

The sun, refulgent orb of light,
And moon, pale Empress though she be,
Ye starry worlds that rule the night,
Just visible to human sight,
Are placed in heaven's broad canopy.

The earth is clothed in verdure green,
And fragrant flowers begin to bloom;
On land and sea the fowl is seen,
And beast and reptile, though unclean,
Through forest, den, and cavern roam.

Creation's noblest work is man,
Indued with powers almost divine;
Who through eternal ages, can
God's greater works in heaven scan,
And higher rise in thought sublime.

Where'er we look, where'er we go,
The works of God are sure displayed;
The heavens above, the earth below,
And limpid streams which gently flow,
In beauteous order are arrayed.

What if the scorner laughs and mocks,
While God to him is yet unknown?
The lowing herds and bleating flocks,
The lofty hills and massive rocks,
Ascribe all praise to God alone.

When lightnings flash, and thunders roar,
God's mighty arm the world sustains;
Though ocean heave, and tempests lower,
And man exert his noblest power,
God still defends his own domains.

Literary Correspondence.

Written for the Western Recorder.

International Copy-Right,---Its Justice and Necessity.

The policy controling the intercourse of nations, has in all ages varied from the most restricted to the most free. While some have aimed only to defend their citizens from the hostile attacks of invading armies, others have with more wisdom, sought to protect their citizens not only from the encroachments of an armed foe, but have extended their fostering care to the arts of industry, by guarding them from the aggressive schemes and injurious competition of foreign rivals. But while the rights of persons and property have been respected in different degrees by legislators, there has been a strange neglect of the labors and emanations of the mind. These seem to be viewed as common plunder, to be seized and appropriated, with impunity, by all.—Believing this to be entirely wrong—that the same moral and religious principles, which are recognized among men in other matters, apply with equal force to Science and Literature,—I propose to offer a few thoughts on the justice and necessity of establishing an international copy-right.

First, its justice. Although under this head many important reasons might be assigned in favor of the proposed measure, yet there are none so weighty as that which rests on the broad basis of impartial justice. It is a proposition that is right in itself, and therefore may place its claims wholly on its intrinsic merits. It is enough to say, that it is a plan to give to foreign authors the full possession of their labors,—to extend in good faith, similar privileges and the same shield of protection, which are universally conceded in the other departments of life. None will be found so wanting in the elements of right as to deny, that, if in the mechanical arts an individual in America makes a discovery, the advantages of which may equally benefit the European, the obligations of the latter to the former are as great as though it had been made by one of his own countrymen, and vice versa. If this be granted in reference to matters of a physical nature, it will certainly apply with equal force to those that are intellectual. The intellectual productions of Newton, Locke, and others, have unquestionably contributed to ameliorate the condition of the inhabitants of the New World, as much as those of the Old. Would it then be in keeping with the crudest notions of justice, that we should enjoy the benefits of the labor which others have spent most of their lives in maturing, without making a proper return? The sound of their fame, and the applause of their works by posterity are not an adequate compensation. Authors are subject to like wants as other men; their physical nature and necessities are the same, and ought therefore to be supplied. Chill poverty and personal dependence take away too many of their enjoyments, and encroach too far on their happiness for any thing else to fill the void. There is a mistaken notion with many in reference to Authors. Their productions are looked on as the offspring of leisure, the creations of amusements, or the effusions of mind seeking employment during the inaction of the body. But a more egregious error was never entertained. The exertions of the mind are infinitely more wearisome and wearying to the body than physical employments. The intense application of the thoughts soon undermine the constitution and destroy health. The very seclusion of the Author, and his necessarily sedentary habits have a direct tendency to weaken his physical powers and produce diseases. In any department of letters, the Author may choose to turn his attention, there is an intellectual discipline to be undergone and a preparation of the mind to habits of profound thought. Should he enter the field of fiction to instruct and amuse mankind, he must study man in all the grades of place and station—know the home of all his passions, and the most efficient means of reaching, rousing, and controling them. In fine, he must know man thoroughly—his weakness and strength—his tastes and affections—his likes and dislikes—that he may minister to each as the occasion may require.—Or should he turn his attention to history—circumscribed by the facts of his narrative, he must exercise the most plodding industry and patient research. He must examine contemporary authorities, and often contradictory documents—discriminate among the heterogeneous materials—compare, arrange, combine, in due connection his whole subject. He must trace causes to their effects, and show the influences producing the actions, fortunes, and revolutions of which he may be treating. These things can only be accomplished by the most severe and painful labor that man is capable of performing. The difficulty is manifest from the fact, that so few have succeeded, and so many have missed the goal of their ambition. The Author of all persons, if he fail in his undertakings, is hunted down with the most unrelenting and malignant persecution. Envious rivals assail him with the bitterest ridicule and unmitigated criticisms. For him there are no extenuating circumstances, nor excuse for mistaken judgments, but he is destined to wither in the shades of oblivion, or endure an inglorious notoriety, buffetted by the rebukes and sneers of an unfeeling world. Let the melancholy deaths of Shelby and Kirk White be witnesses on this point. Their hearts wrung by bitter taunts, and unmeasured censure, gave way under these inflictions, and their souls passed off to more congenial climes. It is justice then, we say, that they retain the full possession of their writings to provide for their personal wants, and support their families in the hour of need and decline of life. The international copy-right is an act of even justice, and will place the Author on a proper level with other men.

Secondly, its necessity. If European works can be had without expense, or the consent of their Authors, publishers can reprint them cheaper than American works; and consequently the latter will be excluded. Under these circumstances nearly every department of learning is occupied by foreign works; and the floating literature which we are daily accustomed to read, is nearly all of the same species. The heroes of story and the characters of the drama are all drawn from alike society. Their obliquities and vices are gilded over by the magic hand of genius; while many of their enormities, painted with the brilliant hues of imagination, are held up as the reflected images of virtue. All the beauties of style and ingenuity of plot are calculated to impress the inconsiderate with the idea that these are the highest excellencies and the actors most worthy of resemblance. Foreigners thus direct and give tone to national education. Science and literature, all the fountains of knowledge, are opened to us by those who write for other meredians; the systems of which are built on antiquated and artificial states of society, and not in keeping with the enlarged and liberal views of our ancestors, who called into existence this beautiful government and free institutions. The society in which they live—the atmosphere they breathe—all their associations are the reverse of our own. Their works, therefore, are the transcripts of their own minds, written for kingly governments, and inculcating principles in contravention to all that is American. The consequences of keeping open the flood-gates of vice and immorality, and inundating the nation with the vile, polluted, lacivious trash of foreign countries without a countervailing influence must be at once apparent. It is a more subtle and powerful method of destroying our political system than any direct attack.—It necessarily corrupts the taste, debases the morals of the people, and in time may destroy this republic. The people thus educated become alienated from their own institutions, because they are unacquainted with the foundations on which they rest, and see not the beauty and symetry of their proportions. They are blinded by the jargon and sophistry of foreign writers, until their opinions assimilate, and will, finally, be identified.

I know it is high treason against public opinion to question the incorruptibility of our virtue, the impossibility of seducing us from the path of rectitude, or our unerring sagacity in discovering right and wrong. But the fact is we are a reading people. The books which are placed in our hands, we peruse with eagerness without pausing to discriminate as to their quality. Now let a man be given up to one sort of notions—I care not whether true or false—let them be instilled in his mind in youth, and strengthened by education, and there is scarcely any power able to remove his prejudices and predilection in their favor. He will view every thing through them as a medium. They become his stanpard of judging right and wrong—and with the best intentions—in spite of himself—all of his opinions will be tinctured with his former prepossessions. Such has ever been the case, and as long as man's nature remains unchanged, we must expect like causes to produce like effects. Although we may be possessed of an ardent love of country, a sincere desire for rational freedom, and noble and virtuous feelings; yet these may be crushed and our morals corrupted, when we draw our information from such authors as the mercenary Scott, our didactics from the ferocious Tyther, or our amusement from the licentious and profligate Bulwer, Maryatt, and Sue. From the last class we have most to fear. Witness their indecent representations, and wanton pictures; listen to their indelicate wit, obscene allusions, and ribald jests, and the better judgment will pronounce them such as ought to call up a blush on the face of modesty, or if introduced in drawing-room, should be reckoned an outrage on decency. This class constitute three-fourths of the reading matter in this country. It is sought after with a morbid appetite and its demand increases until even now, the truth is not to be disguised, our country is in imminent danger from the depravity of morals, the impurity of passions, and the baseness of pursuits. Now surely it is our duty to keep the fountains of knowledge which invigorate and refresh us, pure from foreign influence. It behooves us, then, to suppress as much as possible, the circulation of books, that vitiate morals, and strike at the foundations of the republic. This will be prevented, to proper extent, we think, by establishing an international copy-right. Since Authors would then claim their own, and thus prevent those fine, fascinating, but false pictures of European society from reaching every family through the public press. B. C. W.

Ministers' Department.

Emotion in Preaching.

Next to argument comes passion. From the cooler region of the understanding we descend to the heart, and by metaphor, by imagination, by emotion, we kindle our foregoing logic into a flame. When the machinery and every thing else is in readiness, the steam, which has been gradually rising and condensing, is made to press upon the wheels and set in rapid motion. But here there is point to be reached, there is an end to be obtained. The mastery of one's whole subject implies the clearest perception of this end, a full vision of the stopping place to be aimed at, with a knowledge of the moment when it is reached.

Perhaps popular speakers [and the remark applies to all parts of a discourse] fail nowhere more frequently than here. They sometimes neither see the thing to be done, nor know when it is accomplished. They begin before they have studied the subject through. They talk and talk on; and when the first hour is out, they may just as well talk through a second. They have proved nothing, have come to no result, have made no progress. Like a bewildered guide, they go round and round through the woods, and at length leave their audience in the swamps, or come out where they entered. If such oratory is ever entertaining, it is never forceful or effective. We should never commence our journey till we know where we are going to. Let the exordium and peroration of a discourse stand over against each other like the two continents of Behring's Straits, with one or both of which always in sight, while you cross as soon as practicable the intermediate sea of discussion, and complete the voyage.

Mimicry: A Dangerous Talent.

Mr. Buck, in his "Anecdotes tells us of a young man, a candidate for the ministry, who possessing a talent for mimicing the tones of other men's voices, indulged it, and the consequences, after a while, was, that he was unable to speak without falling into the imitation of some other person. And when he became a preacher, this unhappy habit so pursued him, that he no sooner began to preach than he set his audience to laughing; in consequence of which he was under the necessity of abandoning the pulpit.

The writer recollects the case of a young man, who in mimicry, excelled all he ever knew; and as he was preparing for the bar, it was expected that he would make a great figure as a speaker. But the fact was, that by the constant indulgence of his propensity for mimicry, he lost his own natural voice and manner, and when pleading at the bar, seemed to the audience not to be in earnest, but to be speaking to raise a laugh; which proved to be a great obstruction to his success.

There is also an unconscious imitation of the tones and manner of others, against which young men should be on their guard. Persons are frequently accused of imitating some admired speaker, when they are conscious that they never designed any such thing; nevertheless the imitation is real. Upon this principle, all the members of a family have the same peculiar drawl or intonation, which they have undesignedly acquired, and on this principle the tone or brogue of a whole province or nation is recognized as soon as it is heard. Some persons possess an uncommon susceptibility of imitating the sounds which they hear. We recollect a preacher in whose tones we could, in one discourse, trace the imitation of three distinguished preachers whom he had been accustomed to hear; and yet, it is more than probable that he never designed to imitate any one of them.

Artificial tones are much more easily imitated than those which are perfectly natural. Every human being, as he has organs of speech of his own, so he has a voice which is natural to him, and no other voice is. And what is wonderful, every hearer can instinctively judge whether a sound emitted from the organs of speech is natural or atificial; not, indeed, so as never to be deceived; but so that in most cases he can determine the fact without much danger of error. In the cultivation of the voice care should be taken not to destroy the natural expression; let all improvement be grafted on this as its stock.—N. Y. Obs.

The Armor of Light.

Let us put on the armor of light, God hath chosen us to be his soldiers, and hath called us forth into the field. Our fight is not against flesh and blood, but against the devil, the prince of the world, and the father of darkness; he rampeth like a lion, and lieth in wait, and seeketh whom he may devour. All the vanities of this life, our bodies, our own hearts conspire against us; the fight is terrible, the danger great. Let us not be unprovided, let us not stand open to the stroke of the enemy. Let us take unto us the whole armor of God; let our loins be girded with verity; let us put on the shield of faith, the breastplate of righteousness; these be the armor of light. Let us not fear to declare the truth, though thereby we should endanger our life. Let us be faithful unto the end; let it appear that the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to cast down strongholds and imaginations, and every high thing that is exalted against God. So shall our armor be complete—so shall we show gloriously in the field, and be terrible to the enemy; so that we stand strong and boldly against sword and fire and death; so shall we, like faithful soldiers of our captain Christ, manfully stand against the gates of hell, and resist all the fiery darts of the wicked; then shall we eat of the fruit in the midst of Paridise, and we shall receive the crown of everlasting glory.—Bp. Jewel.

TEMPERANCE.

Alarm of a Clergyman.

A clergyman in Scotland in a recent letter to a friend says: The recent death of a member of my congregation, the victim of strong drink, whose mortal remains, a few days ago, I followed to the grave, is another circumstance which has deeply enlisted all my sympathies in this cause. The person of whose death I speak, was a man of liberal education, considerable information, generous affections, and industrious habits. A more regular attendant at the sanctuary, or a more attentive hearer of the Gospel when free from the influence of alcohol, never sat within the walls of the place where I minister in holy things. Poor fellow! many were his attempts at reformation, many were the resolutions which he formed, many were the prayers he requested to be presented on his behalf, many were the tears which he shed over his infatuated conduct. But, alas! he was the slave of his imperious lust. The appetite for strong drink ruled the man. In the hour of temptation he always fell, and he has fallen at last to rise no more. And do you think, Sir, that I could quietly stand and see this infernal enemy of man enter within the precincts of God's house and take away its victim from before my very eyes, and not let a voice of warning be heard by those young men who are under my spiriual oversight, and who, it may be, are beginning to drink of the drunkard's cup! No, Sir, I would have considered myself unworthy of the name of a minister of Christ, and unfaithful to the souls commited to my care as a watchman of the morals of those over whom I preside, had I not, with all the tenderness and earnestness I could command, warned them against the first beginning of that fatal course which has brought the well known Mr. —— to a premature death and early grave. It is high time that ministers of the Gospel should speak out on this subject. It is high time that every pulpit in the land gave forth a clear, distinct, and certain sound on this subject. It is high time that the professors of the faith of Jesus should take a decided stand on this subject It is high time that the Churches of Christ; which are the light of the world, beacons of warning to guard men off from every danger, should co-operate with their pastors in promoting the blessed cause of temperance; for O, Sir, it is a melancholy fact verified by experience, that in almost every congregation incipient drunkards are to be found; men who, by their drinking habits, are evidently fast sinking in the scale of morals, self-respect and self-control. It is a very common idea I fear even among ministers, that the subject of temperance is not a proper subject for the pulpit on the Sabbath day. This I must confess was my own idea till but lately. But I asked myself the question, is intemperance a vice into which some of my hearers are in danger of falling? Then it ought to be exposed in its nature, insidious tendency, and fatal consequence, even on the Sabbath. Is total abstinence commendable as the best security against this evil? Then it ought to be recommended and impressed upon the people even on the Lord's day. There is another reason why ministers should bring this subject into the pulpit on the Sabbath, and it is this: it is extremely difficult sometimes, particularly in the country, to get a meeting on a week day evening. People, unless they are deeply interested in a cause will not come, except you can promise them that Mr. so-and-so, distinguished for eloquence, will be present.

How true is all this of our own country!—Am. Tem. Union.

Temperance Hotel.

Messrs. Editors,—Permit me to make a few remarks in reference to the Temperance Hotel, known in the city of Charleston as the Merchants' Hotel. During the last four or five months I have travelled extensively through the United States, staying frequently at the most popular hotels, but I have not spent a week so quietly any where as at the Merchants' Hotel.

During my stay I did not hear a discordant sound among the travellers, boarders, servants, or landlord, all seem to move as if their oars were muffled. I was led to inquire into the cause of such harmony. "Why," said the old gentleman, the keeper of the house, "this is a Temperance Hotel." Ah, said I to myself, that's the key to the whole mystery. I am pleased to say to the temperance travelling community that after having called again and again, I find the Merchants' Hotel a Temperance House in earnest. I have asked the privilege to make these remarks out of respect to the keeper of this Hotel, and in order to refer travellers, who like myself, are pleased with quiet quarters, undamaged by the scent of a bar-room, to a respectable house, where they will be handsomely accommodated. R.

Temptation.—That temptation that at first is but a little cloud as a big as a man's hand, may quickly overspread the whole heaven. Our engaging in sin is the motion of a stone down hill, "it strengthens itself by going," and the longer it runs, the more violent. Beware of the smallest beginnings of temptation. No wise man will neglect or slight the smallest spark of fire, especially if he see it among barrels of gunpowder. You carry gunpowder about you—oh, take heed of the sparks.—Flavel.

MADRAS.

LETTER FROM MR. WINSLOW, APRIL 13, 1847.

Admissions to the Church.—Joyful Communion.

The arrival of the Flavio at Madras has been already noticed in the Herald. The following account, however, of a deeply interesting service, has not been published:

Since my last, we have admitted to the church one native female, who was a caste heathen; for a little time, however, she had been in one or two of our mission families, and now, for many months, she has been attendant on our preaching service at Chintadrepettah. She was baptized by the name of Anna at our communion, March 28; when we had the privilege of sitting down at the Lord's supper with all the dear brethren and sisters by the "Flavio," making with us, sixteen in number, and about twenty native brethren and sisters, several being absent. It was a season of joyful yet tearful solemnity. All the remaining members of the "Indus band," who left Boston, eight in number, in 1819, were once more together, after several years' separation; and there were five of the eight in comfortable health, with the sweet assurance also that the three, not with us, were enjoying a richer feast above. Nearly twenty-eight years have passed since we left our native land; and yet more than half of us are still in the mission field. This is a great mercy. There were, moreover, two sons from this band present with their wives; and we could indulge the hope that in others also, as well as these, the promise, "Instead of the fathers shall be thy children," will be fulfilled. And there were other newly arrived brethren and sisters to sit down at this table spread in the wilderness, and to look around with us upon a few gathered from among the heathen, and made to sit together in heavenly places. This they and we felt to be a privilege and an earnest of future good.

The Bungalow chapel was quite full of children and youth from the schools, male and female, and about one hundred adults, principally heathen, who had turned aside, as it were, to see this great sight, the emblems of the broken body and shed blood of the King of kings and Lord of lords. The number of missionaries present was an evidence to the people of our earnestness, or the earnestness of Christians in America, in prosecuting the work of the mission. It had an effect upon the youth of the schools, and served, with the exercises of the occasion, to bring a member of the first class in the English school to decide on casting in his lot with the people of God.

He came the next day to offer himself as a candidate for baptism. After putting him off for a few days, and finding that he was quite resolved, by the grace of God, to follow Christ, whatever of persecution might come, and that the relatives were likely to arouse themselves in opposition, I sent him on trial to Royapoorum, to be, in the first place, in the house of the catechist, Samuel Downer. This was breaking his caste. As the friends followed him there the next day, and gave indications that they would use force to remove him, he was conveyed by Mr. Scudder to the mission house, where he has been ever since. He seems decided and happy in his choice. We cannot as yet say whether he may have strength given him to persevere, but we commit him to the Lord in hope.

This event, with the more important one of five girls, in the Free Church schools of our Scotch brethren, leaving their friends and seeking the protection of the missionaries, near the close of last week, has alarmed the parents of the children in our schools, who have removed many of them, especially of the girls. Some may return, but nearly half are now scattered.

Miscellaneous.

Why so little Profit from Hearing Preaching.

There is a very short answer. Many people do not go to hear what God has to say to them by his servant, but to see and hear how well his servant delivers his message. They go away from the house of God, not to do what God has by his servant called them to, but to be pleased with and admire the preacher, or else dissatisfied with him, with scarce a thought of what God has required of them. How can it be possible that they could profit? They did not go to be profited by God. They went for their own gratification.

The fact is, that a very poor man and one very meanly clad, and with very little manners, and really nothing to recommend him in his appearance, may bring to your house an excellent piece of meat, or a very valuable treasure. Would you throw away or refuse to receive a diamond or precious pearl, because a poor chimney sweep had been the bearer of it? Again, would you refuse to take the road which led to your house, because the man that knew it, and offered to guide you, was an unpolished & mean looking beggar?

The children of this world are wiser in their generation, that is for the things of earth than of heaven. They can distinguish in worldly matter between the bearer and the treasures—but when they turn heavenward, Godward, they lose sight of heaven, of God, of eternal life, and the way to the kingdom, in looking at the servant or messenger—if he is a very pleasing, mannerly, eloquent, graceful servant, they will listen to him, but if he is not attractive by reason of his person, or manner of address, they think they have done enough if they have treated him civilly, or sat with becoming dignity in the house of God during his preaching.

This is what we would call admiring the bearer and forgetting the treasure. Honoring the dish, receiving the servant, refusing the master.

If you would be profited in hearing preaching, go to hear what God has to say by his servant to your soul, and we assure you that the poorest, meanest, weakest of all his servants, will say much more than you have heeded, than you will practice. You will hear what may save your soul if you will heed it, what will damn you in the day of judgment because you have not believed it. That preaching will be profitable, which leads us to heaven, and saves us from hell. If it does not profit you, who is at fault?

It is better to be laughed at, than ruined, better to have a wife, who cheapens everything, and buys nothing, than to be impoverished by one whose vanity will purchase everything but whose pride will cheapen nothing.

Proprieties of Public Worship.

An American who spent several Sabbaths in London, gives the following interesting statement of the manners and customs of the English, when engaged in worship.

1. When the people enter their pews, they at once engage, for one or two minutes, in silent prayer. Episcopalians knelt for the purpose, Dissenters bowed their heads against the front of the pew. This gave to the whole scene an air of solemnity, befitting the day and the place.

2. They have their pews as well supplied with Bibles as with hymn books; and when the scriptures were read from the pulpit, each hearer took a bible and followed the reader. And when the text was named, or, in the course of the sermon, a passage of scripture was cited, all would turn directly to the place, and observe, not only the passage, but the connection.

3. I saw many persons, mostly young, taking notes of the discourses, and therefore, giving a fixed attention, as if unwilling to lose a single thought.

4. The congregations were remarkably quiet and attentive. Preaching of moderate worth was listened to without any indications of restlessness or contempt.

5. When the benediction was concluded, the minister and people remained for half a minute in silence. Not a pew door was opened, not a hat, or glove taken, not a foot moved.

6. They were exceedingly moderate in leaving the house. In no instance did I see the aisles crowded. They seemed willing to wait for one another.

7. Gentlemen retired from the house of God as respectfully as from the house of a friend—they did not put on their hats until they reached the door.

8. After retiring from the sanctuary, gentlemen, as well as ladies, went home. The Post-office was closed, and no letters or papers were delivered on the Sabbath.

To the Dance--To the Dance.

Of what may a woman, entering the public assembly in all the charms of loveliness, so well remind us, as the victim of former times garlanded with flowers approaching the altar? Health which casts over that countenance so many beauteous hues, and which gives to that step so much elasticity and firmness, must suffer and be lost in such midnight revelries. To this the usual attire may greatly contribute, while it cannot be assumed without impairing the delicacy of its wearer; giving scope to the feelings of pride, and to the love of display, which is of vast importance to repress, and assisting to induce habits of extravagance at variance with honor and peace. Nor can it be denied that other emotions frequently have birth, of an order, if possible more exceptionable. Struggles for precedency, the exultation attendant on personal distinction, the proud consciouness of superiority in dress, in skill, or immediate association, the efforts at mortifying others, which frequently inflame the passions and violently agitate the whole frame, and betray a state of mind and of heart, which every lover of his species should strive to avert. Srange is the infatuation which conceals the fact that every departure from the appropriate sphere of moral principle makes way for others; and that the most fearful consequences may result from an aberration which seems inconsiderable. Still more so is it when it is not seen, that having proceeded far from the line of rectitude, the individual is in imminent danger of a lapse, which once would have been deemed impossible. Not unfrequently do the public journals describe to us some of the miseries of violated engagements, and heart-rending scenes of pollution and woe, which had never met the eye of the mind, had it not been for the vain imagination that a small part of what is manifestly evil may be good.—Weekly Messenger.

Thoughts and Maxims.

True poetry is not a mechanical art, but a life, taking the form and measure it does because no others are natural to it. What there is comely in it is a mystery, coming forth like the blossom of a flower, and the more beautiful the more nature there is in it.

The greatest treasure of the heart is its loving, as we are ever happier in what we feel than in what we excite.

Nothing is oftener falsified than truth, yet men admire only what resembles it, and even fiction can please only so far as it accords with it.

People who make a point of pleasing every body, seldom have a heart for any one. The love of self is the secret of their desire to please, and their temper is generally flashy and insincere.

They who employ their time in the improvement of the mind will be surest to escape all the disgusts of life. They will increase in the stores of a rational enjoyment, as they increase in years, and their old age will be relieved of half its burdens and of all its dullness.

Our good fortune is the cause of the consideration we gain with the public; our good qualities of that which we gain with friends.

Men of the greatest merit, and yet pretending to none, mostly die before the world will do them justice. The account it has with them is seldom ajusted and paid till they are beyond the reach of benefit from it. This, however, is a settlement a good man can afford to wait for and take the interest on his investment in the good he is doing.

He is well furnished for all conditions, whose resources in himself fail not; he is happy beyond all the experience of princes, who can always rely on himself for just and resolute action.

Wit, like the sun, is sometimes hid behind a cloud, yet like it, has a brightness in itself, and never re-appears but to be admired.

We conquer difficulties by daring to attempt them, and our cowardice makes most of the impossibilities we fear.

If you would know the depth of a man's capacity for contempt, sound it by the measure of his generosity, and you will find them equal.

H. H.

The Hour of Death.—It will afford sweeter happiness in the hour of death to have wiped one tear from the cheek of sorrow, than to have ruled an empire, conquered millions, or enslaved the world.

The engagements and possessions of this life are to us valuable precisely in that proportion in which they prepare, or conduce to prepare for another.—Meth. Prot.

Love may exist without jealousy, although this is love; but jealousy may exist without love, and this is common: for jealously can feed on that which is better no less than on that which is sweet, and is sustained by pride, as often as by affection.

CONFERENCE PROCEEDINGS.

Written for the Western Recorder.

Br. Bassett:—In the haste of leaving the seat of our Annual Conference, yesterday, I wholly forgot to procure from Br. J. Waite, the secretary, the statistics requisite for your Register and an extract of the Minutes for the Western Recorder. And if you are not supplied in season from some other source, I doubt not, a request for them, in the Recorder, of Br. Waite, at Greenville, Bond County, Illinois, will be promptly responded to by him. From defaced papers in my folio, I make out the subjoined list of appointments, which I believe to be correct. The session was a very interesting one; its close was marked with an overflow of fraternal affection, and religious joy, such as I have not before witnessed. The camp-meeting held in the immediate vicinity, at the same time, was a good one. Although no extraordinary revival attended it, yet were a goodly number of souls converted and added to the church. Both camp-meeting and Conference were sustained with a liberality that could not be excelled. The good friends of Bethel will long be gratefully remembered by the members who partook of their hospitality during these meetings. The very comfortable house in which the Conference was held, has been erected, mainly by the exertions and liberality of our lamented Br. Fox, whose widow (the sister of our deceased Br. Houghton, of Cincinnati,) with her family were on the ground, with their large tent, and liberal accommodation for the members that engaged their exceeding kindness. The next session of the Annual Conference, is to be held at the camp ground, near Springfield, commencing the 3rd Tuesday of August, 1848. The returns show a small numerical increase of membership in the district, and five effective brethren were added to the itinerancy. Very affectionately yours,

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 16, 1847.

WANTED,

Any number of New Subscribers for the "Western Recorder," to commence with Vol. Nine. The preachers and others friendly to the enterprise, are requested to procure as many as may be, against the closing of the present Volume. Provided, however, no names be sent us but such as can be relied upon as good.

☞ Will some of our friends inform the Secretary of the Illinois Conference that we are anxious to obtain, immediately, the statistics of the District; and will deem it a favor if he will communicate the same to us at once.

☞ Will Brother D. Bagley have the goodness to inform us the number of members, unstationed ministers and preachers, and meeting houses in the N. Illinois District?

☞ Letter No. five, from the Editor, is given this week, containing information which will be read with interest. From the same we have received a list of the appointments of Muskingum Conference. Since his letter was written he has been at home; but has gone again, to attend the Ohio Conference, now in session at Cincinnati.—During his stay, however, he was enabled to make out a list of monies received during his absence. If any letters have been sent us containing money, and acknowledged as received, in our list of letters, and the money not credited this week, we hope we will be notified as soon as practicable.

Correction.—In our estimate of the expenses of publishing the "Western Recorder," we erred. Instead of $2.50 per ream for paper, the Editor says $3,00 is the cash price; which will make the cost of paper per week, $9,00, instead of $7,50,—as stated last week. This difference in one year, would amount to $75,00. Also, instead of 150 for agents and exchange papers, there are 200; making another small item of $100. Deduct these from the $548, and we have left $373, with which to to pay house and office rent ($100 or more) and defray other indispensable expenses of a family. Tell us, "if tell ye can," where our profits are.

Our Return.

We left Youngstown, the day after the rise of the Muskingum Conference, in company with Br. C. Springer, who kindly agreed to bring us home in his buggy. We traversed an interesting portion of the Western Reserve, passing through Canfield, the county seat of the new county of Mahoning, and came in the evening to the dwelling of Br. W. Turner, formerly an itinerant, now an unstationed minister. Here we were soon joined by several other brethren from Conference, and spent the night very agreeably. On Wednesday, we travelled some 45 miles, through parts of Columbiana, Carroll, Stark and Tuscarawas Counties, and passing through not less than twelve villages. The roads, for the most part were delightful. Just as we left the village of Canal Dover, however, towards evening, we were overtaken by a heavy and driving rain, which abated not its intensity for five miles, till we reached the premises of old Br. Ross, the father of Br. Wm. Ross of the Muskingum Conference, who also accompanied us. We were sorry to find several of the two families confined by sickness to their beds. Yet we were kindly received and entertained.

An interesting and valuable circumstance, we must here record. Father Ross, who has almost completed his 80th year, manifested a special interest in the movement for the abolition of the use of tobacco, of which he had seen some account in our paper. He informed us that he commenced using the article when only twelve years of age, by the advice of some, who thought it would be beneficial in reference to a complaint to which he was disposed. He continued the habit for betwen 60 and 70 years, until last fall, when he determined to leave it off, being conscious that it had ever been more or less injurious to him. How many are there who excuse themselves, when the habit is confirmed, thinking it impracticable to overcome it, though they have not pursued it for one fourth as many years as father Ross. For almost a year past until now, he has remained firm in his purpose to use tobacco no more. And notwithstanding his advanced age, he is conscious of a decided improvement in his health. Does not this circumstance speak volumes in behalf of the cause of reform?

On Thursday, we travelled 30 miles to Coshocton, where we put up with J. Matthews, Esq., formerly member of Congress, and a friend and coadjutor of our travelling companion, Br. S., as an Orchardist and Horticulturist. We were kindly entertained by him and his interesting lady, and our friend S. was supplied with some new varieties of fruit grafts, in addition to his already extensive assortment. On Friday we resumed our way homewards. Came as far as Dresden, by noon time. Near to this place we rested a while and took refreshment, at the house of Mr. John Goodge, another Fruit man. We state with pleasure, that this gentleman has for sale a great variety of grafted fruit trees. He is quite successful also in the culture of the grape. We reached home, same afternoon, thankful to find all in usual health. We spend a very few days at home to attend to necessary duties and business, and shall then, if Providence permit, take leave for another short absence, to attend the session of the Ohio Conference, at Cincinnati. The interests of our paper, as well as the interest we feel in church affairs, requires that we take a little time once a year to attend the session of the most contiguous of our Annual Conferences. If spared, we shall endeavor to speed our return, to enter upon the duties and labors of a new volume of our periodical. Meanwhile, our friend, the printer, will render faithful attention, during our absence, to the interests of the Western Recorder.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR.

NO. V.

Youngstown, Mahoning O., Sept. 7th, 1847.

On the night before we reached Youngstown, a robbery was commited in the village. The Collector's office for the Ohio and Pennsylvania Canal, was forcibly entered by two villains, disguised and armed with deadly weapons. Mr. N. Latham, was asleep in the office, and on being suddenly awakened, found himself a prisoner, with no chance of resistance. One of the robbers kept guard over him, whilst the other pillaged the office of all the money and other valuables he could find. About $150, in cash was taken. They then bound Mr. L., hand and foot, gagged him, bade him good night, and retired, shutting the door after them. In about an hour after Mr. L. succeeded in escaping from his confinement, and gave the alarm, though too late to find any trace of the robbers. Mr. S. B. M'Ewen is collector, and usually lodges in the office, but on the night of the above transactions, he was ill, and got Mr. L. to take charge of the office. Up to the time we left Youngstown, no discovery had been made, who had committed the burglary and robbery.

On Wednesday night (second night after robbery) between 9 and 10 o'clock, a valuable barn belonging to Mr. Wm. Rice, adjoining the village, took fire, and was entirely consumed, with its contents, including much grain and hay, and five carriages, three of which belonged to Mr. R., and two (buggies) to members of Conference, viz. Brs. W. Ross, and H. L. Gray. Mr. Rice is an elder of the Presbyterian Church, and very cheerfully took part in entertaining members of the Conference. We regret his loss. No clue has been found to the cause of the fire, as none had been taken to the barn, by any one having a right to do so. By great exertions, the horses were barely saved from perishing in the flames. Next morning, the loss of the two brethren was stated in Conference by Br. Springer, who moved that a contribution be taken up at once, which was agreed to. About $60, was contributed by members of Conference and others present, towards indemnifying the brethren. A committee of citizens also waited upon the villagers, and received liberal assistance for the brethren. By the time the Conference concluded its session, the two brethren found themselves refitted with buggies, and their losses nearly or quite made up, so that they were ready without detainure to return to their homes. This act of liberality, is highly creditable to the citizens of Youngstown, as well as to those in attendance at the Conference.

On Saturday, Rev. Mr. Boardman, the excellent pastor of the Presbyterian Church, (at whose house we were kindly entertained during the session,) gave the Conference an invitation to attend at his church on Sabbath afternoon, and participate in the celebration of the Supper of the Lord. The Conference was also permitted to fix the hour. Of course, the invitation was as cordially accepted as it was given. A large proportion of the members, (all we presume who conveniently could,) attended at the appointed hour. A most precious season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord was enjoyed. The exercises were interesting, solemn and impressive. The children of the Lord, without distinction of denomination, truly sat together, in heavenly places in Christ. It was a season long to be remembered. Some of the Methodist brethren, otherwheres lively and vociferous in their exercises, we presume would have rejoiced in the Lord, not only with heart and soul, but with voice also, but for an apprehension that it would infringe upon the order of a sister church. Yet even this we doubt not, would have been indulged by a minister and people, so Christian and so liberal. May Heaven speed the cause of christian union.

The Muskingum Conference closed its session on Monday evening, having occupied but six days, including the Sabbath. The session was one of uninterrupted harmony, as we believe, and its business was disposed of to general satisfaction. We did regret to see that the interests of the Aid Society were not more generally sustained—that many of the members did not contribute to its funds. But it seemed that some misunderstanding existed in reference to the provisions of the chartered association, which formed their excuse. We trust that full satisfactory explanations will soon be given. Certainly every brother should contribute towards this important fund, and strive to promote its interests. We were gratified to observe the decided advance of the anti-tobacco principle amongst the members of the Conference. The number of those who use the weed, is evidently diminishing, whilst those who still adhere to the use of it, are more moderate, and reserved as we believe in the use of it. Indeed, we are not aware that we saw more than one member engaged in smoking, during the entire session, and he was so exceedingly modest and polite, in the cause, that we could almost excuse him.

The next session of the Conference, is to be held at Cambridge, Guernsey County, Ohio, commencing, second Wednesday in Sept. 1848.

A. H. B.

Rev. James Gay, of the Michigan Conference, in a private letter dated August 23d, 1847, writes as follows:

"Through the blessing of a kind and merciful Providence, not a single member of the Conference since its organization, has fallen in death, until this year. But now the voice of two of our beloved ministers, has been closed in death, and their places will be vacant in the approaching Conference. Their names are Owen Gregory and J. D. Williams. The latter was formerly from the Muskingum Conference, and joined with us at the Conference in poor health, and only lived to labor in the field for a few months."

Temperance.—We are highly gratified to learn that the Board of Health of the city of Philadelphia, has resolved to dispense with the use of wine and brandy at its future meetings.

Address.—An address was delivered by the Hon. Bellamy Storer, in the Hall of the Sons of Temperance, in Zanesville, on Friday evening last. We had not the pleasure of being present, but from what we have heard, it was an address, in every way worthy the character of the man.

Columbian Magazine.—The September number of this elegant work is received. It has three interesting engravings,—Moses Going to the Fair, Wigwam in the Forest, September Fashions and Original Music. Numerous talented writers, are among its contributors. Ormsby and Hackett, publishers, New York. Terms, $3 per annum.

Dont Forget.—Those who are indebted for the Western Recorder, will greatly oblige us, by paying up before the close of the present volume. It will be a convenient opportunity to send by the preachers or delegates to the approaching Conferences. We need to receive, about this time, several hundred dollars, to enable us to meet claims against us which have grown out of our publishing enterprise. Dont forget. We shall have to discontinue many at the close of vol. viii, if they do not pay up.

A Great Dependance is also placed in the liberality of those true friends of the paper, who pursue the good old custom of paying in advance. From them we trust we shall have some essential aid in entering upon our next volume. Read the next paragraph.

Annual Register, M. P. Church, 1848.—This little publication, so much demanded by the Church, is now in press, and will be issued at an earlier date than heretofore. An edition of 6000 copies of the first half of the pamphlet, including the Calendar. is already worked off from the press. And we only wait to obtain the statistics of the several Annual Conferences to be held within a few weeks, when we expect to make up the remaining part of the publication. Every subscriber for the Western Recorder who pays $2 in advance for vol. 9, shall have a copy of the Register sent him by mail, so soon as it is issued.

Information Wanted—Statistics of Conferences.—We are about publishing the Annual Register of the M. P. Church, for the year 1848, and are anxious to obtain, in view of this publication, the statistics of those Annual Conferences which have not published their Minutes in full. We desire to have the name of the President of each Conference, the number of Stations, Circuits, Missions, Itinerant ministers and preachers, Unstationed ministers and preachers, Members, and houses of worship in each District. Also, the time and place of the next session of each Annual Conference. If the secretaries, or any other having the information, will communicate it to us without delay, we shall be greatly obliged, and will be pleased to reciprocate the favor in any possible way.

LETTER FROM OREGON.

[The following from our old friend Rev. E. E. Parish, formerly of this vicinity, will be read with interest by all.]

Br. Bassett: You will see by this that we are yet in the land of the living, though far removed from the place of our first acquaintance with you. The pleasant Ohio, with its many advantages and comforts, &c., is yet fresh in our memory. The precious brethren in the ministry, and the very endearing membership, will be, by us, not soon forgotten. A friend of ours, of the last years' immigration, brought us a bundle of the Western Recorder: it is to us a pearl of great price.—Among the many items of news, that of the prosperity of the Methodist Protestant Church, affords to us far the most pleasure. Oh! that the good Lord may still continue to roll on the tide of her prosperity, until she brings great glory to God and immortal happiness to man. She has already been instrumental in landing many in the blest world of rest—even that rest that remains for the people of God,—among whom is to be found the justly celebrated Sneathen, the father of Lay Representation, and faithful minister of Christ's Holy Religion. Is he gone? Yes! Man gooth to his long home and mourners go about the streets. Yes, Brother Bassett, the habiliments of mourning for father Sneathen, are not only found in the United States, but in Oregon, also. The tidings of the death of this precious saint and minister of Jesus Christ, was felt very sensibly, and will not be soon forgotten. Now, my dear Brother Bassett, I want to say a word about the Methodist Protestant Church in Oregon. I arrived with my family in this country, in the year of our Lord, A. D. 1844, with a few other names as Methodist Protestants, whom I think have not defiled their garments. I am the only preacher or minister of this order that has ever yet come here. A worthy old brother by the name of Drinkwater, started for Oregon, but he died on the east side of the Missouri river. I have been so circumstanced that I have done little, very little, indeed. The first year passed away while I was fixing a place for my family. During the second year I labored some more extensively; and on the—day of ——, we commenced a protracted meeting on the Recreall creek. It was protracted about ten days, and resulted in a glorious work of religion, which revived and extended until it was marvellous in our eyes. Oh, to God be all the glory given. At the close we baptised one man, by immersion, and formed a small church. One preacher, by the name of John D. Boone, of the Missionary Baptist, labored with us during the meeting, and has since joined with us.—so we are not alone. Another Missionary Baptist, a student of the Granville College, in Ohio, has also joined with us. He is a young man of deep piety, and much promise; and we expect to license him to exhort, in a week from to-morrow; at which time we expect to organize a Quarterly Conference. We shall have as members, 2 Ministers, 2 Class-leaders, 1 exhorter, and 6 Trustees, whom we have chosen as a building committee, for the purpose of selecting a suitable site for a Meeting-house for the Methodist Protestant Church, and for the purpose of building and holding said house in trust for the use intended. We have two small classes, numbering in all, over twenty members; and there are others not embraced in these two classes, whom we hope to enrol as soon as is convenient. We have more calls to preach than we can attend. I have been attending four places, one for each Sunday: this is about all I have been able to do. We are expecting our beloved Brother, Jesse Gilliam, Minister from Missouri, this year, with a large band of Protestant Methodists; and we are also looking for some from Ohio; and we wish that the Conferences would encourage Ministers to come to Oregon, but not as Missionaries. The Methodist Episcopal Church has put a finishing stroke to Missions. A Missionary needs only to be named to be hated. We would not have the name Missionary attached to us for any consideration, under existing circumstances. We could give particulars, but we do not like the practice of talking about our neighbors. If some of our Ministers, the young and strong men in Israel, would come over, it would doubtless be a good thing for them. They might become the owners of some of these beautiful farms in one of these verry fertile valleys, and assist in planting the standard of Christian liberty, and spreading the gospel of the Redeemer in this, the most delightful of all climes on earth. The country is good, healthy, and productive, almost beyond description. But it may be you will cry out, "hold on, you are mistaken." No Sir, I am not; I am living in Oregon, and have farmed its soil for two years. The year 1845 was as good a season throughout, as is common in Ohio: moderate rains were frequent through the whole of the season of the growth of vegetation. My garden was one of the best that I ever had in any country. The year '46 was more dry; but, sir, I planted tobacco on the 4th of July, at which time we had a fine rain. My tobacco made itself in good season—got perfectly ripe. I topped it at from 14 to 16 leaves high. My turnips in '45, ranged in weight, from 8 to 22 pounds each. In the year '46, which was last year, I weighed one turnip, the weight of which was 28 pounds when topped and cleaned. This year I weighed one Rutabaga turnip, which weighed 21 pounds: I also weighed one beet after it was topped, and it weighed 13¾ pounds. Carrots, parsnips, radishes, melons, cucumbers, and in fact, every thing that I have tried, succeeds well. I planted my corn last year at different times, up to as late as the 26th of May, and it grew well and got perfectly ripe. I do not know how much we can raise to the acre, but I know that if we try we can raise plenty of corn, and that as good as I want. But, sir, when you come to talk about wheat, then we have the decided advantage over Ohio. Now, my dear Brother Bassett, you may, if you please, publish this over my proper name, for I know I tell the truth,—the piece in the Recorder which you took from the Zanesville Gazette, to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. Greenough has published some truth; but, alas for him, it was guess-work, and did not hit right by half or more! I live in Oregon, and could be better able to go back than I was to come to this country if I wished to go; but I am perfectly satisfied, and have been ever since I came here: and will not when I find the country more than as good again as I expected. This country wants no eulogising, and I will not attempt it. Brother Bassett, I wish if any of our people come to this country, that they may bring hymn books, disciplines, Sneathen on Lay Representation, Evans' Brief View, and as many of the old Western Recorders as they can, for we esteem them almost as apples of gold set in pictures of silver. Now, dear friends, if you will send me a bundle of your old papers each year, I will promise you a fine mess of salmon whenever you call on me for them. Take notice when I stated above, that I planted tobacco on the 4th of July, I did not mean that we had no other season suitable to plant, for we had previously planted, and at different times. A word on prices and we have done. We have been much imposed upon by the merchants, but we are looking for better times. Wheat is now bringing One Dollar in specie per bushel, at the granary of the farmer. Beef and pork are both high and bring cash-up. I believe beef is from 4½ to 6 cents per pound. Pork 10 cents, &c.

Yours, E. E. PARISH.

Supposed Murder.—A telegraphic dispatch states that at Reading, Pa., on Thursday evening, the body of a man was found in the Schuylkill at the lower end of the city, enveloped in female apparel, consisting of two dresses—one of which was tied over his feet and the other over his head, and filled with stones. His head was shockingly mutilated.—He is supposed to have been murdered—person unknown.

Reply to Brother James Gay.

Mr. Editor: In looking over the columns of your excellent paper, the Western Recorder, I find there a correspondence from one of the Corresponding Committee of the Michigan Annual Conference. Please let a few lines in answer to Brother Gay's position, find a place in your columns.

1st. Our Brother wants an immediate emancipation from the devil, and all slavery, whether in or out of the church. As it regards our relation to slavery, we are truly sorry that there are any amongst us; but they are here, and what are we to do with them? Why, our Brother Gay says, emancipate them immediately, both from the Church and State.

1st. I ask my Brother, what injury the North receives from our connection with slavery, where they have it not in their power to abolish that relation? If you have a good will, and seeing that you cannot effect this great object, the Lord will take the will for the deed, as in the case of Father Abraham, in offering up his son Isaac.

2d. I ask my Brother, what injury the mere relation to slavery does us as a Church? Does the evil of slavery rest on that relation? I answer, no. For example: Here are two slaveholders, living side by side, and they both own slaves. One of them is converted to Christianity; he treats his slaves well, clothes and feeds them well. The other one is an unbeliever in religion, he treats his slaves like a savage, in laying the whip on their backs, and neither feeds nor clothes them. Now, Brother, here you plainly see that it is not the relation that we sustain to slavery, that makes the sin, but a bad heart taking advantage of that relation. Another example: Here are two married men, I mean both having wives, one treats his wife well, and provides every necessary to make her happy. The other abuses his wife and drives her from her home, if we may call it a home.

Now, Brother, which makes the sin, the holy institution of matrimony, which has God for its author, or the bad heart of the husband? Now, sir, because there is an evil growing out of this relation of holy wedlock, we must immediately abolish this institution of marriage. Now, we believe our Brother would go against this both teeth and toe-nail, especially if he is single and wants a wife right badly; but never done hollowing—Wo! wo! to the South, because of their connection with Slavery.

3d. I ask you, sir, what advantage has the Methodist Episcopal Church received from a division into a Northern and a Southern General Conference? I may safely ask what injury has it done? Why, sir, it has done this: It has dissolved all friendly intercourse with each other in their pulpits, love-feasts, and class-meetings; and while the Northern Church is decreasing by its hundreds of thousands, and not only this, but if a Brother or Sister adhere South, the North Church reads them out at the next Quarterly-meeting, and also meddles with our civil government, and is now shaking these United States from centre to circumference. Now, sir, is this what you want to take place in the Methodist Protestant Church?

4th. In conclusion, we ask you Brother, what you mean by immediate emancipation, that you will go and purchase a colony where we may send them to? or do you mean amalgamation, that is, admitting them to all the privileges of the white population, in marriage particularly? Or, if neither of these, then liberate them amongst us? This would make things worse. For instance: Just look at this African race,—how deplorable their condition, where there are all kinds of outrages committed! How widely different here! Our colored race are taught to read and pray and preach God's word.

Now, my dear Brother, in conclusion, let me exhort you to quit scattering fire-brands through our Church; but pray and get your soul full of religion, and by the light of the Holy Spirit, cast the beam out of thine eye, and help us to get precious souls to heaven.

Yours, as ever, in the bonds of love,

A VIRGINIAN.

Letter from Rev. J. R. Williams.

Mr. Editor: In a late number of the Western Recorder, you announced it to be my determination to publish my old manuscript Review of Rev. Alexander McCaine's "defence of slavery," in your coming volume. You must have misunderstood my intention. I had not positively decided to do so, and did not, therefore, write you to announce it in your paper. You requested me at our late General Conference to send the Review to you for publication, but I declined. What I desired to know of you, in my late letter, was, whether you were still willing to publish, if I should decide on sending the manuscripts.—Mistaking my meaning, you reported it as forthcoming.

My original design in writing the Review, was, as I then declared, not to screen abolitionists from the merited censures of the author of the defence, nor to disturb the Church or the State by further agitation of the subject of slavery, neither to provoke a controversy with Brother McCain, but to rescue certain passages of scriptures pressed by him into his service, and to refute his assertion, that "Slavery is sanctioned by Almighty God." The train of reasoning employed for this purpose, evolves principles and consequences, the publication of which, might, in a slave State, expose me to prosecution. Previously, therefore, in publishing my manuscript Review, I had determined to submit certain parts of it to a legal friend, and be governed by his opinion. If, therefore, this article does not reach you, it will be in consequence of a determination on my part to let it repose a while longer. There need be no regrets on such decision, as the subject has been discussed by much abler pens.

Very Respectfully,

JAMES R. WILLIAMS.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

From the Zanesville Daily Courier, Sept. 13.

IMPORTANT FROM MEXICO.

Gen. Scotts advance on the Capital—Two battles with the enemy—Entrance into Mexico—Suspension of hostilities—The enemy suing for peace.

At half past ten o'clock, last night, just as we were putting to press the regular edition of our paper, we commenced receiving the following important, gratifying and glorious intelligence, from our army, under the gallant Scott, despatched for us, on the Lightning Line, by our indefatigable correspondent at Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 10, 10½ o'clock P. M.

The Public Ledger, of this city, has received, by special Express, a copy of the New Orleans Picayune, dated the 3d inst., which brings news of the arrival of the steamer Fashion, from Vera Cruz, with dates to the 27th ult. The steamer also touched at Tampico on the 29th ult.

Our gallant army has not only marched up to the gates of Mexico, but has had TWO engagements with the enemy, under the walls of the Metropolis, and, in each encounter, has visited signal defeat upon the foe.

The Mexicans have been brought to supplicate for a suspension of hostilities, which was GRANTED by Gen. Scott.

The Mexican Congress has been convened to take into consideration the propositions of our Government, made through Mr. Trist.

This news was received at Vera Cruz on the evening of the 26th of August last, by an express carrier from the city of Orizaba.

The Courier brought down the following letter to Mr. Dimond, the U. S. Collector, at the Port of Vera Cruz.

ORIZABA, August 25, 1847.

DEAR SIR—The mail from Mexico has just arrived, and it brings the following intelligence which to Mr. Dimond, which I gather from the "Diario Official del Gobierno." ["The official Journal of the Government."]

On the twentieth instant the two brigades of the enemy, commanded by Generals Santa Anna and Valencia, marched out of the city to give battle to our Army near San Angel.

Valencia's division was completely defeated, and Santa Anna, after the first encounter fell back also in great disorder through the city.

The enemy, immediately after this, asked for a suspension of hostilities, and signified their willingness to receive the propositions for peace from Mr. Trist.

On the next day, the 21st, the Minister of Foreign Relations, published in the Mexican newspapers, a call for Congress to convene for the purpose of considering them.

These are the great facts which, no doubt, will bring PEACE in their train.

Another express also arrived at Vera Cruz from Mexico, on the same day, the 26th, with letters containing substantially the same news. The same express also brought the "Diario de Gobierno," containing the announcement of these facts.

From the Zanesville Daily Courier, Sept. 14.

LATER.

Troops detached from Taylor's Command to Vera Cruz—Safety of Baylor and his Men—The Ohio Boys bound for Mexico.

PETERSBURGH, September 13, 3 P. M.

By the arrival of the steamer Telegraph, at New Orleans, from the Brazos, we have dates to the 1st inst.

In pursuance of instructions from the War Department, General Taylor has ordered the Ohio and Indiana regiments, commanded by Lane, the 13th regiment of Regulars, the Massachusetts regiments of Cushing and Capt. Dean's battery of artillery, to Brazos Island, where they were immediately to embark for Vera Cruz.

General Taylor retains, on his line between Brazos and Buena Vista, 5 568 men.

Letters from Ceralvo state that Baylor and his detachment, who were supposed to be cut off, are safe. They were captured by the Mexicans and retaken by the Americans near Ceralvo.

Several deaths, by yellow fever, had occurred at the Brazos.

Capt. J. B. Butler arrived at Camargo on the 18th ult., and was ordered to advance to Mier.

The yellow fever is still raging at New Orleans.

Still Later.---Official Despatches.

News fully confirmed—Bloody Battle—Heavy Loss—The Armistice—Valencia Escaped—Pronunciamento against Peace.!!!

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14, 9, P. M.

The Government despatches, from General Scott, have, this moment, been received, by express, and the news heretofore received is fully confirmed.

On the 20th the American forces, consisting of 7000 men, met the enemy at Charbusco, 3 or 4 miles from the Capital. The Mexican Army was 22,000 strong, and entrenched behind an immense battery of heavy artillery. After two hours of bloody conflict, our gallant troops swept over everything, which offered resistance, mainly at the point of the bayonet.

The American loss was less than 1000—the Mexican loss 5000, among whom were a number of distinguished men, generals and civilians.

The Armistice was agreed upon, and Five Commissioners were appointed on the Mexican side, at the head of whom was Herrera. They held two meetings, and were to hold a third on Monday the 30th.

Valencia escaped to Tobuca, with two companions, and there "pronounced" against Santa Anna and peace.

MONTGOMERY'S NEWLY-IVENTED STEAM BOILER.—We are indebted to the patentee for a copy of letters and certificates approving the newly invented steam boiler, patented by Jas. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tennessee. The advantages which Mr. M. expects to realize by his improvement are as follows: 1. The reducing the quantity, and consequently the weight of water used in the boiler. 2. Prevention of explosion. 3. The saving of at least one third of the fuel. 4. The saving of one half the space usually occupied by the best class of locomotives. The advantage to sea steamers resulting from the two last improvements will be readily understood and estimated by engineers and all persons who have turned their attention to the subject. The testimony of Professor James Renwick, of Columbia College, William Burden, steam engine manufacturer, of Brooklyn, E. K. Collins, and others, is given in its favor. Professor Renwick does not hesitate to express the opinion that this boiler, "if properly set and guarded from any tampering must completely counteract the danger with which the use of steam is now liable; and, in addition, it promises, from the manner of its action, to render the duration of our boilers almost indefinite." Mr. Burden says, "it will make more steam with less fuel than any other boiler now in use."—Hunt's Mer. Mag.

Population of the World.

Nine hundred and sixty millions of human beings are supposed to be on the earth; of which

Europe is said to contain	153,000,000
Africa,	156,000,000
Asia,	500,000,000
America,	150,000,000

From extensive calculation it seems the average of human births per second, since the birth of Christ to this time, is about 815—which gives about thirty-two thousand millions; and after deducting the present supposed population of the world, (960,000,000) leaves the number of thirty one thousand and forty millions, that have gone down to the grave, giving death and the grave the victory over the living, to the number of thirty thousand and eighty millions.

Of this number in the grave, about 9,000,000,000 have died by war.
7,000,000,000 by famine and pestilence.
5,000,000,000 by martyrdom.
589,000,000 by intoxicating drinks.
15,000,000,000 natural or otherwise.

ACCIDENT ON THE PORTAGE RAIL ROAD.—The Hollidaysburgh papers give the particulars of two accidents on the Rail Road last week. One on Saturday last, by which a man by the name of Wm. Morgan was caught between two trucks, and instantly killed. On Tuesday a section boat, named Saml L. Funk, from Harrisburgh, came in contact with a train of cars belonging to the Pennsylvania and Ohio line, smashing two or three of them to atoms, and wrecking considerably, three more. One passenger, Andrew Cassidy, from Baltimore, had his hand smashed. The other passengers escaped injury.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.—A young woman by the name of Rathbun, attempted to kill herself, yesterday, by jumping from the Monongahela Bridge. She was rescued before life was extinct. The circumstances which drove her to this rash attempt are particularly sad. She was not seventeen years of age. She had been seduced under a promise of marriage, and driven to despair by the repeated failure of her seducer to comply with his promises, the poor girl sought to end her life and suffering by suicide. The young man, we are informed, had been paying his addresses to her for the last year and a half. This is the third attempt she has made to destroy her own life.—Pitts. Journal.

THE WRONG MAN HUNG.—A young printer named Boyington, who served his time in the office of the New Haven Palladium, was hung a few years since in Alabama, upon a charge of having murdered a companion with whom he was travelling. He protested his innocence to the last; but without avail. Recently the landlord in whose house the murder was committed, confessed the crime on his death bed! Boyington was a young man of fine talents and prepossing appearance, whose guilt was deemed conclusive only from the fact that he was the last person seen with the murdered man.

HORRIBLE AFFAIR.—We learned yesterday that Coroner Richardson had been called on to attend an inquest on the dead body of a woman in Mifflin township, who had been thrown into the fire and burned to death by her step daughter. We could not learn names or particulars further than that the affair occurred last Saturday.

P. S. Since writing the above we learn that the name of the parties is Morrison. The girl's name is Sarah, and she threw her step mother in the fire and kept her there until she was dead.—The coroner's jury returned a verdict in accordance with these facts. The girl Sarah, who is stated to be insane, was last night committed to jail.—Pitts. Jour.

POST-OFFICE ROBBED.—The Northampton (Mass.) post-office was entered on Wednesday night last through a back window, and the office and two mail bags rifled of all the letters. Among the letters stolen there were but two containing remittances, namely: one containing $79 in bills of the Northampton Bank, of the denominations of $50, $20, $5, $3, $1; and one containing a draft for $110, drawn on the 1st day of Sept. inst., by the Northampton Bank, on the American Exchange Bank, N. Y. About three or four hundred letters were taken.

SERIOUS AFFAIR.—Great Excitement.—Judge Bayly, member of Congress from the Accomac district, in Virginia, arrived here on Saturday, and put up at the City Hotel. The reason of his departure from home is thus explained in the Norfolk Beacon, of Friday:—Pitts. Journal.

We learn that a fight occurred at Drummond Town, Accomac county, on Monday last, between Judge Bayly, member of Congress, and Mr. Finney, one of the Representatives of the county, growing out of the late division of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which Mr. Finney was shot in the thigh by the Judge. The excitement is said to be intense, so much so, that the Judge, who it is said was imprisoned in the Jail a part of Monday, has been compelled to leave the county, and accordingly took passage in the boat for Baltimore. Some idea may be formed of the excitement pervading the county on this subject, when we inform the reader that one of the Magistrates of the county went on the Bench on Monday last, armed with a pair of revolvers and Bowie-knife.

The Bellefontaine Whig says that Mary, an interesting little girl, aged 9 years, a daughter of Mr. Amos Farbour, of Spring township, met death in one of his most frightful aspects, on the first inst., under the following circumstances.—She had been left to take care of a younger child while her mother was milking the cows, and while pouring some water from the tea-kettle, her dress took fire. She ran to her parents, both of whom were near the house, who immediately tore the remaining parts of clothing from her person, but she was so dreadfully burnt that she died in the afternoon of the same day, nine hours after the accident took place.

On Friday last, the body of a pedlar, a stranger and whose name is unknown, was found at Steubenville. He had been missing for some days, and was last seen walking with one William Birch, who absconded from Steubenville the day the body was found. He is the suspected murderer. Money and other articles belonging to the deceased, have been traced to the fugitive. Birch left a wife and family at Steubenville. Some money was known to be in possession of the pedlar. His throat was cut by an instrument supposed to be a knife. Birch is a man about five feet nine inches in highth, sandy hair, and red complexion; a blacksmith by trade, and about 20 three years of age.

FORGERY.—J. M. Snyder, John Divine, & Dr. Sharp, were tried, at the term of the Common Pleas, in Tuscarawas county, and found guilty of forging the will of Margaret Divine, wife of one of them, making disposition of her separate property.

The trial lasted eight days, and one hundred and seventy witnesses were in attendance. The jury were out twenty-four hours before agreeing upon their verdict. A new trial was moved, but the Advocate does not state the result of the motion.—Zanesville Courier.

Immigration.

The following table shows the number of immigrants at the port of New York, in the year 1847 and in the preceding year:

	Year ending July 31, 1846.	1847.
British ports,	54.226	88,733
French ports,	15,632	26,779
Hanse Towns (Bremen and Hamburg,)	12,887	15.525
Belgium	4,303	13,128
Holland	2,430	5.077
Sweden and Norway,	1,133	2,021
Prussia,	118	274
Spain,	13	1
Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia,	204	114
All other ports,	334	465
	91.280	152,116

The census of 1850 will doubtless show an increase of our population per cent, for the current decade, much beyond the average rate per cent. increase in preceding years.

DISASTROUS FIRE.—We learn from the Cleveland Herald, that S. R. Hutchinson's extensive stone Flouring Mills took fire on the 8th inst, and the flames were not extinguished. Every part of the Mill was so thoroughly wet, that the damage to machinery, grain, flour, &c., was great. Some 3000 bushels of wheat, and 200 or 300 barrels of flour, were greatly damaged. Insurance $15,000. $4,000 will probably cover the loss.

WORSE AND WORSE.—The mortality among the immigrants at Quebec and Montreal, is truly appalling It seems to be on the increase, instead of diminishing. The deaths at Grosse Isle on the 13th, up to ten o'clock A. M., was 81! Inmates of the hospital, 2,208. At Charles Point Hospital, near Montreal, on the 16th, 32. Number of sick, 1,237.

HORRIBLE.—At New York on Friday, a man named Hugh Donohue, was arrested by officer Smith, of the 3d district police, under the following circumstances:—It appears that a boy named Dennis Mulheam, went to the house of Donohue, in Mulbury street, between Prince and Spring street, when he was picked up by Donohue, who pretended that he was going to plunge him into a pot of boiling pitch. The boy became frightened and reached out his arms, both of which were emmersed to the elbows in the boiling pitch, injuring him so severely that it is supposed he will never again have the use of his arms. Donohue was held to bail in the sum of $500 to answer.

DISTRESSING OCCURRENCE.—Another was added to the many instances of death lately from indiscretion in the use of medicines, at Georgetown, D. C., on Friday last. An old and pious colored woman, belonging to a Mrs. Ellis, feeling unwell, in the absence of her mistress, took what she supposed to be magnesia, but which was, in reality, ratsbane, given to her, amongst other drugs, some time since, by a friend. Mrs. Ellis coming in not long afterwards, and the old woman complaining of great and increasing sickness, she was led to examine the wrapper, and immediately detected the poison. Mrs. Ellis was also aware that there had been no magnesia in the house. The old woman was forthwith advised of her impending fate, and prepared to meet it. She soon after expired.

A Sad Story.

The following sad account of the horrors of the ship fever is given in a late number of the Kingston (Canada,) Chronicle. Doubtless there are hundreds of similar cases which never will be chronicled. The famine in the Old World was terrible, but the ship fever which followed like a death-shadow the footsteps of so many of those who sought for refuge on this side of the Atlantic, has in many cases been still more appalling. Husband and wife, parent and child are among the victims, and thousands who left the old country with tears in their eyes and hope in their hearts, only reached the new land of promise in time to find a grave.

"A short time since a fine intelligent English lad about 14 years of age, was brought by an inhabitant of this city to the Secretary of the Board of Health, accompanied by seven brothers and sisters. He stated his name to be Hall, that he had left his father, whose name was Robison Hall, and mother sick of the ship fever at the Quarantine Hospital at Grosse Isle, No. 1, Tent Hospital—that his father had supplied him with £5 to enable him with his little charge to reach an uncle who resides in Pickering, near Toronto. He further stated that every farthing was expended, and he did not know how to get on to his place of destination. If this had been all the difficulty the poor boy had to encounter, it was soon surmounted by the Emigrant Agent here immediately granting a free passage for the whole of them; unfortunately the contagion of the fever was lurking in the veins of all but one of their family, and which the next day displayed itself by taking down three out of the eight, who were immediately sent to the hospital here. On arriving at Toronto the lad himself, with three others, were attacked with the same disease, and only one reached the destined abode of the uncle. One of the three left in Kingston is dead, and a second it is believed cannot survive, the third will be fowarded to the uncle as soon as he is able to go; the cases of the three in Toronto are said to be very doubtful. The parents were respectable people, and had with them about £50 in money, with which they intended occupying some land which the uncle had engaged for them near his own residence. Out of a family of ten, one only has reached the place to which they were all looking as to the abode of competence and happiness. The Secretary of the Board wrote to the Medical officer at Grosse Isle, intreating him to inform him if the parents were living or dead, and to save the little money and other effects for the poor children; to which no answer has been received, doubtless from the numerous calls of a like nature made upon his time."

GRATUITOUS ADVERTISING.—Under this head the Boston Courier remarks that "there are continual calls upon the newspaper to express the gratitude of people for acts which are thought deserving of particular notice; but we seldom or never hear of thanks to the publishers of newspapers, who are always giving their money and their time for the benefit of public and private charities. This corresponds with the experience of every publisher in the country, so far as we have been able to observe. Nothing can be more erroneous than the prevailing impression that editors and publishers of newspapers receive, without rendering an equivalent, certain little courtesies, which by common consent, are extended to gentlemen connected with the press. They pay double price, and more too, for every civility tendered them by the proprietors of lines of travel, places of public amusement, &c. The actual cost to us of gratuitous advertising inserted in various forms, in the course of a year, would supply a small family with the necessaries of life. We correct a misconception which has generally obtained, that people of the press are the recipients of large favors, for which they make no return.—Buffalo Express.

Regulations

Of the Seventeenth Exhibition of American Manufactures, to be held in the City of Philadelphia, from the 19th to the 30th day of October, 1847, inclusive.

1. The exhibition rooms will be prepared for the reception of goods, on Friday, the 15th of October, and opened for the admission of visiters on Tuesday, the 19th of October, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

2. No goods deposited after Monday evening, October 17th, can be entered on the judges' list for competition or premium.

3. To insure a perfect impartiality, the managers of the Institute, the committee on Exhibitions, and all firms or partnerships in which a Manager, or a Member of the Committee on Exhibitions, is interested, shall be excluded from competition; and the judges will be exclusively selected from persons practically acquainted with the several branches of Manufactures on which they shall be appointed, but who are neither depositors of such manufactures themselves, nor in any way interested in the articles submitted to their examination.

4. Awards will not be confined to specimens prepared expressly for exhibition, but regard will be had to the prices and quality of the articles, compared with the same description of foreign goods, and with specimens presented at former exhibitions, and no premium shall be awarded for an article that has received one at any former exhibition of the Institute.

5. Proof of origin must be furnished, if required, for every specimen offered for exhibition.

6. All articles deposited must be accompanied by an invoice, stating the name and residence of the maker and depositor and it is particularly requested that labels may be attached, bearing the name of the maker—in default of which, articles have sometimes failed to receive any award by the judges. It is also desirable that the names of articles should be marked upon them, and those intended for sale, should be marked with their prices, and the places where they can be obtained.

7. Arrangement will be made to exhibit to advantage any working models or machinery that may be sent in for exhibition, and contributions in this branch are respectfully invited. Experience has shown the interest which the public take in them; and that the display is calculated to convey useful information. A careful and competent superintendent will be provided.

8. The mornings of each day, untill fifteen minutes before ten o'clock, shall be appropriated to the judges.

9. Neither owners nor depositors of goods will be admitted to the exhibition room during the time appropriated to the judges, except at the special request of the judges of the articles owned or deposited by them.

A FALLEN YOUTH.—One day last week, the sheriff of Washington county, Pa., confined in the Western penitentiary, at Pittsburg, a son of Richard H. Lee, Esq., Professor of Belles Letters in Washington College. The unfortunate young man is not more than twenty one years of age, and has been sentenced for three years imprisonment for stealing about $400 from Hon. T. M. T. M'Kennan.

ACCIDENTAL.—A son of Hiram Hultz, Esq. lost his life in Pitsburg on Saturday, says the Journal, by the the accidental discharge of a gun in the hands of a playmate. The contents lodged in his head, killing him instantly.

NOTICES.

MUSKINGUM DISTRICT—Buchanon Circuit.—I wish to inform our worthy President, Br. Brown, that we expect to commence a Camp-meeting, three miles west of Buchanon town, on the land of Nathan Reger, on Friday, the 8th day of October; to embrace his visit to this Circuit. And we also invite all our ministerial brethren, without naming them, that can come, to come to our aid. Come, brethren, come over and help us.

R. H. WALKER, Sup't.

INDIANA DISTRICT,—FRANKFORD CIRCUIT.—The Indisposition of Br. Bailey, (Superintendant,) and the absence of Br. J. Shipp, warrant the postponement of the Fourth Quarterly Meeting of Frankford Circuit, until the 9th and 10th of October, to be held in the town of Frankford. Brethren will please call and spend the Sabbath with our Frankford friends,—as the meeting will embrace the Sabbath previous to the sitting of our Conference.

T. S. FALKINBURGE.

Indiana Conference.—Inasmuch as the next Session of the Indiana and Wabash Conferences was appointed to commence at the same time, and being not far distant from each other, it is thought advisable that Indiana Conference change the time of its Session. I believe there is no provision in our Discipline in reference to this matter; and where there is no law there is no transgression. After having consulted about three-fourths of the members of Conference, and the District Committee, I am requested to publish to all, whom it may concern, that our next Session of the Indiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, will commence the twenty-ninth of September next, at Johnson's meeting-house, 7 miles West of Shelbyville, Shelby county. We earnestly solicit aid from sister Conferences. T. SHIPP.

As our brethren have declined my proposition for Camp Meeting in September and October, on the River and Southern parts of the District, and as the preachers will be somewhat late in making these distant appointments, I have therefore changed my plan, as the above will show. I want early information from the Superintendants, when my visits will be expected. TWO THOUSAND BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVINGS,

The extraordinary popularity of the above volumes in every section of the Union, renders an agency desirable by all business men, in each one of our principal towns and villages.

MERCHANTS, and others visiting the City of New York, are requested to call at No. 128 Nassau street, and examine them.

Our most successful agents are those who advertise the works in all the papers published in their neighborhood, and secure good sub-agents to assist them in selling the different volumes. In this way, every family has an opportunity of publishing the works. It is a well-known fact that there is a large class of persons who will purchase books at their fire-sides when brought and examined there, who would never visit a book-store.

Full particulars of the principles and profits of the business, will be given to all who desire them, by addressing post paid, ROBERT SEARS,

NEW GOODS.

GUTHRIE, BUCKINGHAM & Co., Putnam,

Invite attention to the most extensive and desirable stock of

FALL AND WINTER GOODS

That they have ever had the pleasure of offering to their customers.

It is out of the question to enumerate the articles: it is sufficient to say, that our stock embraces more than the usual varieties of

Dry Goods,	Stationery,
Groceries,	Oils and Paints,
Hardware,	Leather,
Queesware,	Iron and Nails,
Boots and Shoes,	Glass,
Caps and Hats,	Salt, &c., &c.

In regard to prices we deem it needless to say much. The cry of cheap! CHEAP!!! CHEAP!!! has become almost universal, and as a general thing, means just nothing at all. It is often made most wholly by those who have the least experience, and the fewest facilities for doing business.

We believe we have the means, and we know we have the will, to do business on as good terms as any house West of the mountains.

Our present stock was purchased for cash, in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, by A. A. G., who spared neither time or pains in making his selections, and we hazard nothing in saying that for variety of patterns, richness of style, and quality of fabrics, our goods will compare with any in the country.

And as to prices, WE WILL NOT be undersold. Country produce of all kinds taken in payment.

HEAVEN.

[Recited by Prof. Greenbank, in his Lectures on Elocution.]

There is a world we have not seen,
Which time shall never dare destroy,
Where mental footstep hath not been,
Nor ear hath caught its sound of joy.

There is a region lovelier far
Than sages tell or poets sing,
Brighter than summer beauties are,
And softer than the tints of spring.

There is a world—and oh, how blest!
Fairer than Prophets ever told,
And never did an Angel guest
One half its blessedness unfold.

It is all holy and serene,
The land of glory and repose;
And there, to dim the radiant scene,
The tear of sorrow never flows.

It is not fann'd by summer gale,
'Tis not refreshed by vernal showers,
It never needs the moon-beam pale,
For there are known no evening hours.

No; for that land is ever bright
With a pure radiance all its own,
The streams of uncreated light
Flow round it from th' Eternal Throne.

There forms that mortals may not see,
Too glorious for the eye to trace,
And clad in peerless majesty,
Move with unutterable grace.

In vain thy philosophic eye
May seek to view that fair abode,
Or find it curtained in the sky,—
It is the dwelling-place of God.

From the Methodist Protestant.

"Sunshine in the Heart."

Why say ye life is toilsome
And hardly to be borne?
Why say there's nought to bind here
The spirit, weary, worn?
Oh! there are rays of sunshine
To cheer the drooping heart;
And though this world be dark of ours,
All bliss may not depart;
When life is o'er, and its trials done,
There is rest; sweet rest, for the weary one.

Dark clouds may hover o'er us,
And all look drear and wild,
Faint be the light, and fainter,
Where sunshine once hath smiled;
And still, and still, we treasure
And trace the last ray o'er,
And love when it hath left us,
And call it ours once more.
But Jehovah gave, and when it is gone
He's taken again, to ask what 't has done.

Then let us treat it gently,
The sunshine lavished here,
Let's stay it when 'tis gliding,
And smile e'en through a tear;
Nay, call it back while lingering,
Too, with a limner's care;
Color each thing 'tis leaving,
With its own hue so fair.
Aye, ask it, that it may bear to Heaven,
A tale of the good, for which 'twas given.

Oh, we might dream our life away,
If there were no dark hours.
Oh! we should love not half so well,
If we had ever flowers,
And soft twilight may calm us,
When with wild joy or grief;
Though in the burning sunshine,
We could gather no relief.
A thrice-welcome friend is the twilight given,
To turn thought upward, to God, and Heaven.

Oh! if a kindly hearted
In all our buried years,
Have shared for once, our gladness,
Or mingled with us, tears—
If there have been in sadness,
Upon our pathway thrown,
One gem to make more lightly
The care-worn lot and love;
Call it a gift from a cup running o'er,
A gleam of sunshine, to leave us no more.

True—life may all be toilsome;
And we may wander on:
Still, there are rays of sunshine
The heart may call its own;
There are kind ones, and loving,
To bless the lowliest lot;
Bright flowers, in every pathway,
O! where—where are they not?
And when life is o'er, and its trials done
There is rest—sweet rest—for the weary one.

NO. X.

Monday, 12th October, I went home to prepare to go to our first Annual Conference, which was to commence on the 15th: I have now spent about nine months of my time in driving to and fro, through storms of snow and freezing winds and rain and mud and frozen roads, and also storms of opposition and persecution; but amidst all the Lord has been my helper, and I have possessed my soul in peace, though at times have been constrained to ask the question, "Why do you sacrifice the comforts of your fire-side at home, and why do you thus expose your health, and make your family work to support themselves and you, while other ministers are sitting at their ease, and receiving their hundreds a year,—does the Lord require all this at your hand?" All these and many other disagreeable thoughts frequently troubled me, but some how I was still enabled to press on, and yet to this day while I am transcribing, I have my doubts whether or not I did not wrong my children, and put too great a burden on my wife, by leaving all under her care; but if the people for whose good I thus labored, neglected their duty, they will have to settle that matter with the Lord hereafter; but to return to the subject. On Tuesday the 14th, I was favored with the company of several ministers and lay representatives on their way to Conference; we all set off the next morning, and reached the city in the evening. The Conference commenced the next day, and closed the 22nd. We had a very pleasant time in attending our Conference business; and the good Lord poured out his holy spirit, and sinners were converted, and saints were made joyful. Twenty-two preachers received appointments to travel in what was called the Ohio District, which included Ohio, Indiana, Pennsylvania, &c. I was appointed to form a circuit near the city. On Tuesday, 3d of November, I set out for the field of my labor; the nearest place being about thirty miles from my home. There were but two classes organized in the bounds of the mission; but I believed that God would add more, and went on, trusting in Him alone. I reached Cincinnati in the evening, and on the 6th I rode twelve miles and preached in the evening to a small audience; here we have a class, and they have a brick church, 35 by 50 feet, ready for the roof. I will now pass over the daily accounts and labors, and transcribe that which is the most interesting. On the 19th, I went to New Richmond, and added four to the number 12, which revived the little class: we had a precious season. On the 11th I rode to Batavia and stopped with Br. Hunt. After putting away my horse, he set out to give notice that I would preach in the court-house in the evening. On his way he was requested to go back, by an old friend of mine, who said I was a backslider. But Br. H. went on, and I had a goodly number out to hear. On Saturday, 14th, I rode into Milford, and met with a Br. Hughs, who invited me to his house, and treated me like a gentleman; then went across the river to Mr. L. Readys, who had left word for me to take his house in my plan of the circuit. He gave notice, and we had a respectable audience, and a time of conviction. Twenty-ninth, rode ten miles, to New Richmond; preached with liberty to an attentive audience; had a blessed time in class; preached again at night, and God converted two souls; one joined the church. I now pass over until Wednesday, 6th December; rode to Br. Clevelands'. Here a report had got abroad that I had been expelled for a violation of the Sabbath. Br. Cleveland, according to previous arrangement between him and me, just as I was hunting my hymn, arose and stated that he had told the people in that neighborhood that he would not hear me preach until I had given him satisfactory proof of my innocence. I observed that it was truly lamentable, that people, yea, even ministers of the Gospel, should so disgrace themselves, and show the weakness of their cause, in trying to support it, by slandering the character of those who dared to differ with them in opinion, on the subject of Church Government. I then produced my certificate obtained at the last Quarterly-meeting Conference I attended, and also a copy of my letter of resignation, sent to J. B. F., Presiding Elder. Brother Cleveland read them to the congregation, and stated that he was fully satisfied it was a slanderous report,—so I proceeded to preach, and we had a good time.—Saturday 19th, rode to New Richmond: our Presbyterian brethren had granted to us the use of their church to hold our Quarterly-meeting, and attended with us. I expected ministerial help from Cincinnati, but was disappointed; we had a glorious feast at the Lord's table with some of our Presbyterian and Episcopal Methodist brethren. I preached from the fourth commandment, and God made the word quick and powerful; many were filled with joy unspeakable; one Presbyterian Brother said at the close, Well, we have had a good meeting,—we have been highly honored. Twenty-seventh, got to Cincinnati, and received a request from Tanner's Creek, 25 miles below the city, to come and organise a class that had seceded from the Methodist E. Church. My poor drooping spirits were revived, and my faith was incresed. On the 29th, at Br. Handfords' we had a glorious time, especially in class; all, about 25 in number, were filled with joy. On the 30th, at New Richmond, we were favored with a blessed season in class. One young lady, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a seeker,—I asked her if God had converted her soul, she said no. Are you willing that he should do it? O, yes. Well, said I, Jesus is more willing to do the work than you are that it should be done. I then asked the brethren to ask God to bless that mourning sister, and that moment she leaped from her seat, and gave glory to God.—O, this was a happy day.

Biographical.

From Scott's Weekly Paper

THOMAS NELSON.

Thomas Nelson was born at York, Virginia, on the 26th of December, 1738. He was the son of William Nelson, an enterprising and successful merchant, and eventually also a wealthy planter. At the age of fourteen years Thomas was placed under the instruction of Mr. Newcomb, near Hackney, England. When his preparatory studies were completed he was placed at Cambridge and entered Trinity College, under the tuition of Dr. Beilby Porteus, one of the brightest literary ornaments of the age and subsequently bishop of London.

After spending eight years at study in England, he returned to Virginia, highly polished in mind and person. He entered into the enjoyment of a large landed estate, and over one hundred and thirty thousand dollars in cash. In August, 1762, he led to the hymeneal altar Miss Lucy, daughter of Philip Grymes, of Brandon, and settled permanently in his native place.

In 1774, Mr. Nelson was elected to the house of burgesses and took a bold stand in favor of liberal principles. He was a member of the convention held on the first of August of that year to elect delegates to Congress, and of the one convened in March, 1776, for this and other purposes. He supported the boldest measures that were proposed by the daring Patrick Henry, from which many of the patriots at first recoiled with amazement.

On the 11th of August he was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress, in which he took his seat on the 13th of September following. Possessed of a strong mind and sound judgment, he became a useful member of committees, but seldom took part in debate. The ensuing year he again took his seat in Congress, but was compelled to retire in May, in consequence of an attack of disease in the head which threatened for a time to impair his mental powers.

In August following, the governor and council commissioned him brigadier-general and commander-in-chief of the military forces of the State. In October, Gen. Nelson took his seat in the legislature of his native State, and acted a conspicious part in its deliberations. When Congress made an appeal to the wealthy young men of several colonies, urging them to raise a troop of light cavalry at their own expense, Gen. Nelson sent a circular to all the young gentlemen of fortune in the State, recommending them to open their purses to other high minded young men whose means were limited, as well as to come to the rescue themselves. He succeeded in raising a company of seventy, of which he was elected commander. They proceeded to Baltimore and reported themselves to the brave Pulaski, who received this accession of volunteers with delight and admiration.

On the 18th of February, 1779, Gen. Nelson again took his seat in Congress, and was immediately placed on several important committees. His severe labor caused a second attack similar to the former, and in April he was compelled to return to his home.

In June, 1780, the general assembly of Virginia passed a resolution to borrow two millions of dollars for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the war. General Nelson entered into the collection of this money with great zeal. Public credit was prostrated and government paper was no longer considered security. Like Robert Morris, he at once pledged his own fortune and raised large sums upon his own credit, for which he was but in part remunerated by government.

In the spring of 1781, Virginia again became the scene of murder, rapine, and wide-spread ruin. Judas, alias Arnold, and Lord Cornwallis were sweeping over the land like a tornado. Gen. Nelson was constantly in the field, doing all in his power to arrest the bold and savage career of the invading foe. In June he was elected governer of the State. He immediately entered upon the discharge of this dignified station, and bent his whole energies in raising troops to resist the enemy.

At this time a circumstance occurred that was exceedingly trying to his mind. By the constitution, the governor acted only in concert with the council. Two of that body had fallen into the hands of Tarleton, and two had resigned. It was impossible to raise a quorum for business. The awful crisis demanded immediate and decisive action. In this dilemma he transcended the existing law, and proceeded to act as though the council was still with him.

At a subsequent period this was made the foundation of a complaint against him, after he retired to private and was sinking under disease, which was forever put at rest by the legislature, by the passage of laws sanctioning his every public act during that campaign.

When Lord Cornwallis was encamped at Yorktown, Gen. Nelson was at the head of the Virginia troops—cool, brave, fearless and vigorous. His native town, his own domicile and property, were now to be razed. His energy was now exerted to its utmost in favor of the American cause, and his services were highly prized at that memorable seige that crushed the power of Great Britain in America, as a reference to Gen. Washington's general orders will clearly show.

The fatigues of this campaign and his arduous gubernatorial duties proved too much for the physical powers of Gover nor Nelson. He again sunk under disease, and on the 20th of November, 1781 he resigned his station and retired to private life. He spent the remainder of his days principally on a small estate he had saved from the wreck of his large fortune, situated at Offley, in the county of Hanover. His health continued gradually to decline, and on the fourth of January, 1789, he was numbered with the dead.

Ladies' Department.

To Wives.

The first inquiry of a woman after marriage should be, "How shall I continue the love I have inspired? How shall I preserve the heart I have won?"

1. Endeavor to make your husband's habitation alluring and delightful to him. Let it be to him a sanctuary to which his heart may always turn from the calamities of life. Make it a repose from his cares, a shelter from the world, a home not for his person only, but for his heart.—He may meet with pleasures in other houses, but let him find pleasure in his own. Should he be dejected, soothe him; should he be silent and thoughtful, do not heedlessly disturb him; should he be studious, favor him with all practical facilities; or should he be peevish, make allowance for human nature, and by your sweetness, gentleness and good-humor, urge him continually to think, though he may not say it, this woman is indeed a comfort to me: I cannot but love her and requite such gentleness and affection as they deserve."

2. Invariably adorn yourself with delicacy and modesty. These, to a man of refinement, are attractions the most highly captivating; while their opposite never fail to inspire disgust. Let the delicacy and modesty of the bride be always, in a great degree, supported by the wife.

3. If it be possible, let your husband suppose you think him a good husband, and it will be a strong stimulus to his being so. As long as he thinks he possesses the reputation he will take some pains to deserve it; but when he has once lost the name, he will abandon the reality.

4. Cultivate and exhibit with the greatest care and constancy, cheerfulness and good-humor.—They give beauty to the finest face; and impart charms where charms are not. On the contrary, a gloomy, dissatisfied manner, is chilling and repulsive to his feelings; he will be very apt to seek elsewhere for those smiles and that cheerfulness which he finds not in his own house.

5. In the article of dress, study your husband's taste. The opinion of others on this subject is of but very little consequence, if he approve.

6. Particulary shun what the world calls in ridicule, "curtain lectures." When you shut your door at night, endeavor to shut out at the same moment all discord and contention, and look on your chamber as a retreat from the vexations of the world, a shelter sacred to peace and affection.

How indecorous, offensive and sinful it is for a woman to exercise authority over her husband, and say, "I will have it so. It shall be as I like!" But I trust that the number of those who adopt this unbecoming and disgraceful manner, is so small as to render it unnecessary for me to enlarge on the subject.

7. Be careful never to join in a jest against your husband. Conceal his faults, and speak only of his merits. Shun every approach of extravagance. The want of economy has involved millions in misery. Be neat, tidy, orderly, methodical. Rise early, breakfast early, have a place for everything, and everything in its place.

8. Few things please a man more than seeing his wife notable and clever in the management of her household. A knowledge of cookery, as well as every other branch in housekeeping, is indispensable in a female, and a wife should always endeavor to support with applause the character of the lady and the housewife.

9. Let home be your empire—your world.—Let it be the scene of your wishes, your thoughts, your plans, your exertions. Let it be the stage on which, in the varied character of wife, of mother and mistress, you strive to shine. In its sober quiet scenes let your heart cast its anchor, let your feelings and pursuits all be centred.—Leave your husband the task of distinguishing himself by his valor or his talents. Do you seek for fame at home, and let your applause be that of your servants, your children, your husband, your God.

Attention, Ladies.

If you wish to get into the very best company possible, we do not know of any pleasanter way than is detailed in this beautiful scrap from a German poet:—

A flower do but place near thy window glass,
And through it no image of evil shall pass.
Abroad must thou go? on thy white bosom wear
A nosegay, and doubt not an angel is there;
Forget not to wear at break of the day
The lilies, and thou shalt be fairer than they;
Place a rose near thy bed nightly sentry to keep
And angels shall rock thee on roses to sleep.

A Christian Woman.

A worldly man was with some friends in a coffee house. Wine had inflamed the heads and loosened the tongues of the guests. Each sketched the character of his wife, and enumerated her defects as well as her good qualities. "As to mine," said our worldling, "all that I could say in her praise would fall far below the truth. My wife unites all the virtues, all the amiable qualities, which I can desire. She would be perfect if she were not a Methodist. But her piety gives her no ill-humor; nothing irritates her, nor renders her impatient. I might go with you, gentlemen, at midnight, and ask her to get up and serve us with supper, and she would not show the least discontent. She would do the honors of the table with as much assiduity as if I brought loved and expected guests."

"Well, then! let us put your wife to the proof," said some of the company.

A considerable bet was made. The husband agreed to the proposal, and our wine drinkers, forgetting all propriety, went in the middle of the night, to invade, with their noisy mirth, the peaceful dwelling of the humble Christian.

"Where is my wife?" asked the master of the house of the servant who opened the door.

"Sir, she is asleep, long ago."

"Go, wake her, and tell her to prepare supper for me and my friends."

The wife obedient to the will of her husband quickly made her toilet, met the strangers, and received them in the most gracious manner.—"Fortunately," said she," I have some provisions in my house, and in a few minutes supper will be ready."

The table was spread, and the repast served. The pious lady did the honors of the table with perfect good will, and constantly bestowed upon her guests the most polite attentions.

This was too much for our drinkers. They could not help admiring such extraordinary equanimity. One of them (the soberest of the company) spoke, when the desert was brought in, and said: "Madam, your politeness amazes us. Our sudden appearance at your house at so unseasonable an hour, is owing to a wager. We have lost it, and we do not complain. But tell us how it is possible that you, a pious person, should treat with so much kindness persons whose conduct you cannot approve."

"Gentlemen," she replied, "when we were married, my husband and myself, we both lived in dissipation. Since that time it has pleased the Lord to convert me to himself. My husband on the contrary, continues to go on in ways of worldliness. I tremble for his future state. If he should die now, he would be to be pitied. As it is not possible for me to save him from the punishment which awaits him in the world to come, if he is not converted, I must apply myself at least to render his present life as agreeable as possible."

These words affected strongly the whole company, and made a deep impression on the husband. "Dear wife," said he, "you are then anxious about the fate that awaits me in eternity. Thanks, a thousand thanks for the warning you gave me. By the grace of God I will try to change my conduct."

He was true to his promise. He opened his heart to the gospel, and became from that day another man,—a sincere christian, and the best of husbands.

"Christian wives who have the misfortune to be united to infidel husbands," adds the narrator, "read and read again this anecdote. See how minds are gained to the gospel. Complaints and reproaches, however well founded, do not restore peace to the household; often the contrary, they irritate and increase the evil. Be then full of meekness, patience, charity, and the Lord will bless your efforts."

To cook Tomatoes.

He that does not love tomatoes is an object of pity. Every art of cooking should be employed to inveigle the appetite of every man to love a vegetable so wholesome.

Peel a dozen ripe tomatoes and fry them in a little sweet butter, together with two or three sliced green peppers, sprinkle on a little salt; and finally slice up and onion or two, and let the whole cook thoroughly. This is the Spanish method of preparing them

Another method which from long experience we know will wear well, is as follows:—The directions are for a mess of tomatoes, amounting to about three pints when cooked.—Begin by parboiling two onions. While this is doing, peel a dozen tomatoes, which is easily done after hot water has been poured over them, cut them up and add the onions, also a teacupful and a half of bread crumbled fine, a table spoonful of salt, a heaping tea spoonful of black pepper, a lump of butter the size of a turkey's egg, or about four table spoonsfuls. Beat these thoroughly together and set them over a slow fire, gradually to stew. They should cook slowly for a long time; never less than three hours, but the longer the better About fifteen minutes before they are to be used, beat up six eggs and stir them in, and put them on fresh coals and give them one grand boil up, stirring them all the time. When so cooked no directions will be needed how to eat them.

The art of cooking the tomatoes lies mostly in cooking them enough. They should be put to work the first thing after the breakfast things are out of the way; even if you do not dine till three. —Indiana Farmer and Gardener.

Fruits of Virtue.

If you should see a man digging in a snow bank with the expectation of finding valuable ore—or planting seeds upon the heavy billows, you would say at once that he was beside himself.—But, in what respect would this man differ from you while you sow the seeds of idleness and dissipation in your youth, and expect the fruits of age will be a good constitution, elevated affections and holy principles? If you desire a virtuous and happy life, in youth, you must shape your character by the word of unerring wisdom, and plant in your bosom the seeds of holiness.

RELIGION.—Impress your minds with reverence for all that is sacred. Let no wantonness of youthful spirits, no compliance with the intemperate mirth of others, ever betray you into profane sallies. Besides the guilt which is thereby incurred, nothing gives you a more odious appearance of petulance, and presumption in youth, than the affectation of treating religion with levity. Instead of being an evidence of superior understanding, it discovers a pert & shallow mind which, vain of the first smatterings of knowledge, presumes to make light of what the rest of mankind revere. At the same time you are not to imagine that when exhorted to be religious, you are called upon to become more formal and solemn in your manners than others of the same years:—or to erect yourselves into supercilious reprovers of those around you. The spirit of true religion breathes gentleness and affability. It is social, kind, and cheerful; far removed from that gloomy and illiberal superstition which clouds the brow, sharpens the temper, dejects the spirit, and teaches men to fit themselves for another world by neglecting the concerns of this. Let your religion on the contrary, connect preparation for heaven with an honorable discharge of the duties of active life. Of such religion, discover on every proper occasion that you are not ashamed; but avoid making any unnecessary ostentation of it before the world.—Blair.

Cheerfulness.

Be cheerful, boys! Be cheerful. A young man with a countenance habitually elongated, sorrow depicted in every feature, whose tones of voice bespeak sad prospects within, dark melancholy seated on the throne of hope; such an one; while we pity him, we exclaim, how unwise! how wrong! A creature formed for enjoyment, in a world teeming with joy and gladness, notwithstanding the sorrows it contains; gifted with talents for usefulness; capable of exerting an influence for good on those around, and thus producing harvests of joy, not only for others, but also for himself; an intelligent creature thus circumstanced, why so sorrowful? so dejected?

To be sorrowful at times, on fiting occasions, is right; our sins against God and our fellows demand repentance; we should also sympathise with the afflicted. But to "go mourning all our days" is not only unwise but sinful; habitual depression of spirits not only unfits the mind for the necessary exertion in overcoming difficulties, and the difficulties that have originally caused this depression, but is likewise destructive of health, and, if long continued, of even life itself; it is, therefore, as unwise as it is sinful. It is sinful, not only because it leads the unhappy victim who indulges in it to despise the blessings bestowed upon him by his God, but, in proportion to the influence he may exert on his associates, so far is it sinful in wronging them of their cheerfulness, and consequently of their mercies. For so great an evil it is wise to seek a cure; is your sadness caused by crosses and trials? dark prospects and gloom? "hope against hope." "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." Are you burdened with cares? do cruel anxieties crush you? "be careful for nothing, but by prayer and supplication let your requests be made known to God."

Cheerfulness promotes health of body and tranquillity of mind, and thus disposes to increased cheerfulness. Be cheerful, then; seek out objects of pity and relieve their wants, or at least, if this is out of your power, speak kindly to them, encourage them to hope for "better time a-coming." By the exercise of kindness to others, your own woes will soon be forgotten. Instead of expressions of gloom, you will soon experience the happiness of a bright countenance, radiant with smiles of thankfulness and joy.—Atom.

Be Active.

"I wish I were rich!" Bestir yourself. Don't lay in bed until nine or ten o'clock; but be up and doing with the lark. In the winter of '37, a friend of ours made five thousand dollars before four o'clock in the morning. "Oh! I couldn't do that!" The deuce you can't. Why not. Be energetic, bold, persevering, and clever, and our word for it, though you may not make five thousand dollars at one time, you will have the assurance that you have acted like a man—that you have not been a drone in this great man hive of ours.—Scott's Weekly

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

The Patched Dress.

"I wish I had better gown, mother," said Emily Foster, as she was getting ready for school, one cold morning in December; "the girls laugh at this so; and yesterday Julia Haven asked me if I bought it of the rag man."

Mrs. Foster's eyes filled with tears while her little daughter was speaking. A few years before she had been in prosperous circumstances; but the family afterward, had reduced her to distressing poverty. Emily was the eldest of her three children, and she had but just entered upon her eighth year; so that, although the poor woman toiled all day with her needle, and Emily worked diligently almost every minute out of school hours, she was hardly able to provide the family with the scanty food which was their daily fare, or with sufficient clothing to shield them from the inclemency of the weather. She had made great effort to send her daughter to school, because she was anxious that she should learn all that was possible in her circumstances. She knew that she could go only for a very short time, when she must leave school to toil wearily and uninterruptedly. It was therefore with a sorrowful heart she learned that Emily had been exposed to ridicule on account of her scanty dress. She tried hard, however, to conquer her emotion; and, after being silent a moment said,

"But, my dear, your gown is not ragged. There is not a single hole in it."

"I know it, mother, I suppose they laugh at it because it is patched up so. I could hardly help crying yesterday, they made such sport of it."

"But it is no harm, my child, to wear a patched frock. It is the very best I can get for you."

"I know that, and I try hard not to care for what the girls say; only sometimes it makes me feel so bad."

Just then a lady entered to engage Mrs. Foster to do some sewing for her, and so the conversation between mother and daughter was interrupted.

Alas! thoughtless children little know how much unhappiness they often cause those who have sufferings enough from the ill of poverty!

Obeying God.

"When God says "Sun, shine in the skies!" the sun directly answers, not in words but in deeds, "Here am I to do my Maker's will, to light up earth and heaven with my glory, to gild all things with gold, and to make the whole creation rejoice."

When God says to the moon, "Appear!" the moon replies, "Here am I with my silver light, to scatter the darkness and render the night lovely."

When God says to the stars, "Shine forth!" they instantly answer, "We are thy servants and we gladly do thy bidding. Already we are in the skies, and there will we keep watch till thou givest us leave to retire."

Thus do the sun, and the moon, and the stars, obey their Almighty Maker.

When God says to the spring, "Come forth with thy flowers!" does she tarry or refuse to answer? No. "I come," says the spring. "Here are my greenest leaves. Here are my freshest flowers, wherewith to beautify the earth. The snow-drops in the garden, and the primrose on the bank in the coppice."

When God says to the summer, "Gladden the earth!" the answer of summer is this: "At thy voice I spread my influence abroad; the birds are warbling, the flowers are blooming, the trees are blossoming, and nature is rejoicing."

When God says to the autumn, "Withhold not thy fruit!" "They are here!" is autumn's reply. "The bush is ladened with berries, and the trees with fruit, and the fields are waving with the golden grain, ready for the sickle of the husbandman."

When God says to the winter, "Where art thou, and where are thy storms?" "They are abroad at thy command," replies old winter.—"Frost has bound up the earth and the water: snow has covered the ground and the wings of the howling wind are flying through the air.—Who shall stand before thy cold?"

Thus do spring, summer, autumn and winter, obey the command of the Holy One.

And shall the sun with his glory, the moon with her beams, and the stars with their light, obey their Maker! Shall spring with her flowers, summer with her blossoms, autumn with his fruits, and surly winter with his storms, gladly hasten to do the commandment of the Lord, and thou refuse to obey him? O! let thy language be—

"While sun, and moon, and stars are seen,
And seasons round me roll,
I will obey the Lord my God,
With all my heart and soul.

VARIETY.

LACONICS.

Fortune has been considered the guardian divinity of fools; and, on this score, she has been accused of blindness, but it should rather be adduced as a proof of her sagacity, when she helps those who certainly cannot help themselves.

An act by which we make one friend, and one enemy, is a losing game: because revenge is a much stronger principle than gratitude.

Sensibility would be a good portress if she had but one hand; with her right she opens the door to pleasure, but with her left to pain.

It would be most lamentable if the good things of this world were rendered more valuable, or more lasting; for, despicable as they already are, too many are found eager to purchase them even at the price of their souls!

If people are sold by others; it is because they have first sold themselves.

There are many books written by many men, from which two truths only are discoverable by the readers; namely, that the writers thereof wanted two things—principle and preferment.

Pride, like the magnet, constantly points to one object—self: but, unlike the magnet, it has no attractive pole, but at all points repels.

As in literature we shall find few things that are true, and some things that are new; but very few things that are both true and new; so also in life, we shall find some men that are great, and some that are good, but very few men that are both great and good.

The most ridiculous of all animals is a proud priest; he cannot use his own tools without cutting his own fingers.

Did universal charity prevail, earth would be a heaven, and hell a fable.

Apples for Stock.

Some years since, before the temperance reformation—while perigrinating through some of the best and most affluent agricultural districts of New England, I remember to have seen the product of the orchard appropriated solely to the manufacture of Cider. This liquor at that day, was on most farms, the common beverage for the "hired hands" in the field, and "boiled down," and "rectified" by the addition of some one or two gallons of proof brandy to the barrel, constituted a very grateful and stimulating drink for "company," or for the Laird who needed, or fancied that he needed "something to brace the nerves, and give vigor to the system, after the fatigue and labor of the field."

Recent experiments, however, have since satisfactorily demonstarated to the candid and judicious of my farming friends, that apples are valuable for other purposes than for cider making, and the cider mill is rapidly given place, in most sections, to the steaming apparatus and the oven.

Hogs are now fattened exclusively on apples, both boiled and baked, and there is no longer any question that pork can be made with far less trouble and expense, and of a quality as good, as on potatoes, meal or corn. A few years since I butchered a hog, sixteen months old, which weighed 560. For seven weeks previous to bringing him to the tub, he ate nothing but boiled apples. A few weeks before slaughtering him, thinking that by keeping him some few days or weeks on corn feed would increase the quality of the pork, I ordered some dough to be given in place of the usual diet. But to our utter astonment it was no sooner deposited in the trough than he rooted it out. The experiment was repeated three several times in succession, and at the usual hours of feeding, but invariably with the same result. Apples prepared in the usual manner were then presented, and he partook of them as usual, and upon this feed with a weekly portion of charcoal, salt and sulphur he was kept till taken to the tub. I never ate sweeter pork and have repeated the experiment whenever I have commanded the means. For cows in milk, sheep and calves, apples, furnish a palatable diet. —Sweet apples are doubtless preferable to sour, as they contain more saccharine matter, but the sourest crabs are too valuable to be thrown away.

A PRACTICAL FARMER.

Bald Eagle Farm, July 26 1847.

SUPERIOR WESTERN FLOUR.—The New York Tribune of August 21st, after noticing the prices of Flour—$5.25a5 50 for Ohio, and $5.62a5 75 for fresh brands Genessee, pays an excellent and well merited compliment to a brand of flour, manufactured at Zanesville, Ohio—"Beaumont & Hollingsworth's Extra Pastry," sales of which are reported at $6.25, and which at close was held firm at $6.50, the same rate at which 'Frost's Extra' and 'Powei's Extra,' made from new Southern Wheat, were selling. It says,—"This, (Beaumont & Hollingsworth's) "is a new brand of Flour from Ohio of Wheat grown in the Southern districts carefully selected and manufactured by practical millers, in the very perfection of the art. It is unexcelled in color and strength, and is manufactured with an express view to the wants of bakers and shippers to warm climates. It is well calculated for bakers here, and it is believed will retain its sweetness and color in the latitudes of South America as well as the Richmond brands, which have hitherto nearly monopolized these markets.—Zanesville Gazette.

WEAR FLANNELS.—If your constitution is delicate, wear flannel next to your skin during the summer season, and be particularly careful that young children wear it also. We have heard an eminent physician, now residing in this city, say that a large portion of the deaths by cholera infantum which annually take place in this city and vicinity, could have been prevented by this simple precaution. It is the sudden changes of the weather, the ordinary effect of which may be in a great measure warded off by wearing flannel next to the skin, which produce these fatal diseases, and which are generally ascribed to too great an indulgence in summer fruits.—Boston Journal.

Christian Prayer for Christian Graces.

Help me to live, O God,
Above earth's nothingness,
And tread the path the Saviour trod
To perfect day and bliss!

Give me the pure desire,
Those best desires fulfil,
And give the Spirit to inspire
My heart to do Thy will.

Give me the humble frame
That only stoops to rise;
Humility in deed and name,
That seeks its native skies!

Give me the crown of love,
To saints and martyrs given,
Immortal souls for Christ, to prove
Its gems the gems of Heav'n!

Give me the dying grace,
In death that grace to sing,—
The radiance of the Saviour's face,
The Heav'n which Heav'n shall bring!

What Constitutes an Efficient Ministry?

CONSECRATION TO THE WORK.

Entire consecration to the work is required of every one who assumes the responsibilities of the ministerial office. Without this, no one can be extensively useful, neither is he worthy the name of a minister of Jesus Christ. Indeed, to prosper in any business, a person must be entirely consecrated to that business. Hence, we see the men of the world, in general, prosper just in proportion to their devotedness to their business. No matter how poor the business, if a man gives himself wholly to it, devoting heartily all his time and talents thereto, prosperity will be the result. If this is the case with earthly things, much more may we expect such results from an entire devotion to the work of saving souls—a work in which all heaven is deeply interested, and on which the Divine blessing is more especially promised than on any other.

But what is the nature of the consecration required of a minister?

We answer, first, it involves the doctrine of self-denial. A man that is called to the work of the ministry, must deny himself of his own will, his own choice of employments, many of the comforts of settled life, the prospect of gain, and all other things, whether lawful or unlawful in themselves, that would in any way interfere with an entire devotion to the work of the ministry. Whoever cannot say in truth, with the Apostles of our Lord, "lo, we have left all, and followed thee," is not fully consecrated. If there is anything of an earthly nature, of which we are not willing to deny ourselves, for the sake of greater usefulness in the vineyard of the Lord, then there is one thing that has a stronger hold upon our affections than the gospel of Jesus Christ. Such a man is not fully consecrated to the work, and cannot answer affirmatively the question asked him at his examination; viz., "Does the salvation of your fellow-men lie nearer your heart than other things in the world?" O, what danger there is of lying to the Holy Ghost, in answering such questions! How many there are who have answered such questions in the affirmative, merely for the sake of being admitted "among the prophets," who have exhibited, in their after lives, that promotion and self-gratification lie much nearer their hearts than the salvation of souls.

Entire consecration to the ministry, also, involves the doctrine of crucifixion to the world. Worldly desires, and worldly hopes must be so far crucified, as in no way to control the mind. The truly consecrated minister must emphatically be dead to the world. Although living in it, he is a citizen of another country, and is engaged in business as a minister of another government. The life of nature—by which we mean the natural, unrenewed principle, which governs every unsanctified heart, more or less—must be destroyed; in a word, they must be crucified with Christ, and raised to a newness of life—a life actuated by different motives, fed by different food, and having higher ends in view than the natural or uncrucified man can possibly have. The want of this ingredient in the doctrine of consecration, robs many ministers of their comfort and usefulness, all their days. They neither aim at, nor expect a complete victory over their inward corruptions, and, consequently, they are always undecided, they have too strong a sense of duty to renounce the work altogether, and too strong attachments to earth and earthly things, to be wholly given up to God & his work. Not being dead to the praise of men, they are distressed whenever they fancy themselves unnoticed. They are so unsettled and wavering, between the world and Christ, that they are continually changing positions; leaving it doubtful on which side they will finally fall. Such ought never to burden the Church with their mere nominal services, until they can make a full sacrifice of all their selfish desires, and die to everything not relating to their proper work, as ministers standing between and offended Deity and guilty, rebellious and dying men.

The doctrine of consecration implies further, a solemn, full, and perpetual dedication of all our powers to the cause to which we are devoted. A person thus consecrated, has no more right to himself; he is not his own, but has given himself to another, to be directed and controlled by him.

In a religious sense, the whole Church of Christ is required to be thus consecrated, but in a more full sense is every minister of the sanctuary required to be wholly consecrated to God. This is illustrated by the consecration of the Jewish Church. They were a peculiar people to, God, chosen and separated from all other nations; yet this general consecration of the whole people was not sufficient for the priests; God required them to receive an additional dedication; they must be annointed with the holy oil of consecration before they commenced their work. This was significant of the Divine appointment, consecration and qualification of Gospel ministers. It is not enough that they are converted and belong to the Church of God; it is not enough that they have been called to the work; it is not enough for them to be willing to obey such call; they are required actually to consecrate themselves to this work, and receive the annointing necessary to enable them effectually to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ. The ministers of our Lord Jesus Christ, three years after they were called to the work, were commanded to tarry at Jerusalem until they were annointed with the Holy Ghost, as an indispensable qualification for extensive usefulnes. This is a point of vital importance, and should be pressed upon the attention of every one who enters the ministry. Here were men who had "been with Jesus" three years, hearing him, and seeing his miracles. They had learned much of his manner of preaching, and of his doctrines, but all this was not enough without the holy annointing—the "unction from the Holy One"—the baptism of fire, as the seal of their consecration as the ministers of Jesus Christ, to stand in his stead on earth, and reflect his image and exhibit his spirit. Very many, we fear, who have almost every other qualification, lack this, and lacking this, they are inefficient, lifeless drones, preaching dry theories and legal duties, without imparting the life-giving and soul-saving energies of the gospel.

It our position be correct, want of entire consecration to the work in the professed ministers of the gospel, is one great reason why the Church is not now blessed with a more efficient ministry. And we have no hope of another general revival in the present Church organizations, unless we are blessed with ministers who are so fully devoted to the work of saving souls as to view this, not only their main business, but as their only business. So long as a minister considers preaching the gospel a mere matter of convenience, to be attended to only when he has nothing else to attend to, or when he can do it without inconvenience or hindrance to his temporal interests, he is not, and cannot be wholly consecrated to it, and unless he reform, the sooner he renounces the name of a preacher, the better. We do not suppose that a truly consecrated minister cannot labor with his hands without forfeiting his consecration; no, far from it. Paul was wholly devoted to the ministry, and yet he labored with his hands frequently. But his design in all this, was to further his usefulness. The end he always had in view, was to render his ministry efficient, to remove the obstacles in the way of his usefulness from the ignorance and prejudice of his hearers. He made tents, he labored with his own hands, he labored with travail night and day, but it was all for the purpose of obtaining means to enable him to preach, when the poverty or covetousness of the people withheld from him his just dues. Well would it be for many in our day, if they could offer, in truth, the same reason for their constant employment in the things of earth.

Brother in the ministry, do you complain of the want of efficiency in your labors? Perhaps the difficulty lies here; you are not wholly consecrated to the work. Should this be the case, and you engage in preaching the gospel as a secondary business, and attend to it only when you can do so without hindering in any way your increase in wealth, you cannot expect to be efficient as a minister. Were Christ now upon earth, and were you to offer your services to him, while, at the same time, your heart was clinging to something of a worldly nature, he would not receive you. Would you say to him, "suffer me first to go and bury my father," he would answer, "go thou and preach the kingdom of God, and let the dead bury their dead." Would you say, "Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest, only suffer me first to go and bid farewell to my friends." His plain and pointed answer would be, "he that taketh hold of the plough, and looketh back, is not fit for the Kingdom of God." Your work is the most important and urgent that ever was committed to the hands of mortal man, and demands your whole time and attention. Lukewarmness is not sufferable; better never be called a minister of Christ, than be lukewarm. There is no time to be lost; we are all passing like arrows through time, and will soon, with all our hearers, stand before God. Then, if not before, we will see the wickedness of indifference in a work in which God, angels and men are incessantly engaged. "I charge thee, therefore, before God, & the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom; Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine. Do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry. Meditate on these things; give thyself wholly to them, that thy profiting may appear to all."

Saturday Night.—Many associations sweet & hallowed crowd around that short sentence, "Saturday night." It is but a prelude to more pure, more heavenly associations, which the tired frame and thankful soul hail with renewed joy at each succeeding return. 'Tis then the busy din of life ceases; that cares and anxieties are forgotten; and the worn out frame seeks its needed repose, and the mind its relaxation from earth and its concerns, with joy looking for the coming day of rest, so wisely and beneficially set apart for man's peace and happiness by his Creator.

The tired laborer seeks his own cottage, to which, perhaps, he has been a stranger the past week, where a loving wife and smiling children meet him with smiles and caresses. Here he realizes the bliss of hard-earned comforts, and, at this time, perhaps more than any other, the happiness of domestic life and its attendant blessings.

Released from the disturbing cares of the week, the professional man beholds the return of Saturday night, and he gladly seeks the clustering vines nourished by his paternal care, the reality of those joys which are only his own to know at their peculiar seasons, & under these congenial circumstances, so faithfully and vividly evinced by the periodical scene of enjoyment and repose.

The lone widow, too, has toiled on day after day, to support her little charge; how gratefully does she resign her cares at the return of Saturday night, and thank her God for the kind resting places on the way by which she is encouraged from week to week to hold on her way.

A Short Sermon from Dow, Jr.

My Friends—I am told that your consciences are more quiet, and that you sleep better than you did before you got licenses to poison your fellow beings. Now, my friends, if this is the case, you've much mistaken your condition.—Instead of sleeping quietly, you ought not to sleep a wink. You haint got any consciences, or they're so bedarkened, and you're so bespotted as to be past feeling. Now, let us examine this business. Do you suppose any body has any right to license you to turn liquor down a man's throat? or give it to him to drink? You must be fools; ye never read the Bible, or if ye have, ye're as blind as the poor priests that gave letters of license to Saul to go to Damascus and drag the poor saints there to persecution and the stake.—Poor Saul, full of the devil against God's children, got these letters, and started off after them, puffing and blowing I spose, like a steam engine. Spose he'd caught 'em, and they'd hung back and would'nt come, and he'd killed 'em, do ye think these letters would have cleared him?—And when you're gathered up to the last tribunal, to answer for all the souls that have floated to perdition on the big stream of death you've poured out upon the world, and the weeping widows and orphans you've made, do you calculate to hand over your letters and pass through the narrow gate? I'll tell you what, my friends, you'll do no such thing—you'l be gone suckers about then.

Ye may cover yourselves with licenses as big as bed blankets, and they'll sink ye to hell.—They're the work of the devil, whose children ye are. You must take them and go to your Father, and if they aint fire proof, it will go hard with ye, as sure as I am a preacher.

Now, my friends, you've cried 'moral suasion' until you've skinned your throats and stopt the ears of justice. 'Moral suasion' is of no use to you, my friends—I would as soon cry 'moral suasion' to the wolf with his paw upon the lamb, or the hyena, with his fangs in my bosom.—You're fond of oily words and smooth speeches. But I'll not use these. I'd sooner cleave your hearts with the harpoon, than to have you continue this infamous business.

Now, my friends, do come and let us reason together.—Though your sins be as scarlet, and your hands all over smeared with the blood of your victims, they can be made white, and your souls pure. But you must stop where you are.—Don't think you can sell any more whiskey and slip the devil.

Let us hear what the Scripture saith. You'll find it in Exodus, 21st chapter, and 28th and 29th verses. 'If an ox gore a man or a woman that they die, then the ox shall surely be stoned, and his flesh shall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox shall be quit. But if the ox were wont to push with his horns in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man, the ox shall be stoned, and his owner put to death.'

Here you'll see a man is held to answer for the conduct of his ox. If he pushed and killed a man or a woman, his owner must be pushed and killed. Now, my friends, you've pushed, yes, you've pushed many a poor drunkard into his grave, and don't ye think you'll be pushed for this? Yes, you'll be pushed into perdition, and pushed after you get there, and pushed to all eternity, and it'll be such pushing as you never see.

Now, my friends, before I quit, I want to say a few words about this license law. But, first, do you know what law is? I don't 'spose ye do. Well, law is this: be honest, pay your debts, hurt nobody, and love your neighbors as yourselves.—Now, if any body makes a law contrary to those etarnal and immutable principles of justice, it aint no law—it haint any force. But ye need'nt look to the legislature for laws. God made laws before the legislature. The legislature only declares what law is. I should have said, my friends, that it ought to declare what law is.—But it don't often do this. Legislators are often rum-loving, time-serving, God-hating, devil-loving men. Such are those that repealed the license law. No better lawyers and no more to be trusted than the Scribes and Pharisees were who sat in Moses' seat. Our Saviour said, Wo unto them.

Did you ever think, my friends, that there was a time when there was'nt any law? Well, there was. About that time Cain killed his brother and though God had'nt written on either of them stone, thou shalt not kill, yet he brought Cain right up to the scratch, and put the murderer's mark upon him. Now, my friends, you'll have it on you, if you haint got it already. It don't make any difference whether you kill with a club, as Cain did, or a gallon of whiskey.

I must say one word more and close. My friends, you cannot sell liquor and be innocent, any way you can fix it.—You had better cut your own throats now, than not to stop.—In this case I'm not sure but suicide would be justifiable, and your chances on the other side full as good as they are now. Amen.

From Rausse's "Water-cure Miscellanies."

The Brandy-Plague.

The drug-plague prevails most generally among the middle and higher classes, but upon the lower, the father of wickedness has brought the brandy-plague, to spread poison and misery throughout mankind. Would you know whence comes this demon, to cheat the senses and overthrow the reason, and which savages well have named mad-water! Put fire to a glass of it, and look at your face, lighted with its horrid infernal blaze—and in your own corpse-like countenance, you will see written the answer.

Not only in a figurative sense, but literally, is brandy a poison. Alcohol, in which the strength of all intoxicating drinks consists, is a veritable poison, and a terrible one, because it destroys so slowly and with such suffering. Despair, loathing of life, beastly brutality, and a torturing temptation to suicide are among the final symptoms of alcoholic poison, the rack on which the demon of the "fire-water" lays his miserable victim. In its operations, alcohol is nearly related to mercury. Both poisons insinuate themselves gradually into every part of the body, even into the hardest bones and the finest nerves, into the heart and into the brain. Both bring loathing and despair, and only differ in this, that alcohol, because it darkens the mind, nourishes the brute in man, and reduces this human brute far below the beast in the stall.

It has been proved by dissection that the flesh of the drunkard has the smell of alcohol; the brain of a man who died of drunkenness has been exposed to fire, and blue flame has been lighted in it, precisely like the flame of alcohol. We know that drunkards have even perished by spontaneous combustion, with the infernal flame appearing at their mouth and ears. A case of this sort has been lately recorded in the French gazettes. Two witnesses, who have made affidavit of the fact, testify that flame appeared on the neck of a woman long addicted to drunkenness and destroyed her.

Some have objected to these facts that the greatest degree of heat in the human body is not sufficient to inflame alcohol. This however would prove that no animal substance can become inflammable. The explanation seems to me to be, that, as in dead and decaying animal substances, inflammable gases, for example phosphoric hydrogen gas are developed in living bodies when they have become thoroughly corrupted, a corruption which may take place, as is well known, through the action of various poisons. As soon as this gas comes in contact with alcohol, it is inflamed.

It is impossible that a drunkard whose body is soaked with alcohol, can, even when he leaves it off, ever become an entirely sound man again, unless his body is freed from the poison. This can only take place through a searching water-cure. This alone will rescue the miserable victim from a desperate and incurable disease.

The cure for the poison of alcohol is the same as that for mercury, consisting chiefly of douche sweating, and drinking great quantities of water. Striking cures have been performed in this way. Experience teaches how difficult in common life it is for the drunkard to break off from his excesses. The best intentions melt in the flame of the fire-water. It is a torment to those men to be sober, for then they begin to feel all the ruin their intoxication has worked:—they must be stupified that they may not suffer.

Nothing ruins the natural healthful instincts so completely as the use of alcohol. The drunkard, more than any other sufferer from chronic diseases, has a loathing for water, and hence, they are the most difficult patients to bring into the water-treatment. But when the first trial is over, the regenerating power which nature has lodged in every living system, shows itself in astonishing activity. These ruined creatures, reduced to the level of the beasts, with their poisoned bodies, these beings who can sink no deeper into degradation, are capable of as complete a regeneration as if they were to be born into new bodies.

Every poison destroys, to a greater or less degree, the power of the nerves, and they are the guardians of health. Without them there can be no true healthy sensations, and that happiness is impossible which comes of mere existence, the happiness of being. On the nerves, water exercises a revivifying power, and so soon as these are restored, one possesses the certainty of complete restoration from his sufferings. But long before that, the patient acquires the heartiest love for water. He would kiss it as he drinks, he would embrace it as he bathes. It is gratitude to his saviour and the rejoicing of his new born natural instincts.

Even to the drunkard water gives this instinct back. He acquires a loathing for all that intoxicates, a disgust at all poisons; he can drink nothing but water or milk. I remember a man who determined to indulge himself, the day before he left Graefenberg, with a bottle of wine, but wine had become so disagreeable to him, tasted so sharp and poisonous, that he could not get down a glass, although he had before been a hard drinker. "Bring me water," he cried to the servant, "water the rest of my life!" and flung his bottle out of the window. A.

Agricultural.

"It is Cheaper to Buy."

This song, my agricultural friends, is sung too much, at the present day. The times are changed, and in some respects for the worse. The time was when it was the song of about all, that it was better for the farmer to make and raise certain things than to buy. In this communication, I shall attempt to prove that the old way is the best. To buy about all, may do for some classes of people, but not for the farmer. His profits are small; of course his means will not allow it.—Nor ought we, my friends, to desire it; for were this the case, our minds would become stupid, and our bodies inactive, and we should soon die of rust. Whenever things can be made or raised for a farmer's family, without a material loss, it ought unquestionably to be done, for this case requires a degree of independence. A farmer ought to make his own pork. I will not except the milk seller. I very well know that pork is low, and to reckon the shoats, labor of fatting and the food eaten at a fair price, it would amount to more than the pork. But what of that? A great part of what we give to porkers, could not be sold for cash, and doing as above recommended, the farmer saves his money, has on hand a good supply, and that outweighs all other considerations, prevents the frequent disagreeable cry of the woman (to wit,) husband, we are all out of pork! We are out of lard, &c. Such facts do not set well on a good farmer's ear, nor ought they ever to take place.

A farmer ought to do as much as to fat his own beef. Here the same remarks will apply as were made on pork.

A person who calculates to be a farmer, ought to begin in his youth to do some mechanical work. A man of activity can do many things, and do them neatly and well, and make a great saving. There will be stormy and inclement weather, when he cannot work on the farm; and if he has a suitable shop and tools, he can work to a good advantage. In thus doing he may save much of his money. He may not only be a kind of carpenter, (in common work,) but even a shoemaker and mender, without materially interfering with his agricultural business.

A farmer ought to raise his own grain; that is to say, such as succeed well in his part of the country. I well know that corn comes in from the South and West like a flood, and is lower than we can afford to raise it. But what of that?

We have land that ought to be tilled,
And stout boys who ought to be drilled.

And where can we drill them so well as in the field? What will they be worth, if they do not bear the yoke in their youth, and be trained to habits of industry? How can they have health and nerve, unless early accustomed to labor? If they should not be farmers, it is all important that they have a knowledge of farming. It will be a source of pleasure and profit during life.

Interesting Agricultural Facts.

The care of enlightened and patriotic men has caused the introduction of precious plants, and animals into countries which had never since creation, before possessed them.

Lucullus first introduced cherries into Italy, from Pontus, and he first planted them in his princely gardens in Rome, where they have ever since flourished, as greatly as they had done in Pontus.

The Malus Pyrus, or rather Epyrus, [the pear] from Epirus. The peach (Malus Punica) from Carthage. The adricot (Malus Armeniaca) from Armenia. The quince (Malus Cydonia) from Syria—these after having been naturalized to the climate of Italy, were afterwards transplanted by them. The tree from which the first sweet oranges were raised in Portugal, is, perhaps, still living in China, and they bear the name of China oranges, for they were not natives of Portugal.

Rice was first introduced in Carolina about the year 1740.

In England, about the year 1500, there were no musk melons, sallads, cabbages, turnips, carrots, nor any of those garden roots so important now to the people. Long after that, the cauliflower was introduced, which now grows so finely in England. About the years from 1525 to 1550, hops and pippin apples were first introduced, gooseberries, also currants, roses, July flowers, carnations, asparagus, oranges, beans, lettuce, plums, musk roses, tulips, and artichokes. About the year 1769, the rhubarb plant was deemed so naturally confined to Tartary, that the Emperor of Russia regulated the quantity brought to market and the price of it, much in the same way that the Dutch have done cloves and mace, and they made England pay annually nearly a million of dollars for it, and it now grows in England to great perfection, and as easily as the common dock.

As to birds, the peacock was introduced into England from the East Indies—the pheasant from Asia Minor, and it flourishes in England.

Our barn yard fowls were brought originally to England from Asia. Our horses are from Barbary, Turkey, Persia, Andalusia of Spain, and from Arabia, and they flourish among us.—Our fallowden are from Hindoostan and the Tropics. James 1st, introduced the cattle.

Before the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, it was supposed that the silk worm could exist only in China and Persia. But about the times of Augustus and Tiberius, some enterprising man carried the eggs to Greece, where they were found to hatch and thrive perfectly well. They afterwards were carried to Asia Minor, but it was several ages before they were naturalized to Italy by the Francs.—Mechanic and Farmer.

Speed of the Plough.

The usual speed of horses at the plough may be ascertained in this way. A ridge of five yards in breadth will require a length of 968 yards to contain an imperial acre; and to plough which at nine bouts, of 10-inch breadth of furrow slice, counting no stoppages, will make the horses walk 8 ⅞ miles, which in ten hours gives a speed of 1,742 ½ yards per hour. But as ridges are not made of 968 yards in length, and as horses cannot draw a plough that distance without being affected in their wind, and as allowance must be made for turning the ends of the ridges, as well as affording rest to the horses, that speed will have to be considerably increased to do that quantity of work in the time.

By experiment it has been found that one hour, nineteen minutes, out of eight hours, are lost by turning, while ploughing an acre of ridges of 274 yards in length, with an 8-inch furrow-slice.—Hence in ploughing an acre of ridges of 250 yards in length, which is the length of the ridge I recommend as the best for horses in draught, when speaking of enclosures, in ten hours, with a 10-inch furrow-slice, the time lost by turning is one hour and twenty-two minutes. I presume the experiment alluded to does not include the necessary stoppages for the rest of horses, but which should be included; for however easy the length of the ridge may be made for draught horses, they cannot go on walking in the plough for five hours together without taking occasional rest. Now 250 yards length of ridge give nearly four ridges to the acre, or 36 bouts; and allowing a rest of one minute in every other bout, 18 minutes will have to be added to the one hour and twenty-two minutes lost, or very nearly one and three fourths hours of loss of time out of the ten hours, for turning and rest. Thus, 18,000 pards will be ploughed in eight and one-quarter hours, or at the rate of one mile, 422 yards per hour.—Stephen's Book of the Farm.

Pauperism.—The census of the New York almshouse now presents an aggregate of 6,205, of whom 1,319 are in the hospitals and lunatic asylum, 778 in the city prisons, and 2,202 regular inmates of the poor-house. Besides these, 1,680 who receive subsistence at their own houses. The expenses of the establishment last month were $40,084, including $18,200 for coal.

Health of Montreal and Quebec.—The fever is somewhat abated, but in the hospital sheds & on Grosse Isle, it is still almost as prevalent and fatal as heretofore. The deaths at Grosse Isle average from thirty to fifty in each twenty-four hours, and in the sheds at Montreal about thirty. There have been, up to Tuesday last, about five thousands deaths at these two places, making, with those who have died at sea, a total of about eight thousand, exclusive of the many who have died after leaving Montreal on the road to their various points of destination. In the marine hospital at Quebec all the regular nurses, save one, have fallen victims to the disease; the exception has been twice attacked, but recovered.

Miscellaneous.

How an Editor was Made.

It has been before remarked, several times, we suspect, that it is strange to observe by what slight and trifling causes the current of human life is charged in this queer world of ours—albeit, the best world we ever saw—and how oddly some men are moved from the plough to Blackstone, or from the anvil to the quill. One of the most singular illustrations of this remark may be found in the case of our old friend, Alick Bullitt, well known in this region, now one of the editors of the New Orleans Picayune. We may as well say, en passant, that while the legs of Alick carry about a body, the size of which has entitled him to all the privileges of an Alderman of the good city of Orleans, he has a heart at the same time that is quite as large as his corporation, and a head stored with as good mental food as the physical delicacies that usually adorn his stomach.

"What on earth has ever made you an editor?" said we to Alick one day.

"Why?"

"You were educated for a lawyer?"

"Yes."

"Were admitted to the bar?"

"Yes."

"And commenced practice?"

"O yes."

"Had a good business?"

"Well, I can't exactly say that," responded Alick; "I stuck out my shingle in Louisville, and faithfully followed my profession for three years—during that time I had precisely one case."

"Only one?"

"Only one—and that disgusted me with the profession, and satisfied me that I had most distinctly mistaken my vocation."

"How was that?"

"I'll tell you all about it. You remember the time Lovett—the man whose skull is now preserved as a precious relic, by Junius Brutus Booth—was tried for murder, and convicted. Well, I was junior counsel in the case, and made my maiden speech before the jury. There is no doubt that the man was an accomplished villain, and that he had been guilty in his time of many startling enormities, and that he richly deserved the gallows; but of the crime with which he stood charged upon this occasion, I feel assured he was perfectly innocent. The evidence against him scarcely deserved the name of circumstantial evidence—it was vague, unsubstantial, incomplete and trifling to the last degree. To make the story short, I laid myself out, made a speech in favor of the poor fellow of about four hours in length, and sat down under the impression that I had done the business pretty effectually. That jury gave a verdict of Guilty without leaving their seats, and Lovett was hung accordingly."

"All caused by your speech."

"It wasn't any thing else—and concluding that I never should make a bright and shining light as Counsellor and Attorney at Law, I forthwith turned editor." And a capital editor has he made, too.—Cincinnati News.

A Race for a Wife.

In Lapland when a man expresses his affection for a virgin, and asks her parent's consent to marry her, a day is at once appointed for her friends to behold the two parties run a race together. The maid is allowed in starting the advantage of a third part of the race, so that it is impossible, except willing to herself, that she should be overtaken. If the maid outrun her suitor, the matter is ended, it being penal for the man to renew the mention of marriage. But if the virgin hath an affection for him, though at first running hard to try the truth of his love, she will (without Atalanta's golden ball to retard her speed) pretend some casualty and make a voluntary halt before she come to the mark or end of the race.—Thus none are compelled to marry against their own will; and this is the cause that in this country the married people are richer in their own contentment than in other lands where so many forced matches make feigned love and real unhappiness.

Kind words do not cost much.—They never blister the tongue or lips. And we have never heard of any mental trouble arising from this quarter. Though they do not cost much, yet they accomplish much:—

1. They help one's own good nature and good will. Soft words soften our own soul. Angry words are fuel to the flame of wrath, and make it blaze the more fiercely.

2. Kind words make other people good natured. Cold words freeze people, and hot words scorch them, and sarcastic words irritate them, and bitter words make them bitter, and wrathful words make them wrathful.

There is such a rush of all other kinds of words in our days that it seems desirable to give kind words a chance among them. There are vain words, and idle words, and hasty words, and spiteful words, and silly words, and empty words, and profane words, and boisterous words, & warlike words.

Kind words produce their own image on men's souls. And a beautiful image it is. They soothe and quiet and comfort the hearer. They shame him out of his sour, morose, unkind feelings. We have not yet begun to use kind words in such abundance as they ought to be used.

A Good Hit.

In a mixed company, consisting chiefly of Canadian gentlemen, on board one of the St. Lawrence river steamboats coming up from Montreal the other day, the conversation turned on the Mexican War, its causes and the consequences likely to come out of it, during which an American gentleman occasionally communicated a fact or expressed an opinion. At length, a stout round faced English gentleman, who had not seemed to relish the American's opinions, or his quiet manner of expressing them, turned to the American, and swelling out a little larger than common, said:

"Are you aware, sir, that in Great Britian we hold the Government of the United States, and your people, in utter contempt?"

The American civilly replied, "And are you aware, sir, that the Chinese hold the British Government and your people in utter contempt?"

"Ah!" immediately said the Englishman, and evidently without a second thought, "but that is owing to their cursed ignorance!"

The application was so obvious that all but one Englishman joined at once in a hearty laugh, and no more was said of British contempt for the United States.—St. Lawrence Republican.

On motion, Br. Geo. Brown, President of the Pittsburgh conference, Br. Bassett, Ed. W. R., Br. Boardman, Pastor of the Presbyterian church of Youngstown, Br. Reeves and Br. McElroy, of the Pittsburgh conference, were invited to honorary seats.

The usual standing committees appointed, and rules of order adopted.

At the opening of the afternoon session, Br. Case resigned his place as Secretary, on account of indisposition, and J. Burns elected to fill his place.

The following brethren were elected and ordained:—

DEACONS.—O. V. Warren, G. M. Scott, S. Elliott, P. Lewis, C. T. Kingsbury, N. T. Brown, & J. H. Hamilton.

ELDERS.—A. R. Brown, Wm. Remsburg, S. Gee, D. Kinney, C. J. Sears, E. P. Steadman, J. M. Winn, Wm. Hatfield, S. Elliott, C. T. Kingsbury.

On the examination of character, when the name of S. H. Heath, was called, it was stated by the President, that S. H. Heath had left the church in a disorderly way, and under grounds for charges. Therefore, it was Resolved, That the name of S. H. Heath be erased from the Journals.

The following resolution was passed in reference to Conference collections:

Resolved, That it be, hereafter, the duty of each Superintendent of a circuit or Station, to arraign before their Quarterly Conference, the Stewards of their respective charges, who may refuse or neglect to take up the Annual conference collection, and that he be held responsible to this body for the discharge of this, his duty.

The Standing District Committee.—D. B. Dorsey, R. Andrew, and J. Burns, Ministerial. H. I. Hukill, Tho's. Scott, and J. A. Dohrman, Laymen.

The following preamble and resolution was offered and adopted:

WHEREAS, the church in this region of country, in all her branches, is in a cold and formal state, owing, no doubt, to the fact that the moral condition is such as to call for the displeasure and chastisement of Providence. Under such circumstances, it becomes the duty of the church to humble herself before Almighty God. Therefore—

Resolved, In view of these facts, that the conference recommend to all the churches within her borders, to set apart the 1st Thursday in November, 1847, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, to avert the displeasure of the Deity, and promote the prosperity of Zion.

Report of the committee on the communication from the committee of the Genessee Annual Conference, on the subject of Slavery and Conventions, which was adopted unanimously.

Your committee to whom the document from the Genessee Annual conference was referred, having had this document under due consideration, beg leave to report,

That, although we highly appreciate the motives which dictated that communication; and heartily as we do, enter into their feelings, in deploring the existence of the great moral, social, and political evil of slavery, we are constrained, from the reasons embraced in the following resolutions, to decline concurring with the Genessee Annual conference, in the call of a general convention, to alter the constitution and Discipline of the church; or the call of a convention of the Northern conferences, with a view to a special organization.

Resolved, 1st: That the call of a convention, at this time, would agitate and distract the church, on account of an evil in which we do not feel ourselves implicated as a conference; but that the responsibility rests with the South, where the evil exists.

Resolved, 2d: That should a division of the church take place, it would in no way tend to remove the evil of Slavery in the South; but would necessarily lessen our influence in the accomplishment of the designed object, by severing the avenues of communication and friendly intercourse between the North and South.

All of which is respectively submitted:

W. MARSHALL,
I. THRAP,
J. BURNS, } Committee.

On motion, the resolutions of the last Annual conference were re-affirmed, and ordered to be published in the Western Recorder; which are, as follows:

Resolved 1st: That this Annual conference do consider the voluntary enslavement of our fellow-men, under all circumstances, sinful; and that we will use all Scriptural and lawful means to procure its extirpation from the church and from the world, and we hereby disclaim all participation in the evil of Slavery.

Resolved, 2d: That we believe that the religion taught by Jesus Christ and his Apostles, has a tendency to do away all oppression; and, therefore, where oppression does exist, there is a lack of the influence of that religion.

On motion, the following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That the Ministers of this conference be required to impress upon persons who are members of the church, and those who desire to become members, who are not baptized, the importance of submitting to this ordinance.

On motion, the following resolutions were passed:

Resolved, 1st: That the Muskingum Annual conference will not, hereafter, elect or ordain any alien to the order of Elder or Deacon, or receive an alien into the Itinerancy, until he shall have taken the oath of allegiance to the American Government, or declared his intention so to do, according to the forms of law.

Resolved, 2d: That our brethren of this conference, who are aliens, are most respectfully requested to avail themselves of their earliest and most convenient opportunity to become citizens of these United States, in order that they may be authorized to exercise civil as well as ecclesiastial functions.

Report of the committee on Home Missions, as adopted.

It shall be the duty of each Missionary to travel and preach the gospel in those parts or places prescribed by the conference; to raise societies and administer Discipline; and when three or more societies, containing in the aggregate not less than thirty members, shall be formed, they shall have power to elect three Stewards, who, together with official members on said Mission, shall have due authority to hold a Quarterly conference in each quarter, shall have the same power as in Circuits, and said Mission shall elect a Delegate to the Annual conference, who shall be entitled to his seat in the conference.

The Home Missionaries shall make collections for their own support in the societies and neighborhoods where they may respectively labor; and the conference shall allow them a proportionate part of the funds raised for missionary purposes, to meet their deficiencies.

On motion, Br's. Clancy, Springer, and Hamilton, were appointed to visit the Ohio conference at its coming session. Also, Br's. Ragan, Nichols, and Marshall, the Pittsburgh conference at its next session.

On motion, there was but one place put in nomination, Cambridge, Guernsey county, Ohio, was fixed upon as the place for the next Session of the Muskingum Annual conference; and the 2d Wednesday of September, 1848, the time.

On motion, J Burns was appointed to extract from the minutes for publication, and transcribe the Journals.

On motion of Br. P. Lewis, circuits and Stations were requested to procure heavy furniture for the benefit of the Itinerants, whether they have parsonages or not.

On motion, J. Burns, P. Lewis, and S. Lancaster, were appointed a committee to respond to the committee of Genessee Annual conference, on the subject of their communication. We do so, most respectfully, by referring the brethren to the action of our conference on the subject. Praying for your happiness and prosperity,

Affectionately, &c.,

P. S.—Br. Editor: Please insert, W. Ross left without an appointment, at his own request, if you have it not so. As this action was had after the committee reported, his name may not appear. J. B.

WESTERN RECORDER.

PUTNAM, OHIO:

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 23, 1847.

WANTED,

Any number of NEW SUBSCRIBERS for the "WESTERN RECORDER," to commence with Vol. Nine. The preachers and others friendly to the enterprise, are requested to procure as many as may be, against the closing of the present Volume. Provided, however, no names be sent us but such as can be relied upon as good.

☞ Letter No. vi., from the Editor, given in this week's paper, will prove interesting. He will resume his station, probably, next week.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"W. S. S." requests us to state that he is not the author of "Life in earnest," published in the Recorder of the 9th instant; but that it was taken from the "Edinburgh Presbyterian Review." He says he copied it, "from a sense of duty." We hope, if the Brother has any more such articles on file, he will again be influenced by the same "sense of duty," and forward them to us.

"THETA'S" "Discourse on Psalms, viii, 3 & 4," has found "favor," and will be forthcoming in our next.

Heart-Cheering News!
PEACE! PEACE!! PEACE!!! PEACE!!!!

Can it be true? or is the report a false one? If such be the fact, and we do not doubt it now, there can be no duty more pleasing to us, than to announce it. Peace, thrice welcome, is again ours. The articles of the Treaty have been signed by Mr. Trist, on behalf of the United States, and the Mexican Commissioners. Let every heart rejoice, that an end is put to such scenes of wholesale murder, of which a christian nation should be ashamed. Let us as a people unite in celebrating the close of this bloody war, which has for sixteen months, engaged the American and Mexican Republics; and so seriously threatened to embroil not only the entire Western Continent, but the whole civilized world. Let our hearts be lifted in thankfulness to Almighty God, that in the midst of deserved punishment, He has remembered us in mercy, and restored us, we trust to an honorable peace. Now let the advocates of the present war, and those whose vain show of patriotism will induce them to go for their country, "right or wrong," reflect on the millions of money which have been expended, and the hundreds and thousands of valuable lives lost, in what our own Generals have termed an "unnatural war." Enough has been expended to supply every man, woman and child in the United States, and in Mexico, too, with a Bible; and also to teach them to read it. How many thousands of our young men, in the prime of life,—the hope of their parents in declining years,—have suffered their patriotism to become inflamed at the hollow sound of a sheep skin, and have gone to Mexico—and for what?—to return with their brows crowned with laurels, gained by a display of valor? No! They have gone there to return no more! Their bones now lie bleaching beneath the rays of a Southern Sun; and not even a stone to mark the spot where they breathed their last. Not a line in history will ever tell that for the love of country they bled and died. But on the contrary, the honor will be given to those who labored least, and were least exposed. Let every christian reflect, and imagine, if they can, provocation sufficient to justify such scenes as have been recorded within the past year. Rejoice, all, that they are so soon ended. Lengthy accounts might be given of battles fought, and victories won, ere the city of Mexico was conquered; but since we have received the glorious news that peace is restored, we hope our readers will excuse us from publishing such heart-rending scenes; which, we assure them is any thing but pleasing to us. The number killed in the late battles, is estimated at 1000! Americans, and 5000!! Mexicans. Reader think of this.

P. S. Since the above was in type, we see that the eastern papers do not place much reliance upon the truth of the report. From a paragraph in the New Orleans Delta, we find the credit is given to the "La Patria," a Spanish Mexican paper of that city. Hope it is true.

SORROWFUL.—We learn from the Easton (Md.) Star, that the son of Dr. James Dawson, aged five years, met with a painful death, by falling into a large pot of boiling soap, on the 11th instant. He lingered in great agony for about ten hours. We wish to cast no reflections upon the unfortunate parents; but from the many acts of carelessness that have come under our own observation, we have wondered that such accidents were not more numerous. There may be exceptions to all rules; yet our opinion is, if children were properly trained, they would seldom venture where there is danger.

☞ We are not selfish, but for the sake of our correspondents, we ask our neighbors in the West, who copy articles from the Recorder, just to insert another line at the commencement or ending of them, as best suits them. One line more would not have been amiss, above that poetry entitled 'A Song for the Devotees of Tobacco.'

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR. NO. VI.

Cincinnati, Saturday Sept. 18, 1847.

We left Zanesville in the mail coach, for this city, on Wednesday, at ten minutes before 12 o'clock. Of our company was one gentleman of Sandusky city, returning from New York. It seemed singular that, bound for such diverse destination, we should travel together a considerable portion of the way westward though expecting before next day at noon, to find ourselves at extreme opposite points of the state, more than 200 miles apart. Yet, so it was. We had a fine run to Columbus, reaching there at 7 o'clock, P. M. The Ohio Conference, (M. E. C.) had just held its session in the city, and had passed away. But there were other objects of attraction. There was a Grand Encampment or Chapter of the Masonic fraternity on hand, which had brought together gentlemen from many parts of the State, and from various other States. At the Neil House, where we tarried nearly two hours, for Post Office men to overhaul their mails, we at once found ourselves in the midst of a large company of those gentlemen, it being about the supper hour.

Quite to our surprise as well as pleasure, we met with various ones of our acquaintance from different sections. The first was one of our Steubenville brethren, then several from Cincinnati. And with the rest, who else should we greet, but our old friend M. M. Henkle, D. D., now one of the editors of the Nashville Christian Advocate? We had an agreeable interview with our brother of the quill, not having seen him for some seven years. It seemed to us that the rude finger of time had begun to write furrows upon his countenance, (which may soon be our lot also,) but former friendship was neither forgotten nor abated. At about nine o'clock, we were off, in a coach for Xenia. We had rather an uncomfortable ride, through the night, there being a crowd of passengers. We were in Xenia by 5 o'clock, Thursday morning, had about half an hour to spend before the arrival of the cars from Springfield, took a hasty bite of breakfast, and were soon on our way to Cincinnati, by the iron track.

By the way, we met with our friend Miley (of the M. E. C.) who was last year our neighbor, but now appointed to one of the charges in Cincinnati. He related to us a disaster, which had like to have been destructive of life. On the day previous, the locomotive with the passenger train, had run off the track at Yellow Springs, by reason of the switch being misplaced. Strange to tell, little injury was done, save that the track was torn up for a considerable distance, and the train detained several hours. We reached the Queen City before 11 o'clock, or in 23 hours from Zanesville. We found ourselves in a perfect Bedlam of hacks and porters, and persons in great numbers looking for the arrival of friends. And it was an hour before we could get ourselves and baggage conveyed to our lodgings. We were favored with our accommodations, as repeatedly heretofore, at the house of our excellent friend and Br. S. Easton. The Ohio Conference had been in session since Wednesday morning, and had got along prosperously with its business. On Thursday, Br. J. M. Young, was re-elected President, and Brethren, White, Rose, Carson & Layman were chosen Stationing Committee. The Communication of the President, represents the District in a prosperous condition, and the report of the Committee on Boundaries &c., shows an increase of some 200 in membership. This is doing well, considering the unfortunate dissentions and alienations which occurred a year ago. Peace seems now to prevail.

The session of the Conference, for harmony and good feeling, was never excelled by any previous session. And never did the Conference get along more expeditiously with its business, at any previous session. Indeed some leading brethren thought that the business might have been entirely concluded by Saturday evening.—A session or two however is to be held on Monday. The Report of the Stationing Committee, was read this afternoon. It was however recommitted in view of a few charges. Br. W. B. Evans has returned from Indiana, and taken an appointment from this Conference. Br. Stockton has not reached here, though

The 1st aims to throw the responsibility on the South. And the 2nd will openly lay it upon our brethren in the north. We are opposed to a division of the church, for the following reasons: 1st, Division is no remedy for the evil of Slavery; it rather confirms it. The sad spectacle presented in the division of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is proof of this assertion. Neither white nor black, north or south, have gained one particle of liberty by their division. So immensely bitter has been the controversy between the parties, piety has been greatly injured, the church scandalized, and the mouth of Infidelity opened wide.

Second: Division is not necessary, in order to relieve our brethren in the north of responsibility as to Slavery. If Southern Annual Conferences do not do their duty, they alone are responsible. The north cannot be responsible, when it has no power. We cannot control legislation and spiritual communion in the South—all belongs to them. The south cannot control legislation and spiritual communion in the north. Here we alone are responsible.

Third: Division of the church, as a remedy for Slavery, has no scriptural authority. In Apostolic times according to our understanding of the matter, both masters and slaves, were admitted to membership in the christian church, on equal footing. Both alike were taught their duty, but no where in the New Testament can a text be found, authorizing a division of the church for the removal of Slavery. In all our movements we wish to have New Testament authority. Therefore, we oppose division. 4th: Keep our church in an undivided state, and we can, to some extent, retain the power of argument over the slave question. This, by the by, is our only power. Divide, and all is lost. Rancor takes the place of love, and then, no argument, however strong, can pass Mason and Dixon's line; and the south is entirely out of the reach of northern influence. 5th: Division will operate as an abridgement on our commission to preach the gospel. Our commission is to all the world, and every creature. No geographical lines are to stop; no slave-holding state or country is left out of our commission. Jesus says go, and we will go. If he says by his Providence and church, go north, north we go—if he says go south—south we go. Our field is the world—the whole world—the whole world is to be evangelized. But thy Kingdom come, to bond and free, high and low, till all shall be of one heart and mind—Even so, Amen. By order of the Conference.

GEORGE BROWN, President.

Pittsburgh An Conference, M. P. Church.

DONT FORGET.—Those who are indebted for the Western Recorder, will greatly oblige us, by paying up before the close of the present volume. It will be a convenient opportunity to send by the preachers or delegates to the approaching Conferences. We need to receive, about this time, several hundred dollars, to enable us to meet claims against us which have grown out of our publishing enterprise. Dont forget. We shall have to discontinue many at the close of vol. viii, if they do not pay up.

A GREAT DEPENDANCE is also placed in the liberality of those true friends of the paper, who pursue the good old custom of paying in advance. From them we trust we shall have some essential aid in entering upon our next volume. Read the next paragraph.

ANNUAL REGISTER, M. P. CHURCH, 1848.—This little publication, so much demanded by the Church, is now in press, and will be issued at an earlier date than heretofore. An edition of 6000 copies of the first half of the pamphlet, including the Calendar, is already worked off from the press. And we only wait to obtain the statistics of the several Annual Conferences to be held within a few weeks, when we expect to make up the remaining part of the publication. Every subscriber for the Western Recorder who pays $2 in advance for vol. 9, shall have a copy of the Register sent him by mail, so soon as it is issued.

INFORMATION WANTED—STATISTICS OF CONFERENCES.—We are about publishing the Annual Register of the M. P. Church, for the year 1848, and are anxious to obtain, in view of this publication, the statistics of those Annual Conferences which have not published their Minutes in full. We desire to have the name of the President of each Conference, the number of Stations, Circuits, Missions, Itinerant ministers and preachers, Unstationed ministers and preachers, Members, and houses of worship in each District. Also, the time and place of the next session of each Annual Conference. If the secretaries, or any other having the information, will communicate it to us without delay, we shall be greatly obliged, and will be pleased to reciprocate the favor in any possible way.

THREE CHILDREN BURNED.—A dreadful accident occurred at Claysville, Va., on the 22d ult., by which the children of Mr. Isaac Bosely were burned to death. The Romney Intelligencer gives the following particulars:—

Mr. Bosely and wife left home on that day for some purpose, leaving at their home their three little children, the eldest being only about four or five years old, and the youngest an infant, all of whom being asleep, the parents previous to their departure making fast the doors that they might not be interrupted during their absence. The house took fire, originating, as is supposed, in the chimney, and communicating immediately to the house, and there being no person near enough to give an alarm, the house and the three little children were soon destroyed. The parents did not arrive until the little beings were broiling beneath the scorching flames, and to late to render any assistance to them.

A GREAT SHOW.—The editor of the Advertiser, Rochester, says:—We were yesterday shown the limb of an apple tree which had upon it within the space of seventeen inches, no less than sixty-five apples! They were placed upon the stick like kernels upon a corn cob. Yesterday we saw a cucumber which "beats all." The length was three feet eleven inches and a fraction. Also, a branch of a peach tree about two feet long, which bore sixty-three peaches!

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Letter from General Scott.

The following was the letter addressed by General Scott to Santa Ana tendering an armistice:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY U. S. AMERICA, Coyoacan, August 21, 1847.

To His Excellency the President and General-in-Chief of the Republic of Mexico:

SIR,—Too much blood has already been shed in this unnatural war between the two great republics of this continent. It is time that the differences between them should be amicably and honorably settled, and it is known to your Excellency that a commissioner on the part of the United States, clothed with full powers to that end, is with this army. To enable the two republics to enter on negotiation, I am willing to sign, on reasonable terms, a short armistice.

I shall wait with impatience until to-morrow morning for a direct answer to this communication; but shall in the meantime seize and occupy such positions outside of the capital as I may deem necessary to the shelter and comfort of this army.

I have the honor to remain, with high consideration and respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant, WINFIELD SCOTT.

To this letter a reply was returned by the Mexican Secretary of War, of which the following is a hasty version:

MINISTRY OF WAR AND MARINE, Mexico, August 21, 1847.

To His Excellency, Gen. Winfield Scott, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the U. S.

SIR,—The undersigned, Minister of War and Marine of the Government of the United States of Mexico, is instructed by his Excellency the President, commander-in-chief, to reply to your communication in which you propose to enter into an armistice, with a view to avoid the further shedding of blood between the two great republics of this continent, for the purpose of hearing the propositions which may be made for this purpose by the commissioner of his Excellency, the President of the United States of America, who is at the headquarters of the American army.

It is certainly lamentable, that in consequence of the disregard of the rights of the Mexican Republic, the shedding of blood has become inevitable between the first republics of the American continent, and your Excellency with great propriety qualifies this war as unnatural, as well on account of its origin as the antecedents of two people identified by their relations and their interests. The proposition of an armistice to terminate this scandal has been received with pleasure by his Excellency, the President, commander-in-chief, as it will enable the propositions to be entertained which the commission of the President of the United States may make for the honorable termination of the war.

Accordingly, the President, commander-in-chief, directs me to say to your Excellency that he accepts the proposition to enter into an armistice, and for this object has appointed the brigadier generals D. Ignacio Moray Villamil and D. Benito Quijano, who will be present at the time and place which may be designated.

His Excellency also instructs me to communicate his satisfaction that the army of the United States should occupy convenient and fitting quarters, trusting and hoping that they will be out of reach of the fire of the Mexican fortifications.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration and respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant, ALCORTA.

The same day Senor Pacheco, the Secretary of State, issued the following summons for the assembling of Congress:

MINISTRY OF INTERNAL AND FOREIGN RELATIONS, Mexico, Aug. 21, '47.

Most Excellent Sir,—All Mexicans, but especially the inhabitants of this capital, have been witnesses to the extraordinary exertions which have been made by his Excellency the Provisional President to collect an army capable of meeting that of the United States, and restoring the lustre of the arms of the Republic. They are witnesses also that he has fought with intrepidity, exposing his own life, until the moment when the victory was lost, and the enemy was at the gates of the capital.

In these circumstances, and when the numerous inhabitants of Mexico have made every kind of sacrifice to carry on the war, it is one of the most imperious duties of the First Magistrate to prevent the calamities inseparable from an assault, and to avoid all the consequences of a violent occupation of the city.

To this end, and in the exercise of his constitutional powers, and in conformity with the wishes of Congress communicated to him on the 16th of July last, he has determined to hear the propositions which Mr. Nicholas Trist has to make on the part of the United States, and to consent that in the meantime there shall be a suspension of hostilities.

As this question is of the utmost interest to the Republic, his Excellency desires that the National Congress should take its appropriate part, and accordingly he directs me to notify your Excellency that you may take measures diligently to summon the Deputies to assemble at 12 o'clock to-day.

I reiterate the assurances of my distinguished consideration. God and Liberty.

JOSE RAMON PACHECO.

Prospects of Peace.

The Washington Union, of Thursday evening, furnishes nothing official from the army, definite, as to the prospects of peace. On this subject, however, the Union remarks:

"The country is becoming impatient for the termination of the suspense in our relation with Mexico. Politicians are beginning to discuss the armistice and the duration of the negotiation. The battle was fought on the 19th of August. The armistice was considered on the 24th. The commissioners had their first meeting on the 27th—their second on the 28th, and were to have a third meeting on Monday, the 30th August.

We have no accounts as late as that day. 'This armistice shall continue as long as the commissioners of the two governments may be engaged on negotiations, until the commander of either of the said armies shall give formal notice to the other of the cessation of the armistice, and for forty-eight hours after such notice.'

We have not the slightest disposition to prejudge the question, or to find fault with any one. But much will depend upon the energy of the American commander.

We shall wait with great anxiety for further news from the army. If an honorable peace can be made, we shall hail it with pleasure; but it must be promptly made. If not made at once, let the fact be known; be brought to bear more stringently upon Mexico. As an officer writes on the 25th, 'To get peace, we may have to conquer it, not to conciliate a peace; and to do this, we must conquer the people. We have almost had enough of conciliating to negotiate.'

We understand a steamer is to be kept in readiness at Vera Cruz to receive the General's official details of his transactions and convey them to the government. They may, of course, be expected in a few days. Another article of the same date says:—

We undertake to say, in relation to the whole subject—that it would be most unfortunate if Mr. Trist should permit the negotiation to be spun out beyond the shortest possible time—say two or three days: for as we are now advised that course is the very policy which the wily politician Santa Anna, would himself prefer, the rallying and organizing his means; and, under the same reservation, we may add, it is to be regretted that as long a period as forty-eight hours after the negotiation has been allowed for the resumption of hostilities.

From the Philadelphia Saturday Gleaner.

Love, Madness, and Murder.

THE TRAGEDY NEAR PLEASANTVILLE.

We have before us in the Eastern State Journal, published at White Plains, New York, a full account of the recent frightful tragedy near Pleasantville, in which a young girl named Mary Goodhart was cruelly murdered. The victim is a little over fifteen years of age, and the murderer was a man of forty-five named Amos Northrop. The Journal states that he is a journeyman shoemaker, of somewhat dissipated habits, and during the last two years he had boarded with Mary's father, George Goodhart—who is a widower—Mary keeping house for him. During this time, Northrop made love to Mary, and they were engaged to be married; but Northrop coming home drunk one day, and abusing Mary, she declared she would not marry him, insisting, to the last, that she would not marry a man who drank liquor, neither would she marry a man who would abuse her before she had him: and besides, she told him that he was too old for one of her age, and she could not, and would not, marry him. Northrop was of course chagrined, and on one occasion remarked to her sister, Mrs. Boyce, and in Mary's presence: "I suppose Mary thinks she is through with it now, but, by —, she'll find that she is not!" Thus evidently threatening her with some sort of punishment! On Sunday morning, Northrop went to Mr. Boyce's about ten o'clock, where the murder was committed. Mrs. Boyce is Mary's sister, and Mary had gone over there to spend the day. Northrop asked Mary to take a walk with him, which she declined. He then told her he had something to say to her, to which she replied, that what he had to say to her, he could say there, as she would not go out with him. He then approached her, she standing near the foot of the bed in the room, and some four or five feet from the back window. He seized her, and after some parleying, clenched her hands or arms, and stabbed her with a shoe-knife in the breast. She screamed, and sprang from him, saying, "he is killing me," leaped out of the window. Mrs. Boyce, who thought Northrop was making for her, followed Mary out of the window. Mary took two or three steps, and fell, and in a few minutes expired, without moving from the spot.

It is added, that since her refusal to marry Northrop, perhaps before, Mary had become attached to a young man in that vicinity, more nearly of her own age—which fact doubtless strengthened her resolution not to marry Northrop. At least, it is natural to suppose, that, mere child as she was when she consented to marry a man so far advanced beyond her in years, and who had disgusted her by his drunkenness, and frightened her by his abuse, her affections would readily find a more congenial object upon which to fasten, in the person of a youth near her own age.—Northrop escaped, but was subsequently taken. The first person who saw him when he re-appeared from the woods, was Mary's father.

"Why, Northrop, what have you done!" exclaimed Goodhart; to which he replied, "You need not be afraid—I will not hurt you—I am near dead." Others coming along soon, Mr. Brundage, Constable of North Castle, among them, Northrop was soon taken charge of.
